SECT. II.

From the UNION to the End of the Reign of Queen ANNE.

Expectations of the ensuing campaign
not answered.
Harc.

THE unparalleled successes of the Allies, in the glorious and ever-memorable year 1706, and the many eminent misfortunes to the French King in one campaign, raised great expectations from the next, and made it concluded, that the time was come, in which the perfidy, tyranny, and cruelty of that King's long and bloody Reign were going to be repaid him with the same measures wherewith he had formerly treated others. But the events of the ensuing campaign produced a contrary effect, and proved very unfortunate to the Allies. The offers of peace, made by France, had been indeed rejected by Great-Britain and Holland, but the inclination (as hath been observed) expressed by some persons to come to a treaty with the French, upon the terms offered, was thought to have raised, in the Imperial Court, a strong jealousy, that the maritime powers were tampering with France, and making terms for themselves, to which the interest of Austria was to be sacrificed. And this jealousy was supposed to have put that Court upon measures, that had a fatal influence on the campaign of this year, and to have occasioned the two most unfortunate events that happened during the whole war. For the conclusion of a treaty with the French, for evacuating the Milanese, without the privity of England and Holland, gave the French an opportunity of sending immediately into Spain a great body of good veteran troops, to the assistance of King Philip, whose army had by that means the superiority over the Allies, and gained the battle of Almanza. And the expedition to Naples was the chief cause of the ill success of the design again Toulon.

As to the affair of the Milanese, the French were losing place after place in Lombardy. Cremona, Mantua, and the citadel of Milan were the only places, that were left in their hands. Burnet.

1707. It was not possible to maintain these long without a greater force, nor was it easy to convey that to them. On the other hand, the reducing those fortresses was like to be a work of time, which would fatigue those troops, and would bring a great charge with it. A capitulation was therefore proposed for delivering up those places, and for allowing the French troops a free march into Dauphiné. As soon as this was sent to Vienna, it was agreed to, without communicating it to the Allies, which gave just cause of offence. It was said in excuse, that every General had a power to agree to a capitulation; and consequently the Emperor, in this case, was not bound to stay for the consent of the Allies. This was true, if the capitulation had been for one single place; but this was of the nature of a treaty, being of a greater extent. By this the French saved ten or twelve thousand men, who must have all been, in a little time, made prisoners of war. They were veteran troops, and were sent into Spain; the ill effects of which were quickly felt.

The design was formed for the following campaign after this manner: The Duke of Savoy undertook to march an army into France, and to act there, as should be concerted by the Allies (1). Some proposed the marching through Dauphiné to the Rhone, and so up to Lyons; but, an attempt upon Toulon being thought the most important thing which could be designed, that was determined. Marshal de Tessé was sent to secure the passes, and to cover France on that side. Prince Lewis of Baden dying this winter little esteemed and little lamented, the Marquis of Bareith had the command of the army on the Upper Rhine, from whom less was expected; and he was so ill supported, that he could do nothing. The Court of Vienna was so set on the reduction of Hungary, that they thought of nothing else. The Hungarians were very numerous, but they wanted both Officers and Discipline. Ragotzki had possessed himself of almost all Transylvania; and the Hungarians were so alienated from the Emperor, that they were consulting about choosing a new King.

The campaign was opened very fatally in Spain. It has been related, that in a Council of war held at Valencia in February 1706-7, (at which were present the Earls of Peterborough, Galway, and Rivers, and General Stanhope) it was resolved to act offensively, seek out the enemy, and endeavour to bring them to a battle, on the strength of the reinforcement arrived from England under Earl Rivers. This resolution was not generally approved, for the Earl of Peterborough, though dismissed from the command of the army (which, upon the departure of Earl Rivers, was devolved to Lord Galway) gave his opinion in writing against an offensive war in Spain, urging, "That the Confederate troops in Italy, under the command of the Duke of Savoy, and Prince Eugene, could only give the mortal blow, by entering France. That the difficulties of subsisting armies in Castile were sufficiently apparent in the last campaign. That the dangers were evident, of putting the whole upon the risk of passing to Madrid, before an army superior in cavalry: And that, above all things, the defence of Catalonia, Arragon, and Valencia, was necessary." However, the contrary resolution being taken, the Earl of Galway, the more to strengthen the Confederate army, sent orders to the Lord Tyrrawley's regiment, and the two battalions of marines, who were quartered in Catalonia, to march and join him. But the Vice-roy of that Principality would not suffer them to march from their quarters, or part with any troops out of the Province, without the King's orders, which was often

(1) In the Memoirs of Christian Cole, Esq; p. 432. is the following project concerted with the Duke of Savoy.

His Majesty the Queen, having observed with pleasure, that his Royal Highness was entirely bent to conform himself to the design she has long had, to execute the enterprize against Toulon, as soon as the affairs of Italy would permit it, has ordered her Ministers to hold Conferences with those of his Royal Highness about this expedition, in which was regulated and resolved upon what follows:

1. Her Majesty will furnish forty ships of the line at the time and place fit for the enterprize of Provence, with a sufficient number of transport-ships, to carry provisions and ammunition from Oneglia and the coasts of Genoa to that of France, when the army shall be there.

2. His Royal Highness will be pleased to let it be known, as soon as possible, about what time, and at what place, the fleet shall come, that so we may here take infallible measures, that it may be ready and furnished with every thing; and his Royal Highness is desired not to let the fleet come to the place of meeting, but just at the time he shall judge it to be indispensably necessary to let it act; and then the fleet shall be absolutely under his orders, and the Admirals shall have positive orders to obey him, and shall be entirely at his disposition, during the time he shall remain with the army in Provence.

3. Whilst we wait for the time, that is proper for these operations, there will be ships enough in the seas of Italy, to keep the enemies in their ports, and hinder the transports on the coasts of Italy; and, according to the advices we shall receive of armaments at Toulon, these ships shall be reinforced from time to time.

4. His Royal Highness is desired to take care to have certain advices of the armaments, that shall be made at Toulon, and to let Admiral Shovel, who commands the fleet, know them; and afterwards to have the goodness to let us know here, what he may have wrote to Admiral Shovel, who will conform himself to his orders and advice.

5. The Admiral is to furnish as many cannon for the batteries, as his Royal Highness shall judge to be necessary for the expeditions in Provence; but his Royal Highness is to furnish the carriages, that are necessary, the fleet carrying none that are fit for the land.

6. His Royal Highness is also to furnish the mortars with their carriages, as also the bombs, lead, and the bullets of that size which he shall judge necessary, there being cannon of all sorts on board the fleet; all which he may cause to be brought out of the Milanese to the coasts of Genoa and Pichmont, and to Oneglia, as he shall think proper to be afterwards brought by the transport-ships, where he shall order it.

7. The ships shall furnish some quantity of powder.

N. B. This article is to be farther explained.

8. His Royal Highness will have the goodness to take care of establishing magazines for provisions, and oats, and other things necessary for the army, in the places, which he shall judge most proper for the enterprize; as also to find voitures and mules to pass the mountains, and to serve in the army during the campaign, as well in Provence, as in Dauphiné.

9. The Queen and the States-General will, upon this project, continue the twenty-eight thousand men

1707. often solicited, but could not be obtained. King Charles towards the end of February, declared, to the Generals of the Allies, his intention of going into Catalonia; and a few days after, proceeded in his journey thither, taking with him the regiment of dragoons of Winterfeldt, consisting of five squadrons, with Count Talais's regiment of Dutch foot. But, at his departure, he promised the Confederate Generals, that whenever it should be thought proper to march to Madrid, he would be ready to join them, with the troops from Catalonia (1).

Whilst Earl Rivers* was gone to the Council of War at Valencia, all the troops, both English and Dutch, began to march under Lieutenant-General Erle to join Lord Galway, and with them the regiments of Lord Montjoy, Colonel George's and Colonel Anoll's. Brigadier Farrington's regiment was reduced, and the men put into Southwell's and Breton's. The Marquis in their pay; and they will take care to have them fully recruited, and that early; and the Court of Vienna will leave the whole body of troops, which was employed during the last campaign in Piedmont, in Lombardy, to serve in the expedition of France, and will recruit it as they have promised, which will make thirteen thousand recruits of foot, and four thousand new horse, which body of troops is to be in a condition to act in the month of April.

10. His Royal Highness will, on his side, use all his endeavours to restore and augment his troops to the number mentioned in the treaty.

11. As to the troops, his Royal Highness is to chuse those he shall think proper to enter into France, or to remain in Piedmont and Lombardy, and no General shall be allowed to make any difficulty to obey his orders; and her Majesty and the States-General will obtain from the Princes, to whom the troops in their pay belong, express orders to their respective Generals, so that his Royal Highness may have the absolute command of them.

12. It is desired, that his Royal Highness may enter into France, with the greatest number of forces, which the conjunctures of the times, and the situation of the enemies may require, and all within the month of May, if it be possible, having always this principal aim upon Toulon, which is to be the first object of the campaign.

13. Forty thousand pounds Sterling will be furnished for the extraordinary expences: And, if that sum be not sufficient, we will give the surplus, which shall be judged necessary by his Royal Highness, in whom we place an intire confidence.

N. B. After the return of the Courier this article was changed, and the Queen sent fifty thousand pounds Sterling immediately to the Duke of Savoy, with a promise, that if the design upon Toulon should succeed, the would pay bills, which the Duke of Savoy might draw, for fifty thousand pounds Sterling more.

14. There will be no troops for a debarkment on board the fleet, while the affairs of Spain will not permit it.

15. The expedition of Naples, that was proposed, is excluded, as being judged at present impracticable and hurtful to the campaign in France.

If his Royal Highness has any thing to object or to add to these articles, he is desired to do it by an express, that so a final resolution may be taken about his remonstrances, and be sent him by the same express at his return.

(1) Bishop Burnet says (Vol. II. 475.) "That King Charles pretended there was an army coming into Catalonia from Rouffillon, and that it was necessary for him to march into that Country. The dividing a force, when the whole together was not equal to the enemy's, has often proved fatal. He ought to have made his army as strong as possibly he could, and to have marched with it to Madrid, for the rest of Spain would have fallen into his hands upon the success of that expedition. But he persisted in his first resolution, and marched away with a part of the army, leaving about sixteen thousand men under the Earl of Galway's command. They had eaten up all their stores in Valencia, and could subsist no longer there; so they were forced to break into Castile. The Duke of Berwick came against them with an army not much No. 52. Vol. IV.

"superior to theirs; but the Court of France had sent the Duke of Orleans into Spain with some of the best troops, that they had brought from Italy; and these joined the Duke of Berwick a day before the two armies engaged." Dr. Freind observes, p. 181, &c. that soon after the Earl of Peterborough had given his opinion in writing in the Council of war at Valencia, on the 4th of February 1707, N. S. against an offensive war in Spain, he left that Kingdom, and went a second time to Italy and Turin, from which City he wrote a letter on the 21st of April 1707, to the Portuguese Ambassador, in which he pressed more earnestly, and explained more at large, the advice, which he had given in the Council of war. But, before his scheme could reach Spain, the Confederate Generals had entered upon other measures. Mr. Boyer tells us, p. 291, "That King Charles, with his German and Spanish Generals and Ministers, and Count Noyelles, concurred with the Earl of Peterborough; but were over-ruled by Brigadier Stanhope, the Queen's Minister, who declared in her name, That her pretence orders were, that they should seek the enemy, march to Madrid, and not divide the forces upon any occasion whatsoever." The Earl of Galway in his Narrative gives this account: "I joined with those, that were of opinion, that it was by no ways convenient to divide the troops, as may appear by a copy of that opinion signed by my Lord Tyranny, and by me, bearing date the 15th day of January 1706-7. But I must beg leave to observe, that this was not the decisive Council for the operations of the campaign, for many subsequent Councils were held in the King's presence more important than this; and though in them there might have been some variety of opinions as to the manner, yet almost all the Generals and Ministers, that assisted at those Councils, agreed perfectly in the substance, which was, that we should join our troops, and march to Madrid. Some indeed were for passing through the plains of la Mancha, and crossing the Tagus; but this opinion was over-ruled, because of the hazard in passing the river, if the enemy opposed us, and of the scarcity of provisions in the Mancha, which had been exhausted by the enemy's winter-quarters: For which reasons it was, after many debates, agreed, that we should take the way of Valencia and Arragon, passing the Tagus at its head, to avoid all opposition. But, lest the Kingdom of Valencia might by this means be any ways exposed, it was likewise resolved, before we should begin our march to destroy all the enemy's magazines of provisions and forage in the country bordering upon the frontier of Valencia, to prevent them from making any incursions; and I do take upon me to aver, that nothing was ever transacted, during the time I had the honour to command the Queen's troops, contrary to the positive resolution of any General Council, or Council of war, unless that resolution was afterwards repealed by some subsequent Council.

"So sensible was every one of our being already too weak, that it was resolved to desire my Lord Rivers (who was lately arrived at Lisbon) would join us with the troops, that came under his command from England, which his Lordship did not long after.

"For the better execution of what had been resolved for our march through Valencia and Arragon, proper Commissaries and Officers were dispatched to provide bread and forage sufficient for the troops

1707. quis de Montandre's regiment, in its march from Alicant to join the rest, was surprized, and almost all killed or taken prisoners. The two regiments of Sir Charles Hotbam and Colonel Syburg were left to garrison that town and castle, though very weak, and Syburg was appointed Governor, Sir Charles chusing to follow the army. It was the 30th of March before we all could join the great camp, having met cros the country with many difficult paves, and an incredible scarcity of provisions both for men and horses; and above all, very cold and wet weather, especially for those that were reduced to lie in the field. The whole army under the Lord

"in all places where it was designed the armies should pass. I went with the Marquis das Minas to the frontiers towards the latter end of March, and we took the field the beginning of April. We ruined part of the Country bordering upon the frontiers of Valencia before the enemy could join their troops, particularly Yzla, where they had their largest magazines; and, judging it necessary to take in the castle of Villana, to prevent the army from being masters of one of the most considerable inlets into the Kingdom of Valencia, sat down before that place. But it proved stronger than was expected; and, after we had spent some days there, we had notice the enemy had assembled their troops at Almanza. Upon this advice a Council of war was held, where it was unanimously resolved to fight the enemy; which we were the rather induced to, because it was judged impossible to subsist upon the defensive in the Kingdom of Valencia; for the Country had already been so much exhausted by our winter-quarters, that there was not two days provision to be found for the army; and we could not have been able to have subsisted there so long as we did, but for the supply we found in the enemy's magazines in Yzla. Nor did we think it proper to pursue the once intended march through that Kingdom and Aragon, lest provisions should be wanting, leaving the enemy too near, and in a condition to follow us; for, though Commisaries had been employed, there was reason to apprehend the towns, we were to pass through, would shut the gates against us, whilst we were closely followed by the enemy, and persecuted by the peasants of the country, who, grown desperate by seeing themselves abandoned, would naturally be up in arms in the mountains. Besides, we had certain advice, that there was already a body of French troops, consisting of eight thousand men in Spain, and upon their march to reinforce the enemy. Thus, as the army must inevitably have perished without fighting, it was thought reasonable to run the hazard of a battle, wherein we had an equal chance to come off victors; which was accordingly done two days after, on the 25th of April 1707, N. S. but with ill success."

The Earl of Peterborough, in answer to the fourth question of the Committee of the House of Lords, said, That several Councils of war were held in the month of January 1706-7 at Valencia about the time that intelligence was brought, that the forces, under the Earl Rivers, were entered into the Mediterranean, in order to adjust the measures for the ensuing campaign. That the matters therein debated were principally, whether the army should march towards Madrid, and seek the enemy. That, in the debates upon this subject, the Earl of Galway, Mr. Stanhope, and the Lord Tyravley supported those measures with the Portuguese General; and that the King, the Count de Noyelles, the Spanish Generals and Ministers, with himself, argued strongly against those measures, as highly dangerous and impracticable; and this in repeated Councils of war, till, at last, the Earl of Peterborough, solicited by the King of Spain to renew the debate, desired the King, that he would order all called to the Council to bring their opinions in writing, that every body's opinion and reasons for that opinion might appear, and be known to the world; which, according to the King's commands, were put in writing, and delivered at the Council."

upon the Earl of Peterborough's answers to the five questions, says thus: "In reply to this assertion, I would beg leave to appeal to your Lordships memory, whether, upon the first mention of these resolutions in this most honourable House, the Earl did not as positively affirm, That the conclusive Council for the operation of the ensuing campaign was held on the 15th of January? And whether he did not offer to depose on oath, that in that very Council no person whatever was of opinion for making an offensive war, and against dividing the troops, but the Lord Tyravley, Mr. Stanhope, and I? Soon after indeed, upon further recollection, he was pleased to add the Marquis das Minas to our number; and I observe he has since given himself a much larger latitude, both as to the time of holding that Council, and as to the persons, who voted for an offensive war? His Lordship is now so far from confining himself to a day, that he has taken in a whole month; and, by accusing us more modestly for having opposed only the King, Count Noyelles, himself, and the Spanish Generals and Ministers, leaves half the Council on our side; for, supposing all the Spanish Generals and Ministers to have assented at that Council, there could only have been twelve persons there, viz. Prince Lichtenstein, Count Oropesa, Count Corfano, Count Cardana, Count Noyelles, my Lord Peterborough, the Marquis das Minas, Count d' Astumar, my Lord Tyravley, Mr. Stanhope, Monsieur Freisheim, and I. The last six his Lordship has plainly left on our side; but my Lord Tyravley positively affirms Count Oropesa was of the same opinion, and believes Count Corfano was so too. Thus, taking the matter as the Earl of Peterborough is pleased to state it, we had an equality, and, as my Lord Tyravley remembers, the greater number of our party. Perhaps, when my Lord Peterborough contended so positively to prove that Council, of the 15th of January, conclusive, he was led into that error by the mistake in my Lord Sunderland's letter, in answer to one of Mr. Stanhope's of January 15. But he has since been pleased to allow, that the Council of the 15th was not conclusive, and that many more subsequent Councils were held, which determined the operations of the ensuing campaign, wherein he voted himself for marching to Madrid by the way of Aragon, which, I should have imagined, had left no further room to mention our opinions of the 15th. But, because he is still resolved to make good his charge against Lord Tyravley, Mr. Stanhope, and me, he affirms to your Lordships, That the action of that change in the subsequent Councils was, because the opinion of the majority had been over-ruled by a Minister of her Majesty, assuring, that the Queen had given him orders to declare in her name, that her positive orders were, that they should seek the enemy, march to Madrid, and not divide the troops upon any account whatsoever.

"I must confess I do not conceive, that it imports me much to reply to this part of the Earl's answer; nor shall I attempt to make an imperfect defence for an absent man; for, if Mr. Stanhope was here, I doubt not he would be able sufficiently to justify his own conduct in this affair. Yet I cannot help saying, that even malice itself has never yet suggested, that my Lord Tyravley, Mr. Stanhope, and I, did not act on that occasion with great integrity, according to the best of our understandings; nor shall I ever be ashamed to own an opinion, which was

1707. Lord Galway (1) and the Marquis das Minas (consisting of about four thousand five hundred horse, and eleven thousand foot) being joined, moved the next day to a camp at Caudela, and the day after marched upon two columns, and the baggage upon a third, expecting to engage the enemy in the plain of Yecla: But they were disappointed, for the Duke of Berwick had, upon the approach of the Confederate army, left that town with great precipitation, though he had made there large magazines of wheat and barley, besides a great quantity of wines, and all other sorts of provisions, as cattle, fish, &c. all which fell very seasonably into our hands.

The Generals concluding, from the Duke's precipitate retreat from this place, that his army was weak, and that the French succours (consisting of eight thousand men, and which were daily expected) had not joined him, resolved to go and surprize him in his camp at Monta- legre, a few miles from Yecla, where they had certain intelligence, that part of his army was incamped. Pursuant to this resolution, April 3, at nine in the evening, our army marched without noise, leaving only two battalions to secure the camp at Yecla. During two days, the whole army had leave to take what provisions they wanted both for horses and men, out of the plentiful magazines in this place, and the rest was ordered to be burnt. On the 7th, the army marched to Villena, a little castle on a high rock, defended by five hundred men, under a resolute governor. It lies in the road between Valencia and Casile, and would have greatly annoyed our convoys. As soon as the army was come before the castle, the Governor was summoned to surrender; but he returned a proud answer, on which some field-pieces were ordered to fire against it, but, as they did very little execution, the Engineers were commanded to work

"then not only the common sense of the army, but agreeable to the desires and interest of the whole Kingdom of England.

"In the Earl of Peterborough's farther answer to this question, he is pleased to say, That, notwithstanding this, the Earl of Galway brought the army into the plains of Valencia, a directly contrary route to that of Arragon, and into all those dangers, which he was to avoid by marching by the head of the Tagus. In reply to this answer I shall only observe, that I had not the command of that army (which consisted of three separate bodies, English, Portuguese, and Dutch) but the Marquis das Minas, from whom I always received orders; and the battle of Almanza was fought by the unanimous approbation of a Council of war: Nor could the resolutions of that Council have ever been executed, had there been the least difference in opinion, because each Commander of a separate corps might have refused to march.

"For the occasion of our moving towards Almanza, I must beg leave to refer to my narrative, where I have mentioned more at large, that, in order to execute the resolutions of those Councils of war, where it was agreed we should march to Madrid by the way of Arragon, but first to destroy the enemy's magazines on the frontiers of Valencia, I went with the Marquis das Minas in the beginning of April to Yecla, where the enemy's chief magazines lay, and from thence to Villena, where we had advice of their troops being assembled at Almanza; upon which that Council was held, wherein the battle was unanimously resolved on.

"The Earl of Peterborough is pleased to add a reason for his opinion, That the Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene had declared their sentiments for a defensive war at that time in Spain, and had communicated their thoughts to Charles III. upon that subject, to the certain knowledge of the Earl of Peterborough, as he can make appear by authentic papers from the King of Spain. I shall not take upon me to deny a matter of fact, which his Lordship so positively affirms; but I have been credibly informed, that the Duke of Mariborough and my Lord Godolphin did, both of them, assure this most honourable House, that the true project against Toulon was not concerted by the Earl of Peterborough, Prince Eugene, and the Duke of Savoy, but first set on foot by the Duke of Mariborough with Count Moffei in Flanders, and finished in England with the Counts Maffei and Briancan; but did not require, that any troops should be sent from Spain, nor was ever communicated to the Earl of Peterborough: Which indeed his Lordship seems to be aware of, when he says not long after, That the project against Toulon, as settled by him, had been so altered, that the Duke of Savoy publicly declared his dislike of engaging in it.

"And yet it is most certain, that his Royal Highness did engage in an attempt against Toulon, pursuant to the project concerted in England. And, though that attempt did not prove entirely successful, it had a very good effect; for thereby a great body of the enemy's troops were diverted from acting elsewhere, and a considerable damage was done to the fleet and magazines of France."

The Author of the Impartial Inquiry into the management of the war in Spain, having quoted the above-cited passage from the Earl of Galway's narrative, observes, p. 238, "That hence we are informed of the true reasons, why all the Generals of the Allies unanimously resolved to fight the battle of Almanza, for which my Lord Galway and the late Ministry have been so severely censured, though his Lordship was not Commander in chief there, nor did the Ministry send him orders to fight, as has been very ridiculously suggested; for neither could they have been capable of giving, or his Lordship of obeying any such directions at that distance, unless he had thought them apparently necessary, and for the benefit of the common cause. Though the success of this action proved different from what might have been wished, it is certain the ill fate of that day cannot, with the least colour of justice, be imputed to the Earl of Galway, since it is notoriously known, both his Lordship and the troops immediately under his command, as well as the Dutch that were present, did their duty to admiration; but wanting near five thousand of the King of Spain's forces, with part of the Dutch, that had been detached, contrary to my Lord Galway's opinion, to Arragon, and being oppressed by unequal numbers, part of our army were forced to give way, and the rest to surrender prisoners of war upon honourable terms. Yet as many regiments as we lost at Almanza, and as much noise as this misfortune has made in the world, it is certain it only reduced us to a necessity of acting upon the defensive."

1707. work with the Miners. The Governor being told, from under the wall, what was doing, gave as bold an answer as he had done to the summons. There was then no thoughts of coming soon to a battle, for the Lord Galway gave leave, on the 9th, to the Queen's Royal regiment of dragoons, to go as far as Denia for their cloathing, and to refresh their horses; and ordered Brigadier Carpenter, with all the new-landed dragoons, English and Dutch, to go into quarters of refreshment above ten miles off, to try to recover their horses, which were almost dead by the fatigues of the sea, their long marches from Alicant, and the scarcity and difference of forage, having, instead of hay and oats, only straw and barley (the feed of the country) which was not thought good for the large English and Dutch horses. But the Brigadier received orders to return the very day he marched from the camp, upon an intelligence received by the Lord Galway, that the enemy had assembled all their forces, received the succours expected from France, and were marching, as they gave out, to attack us. This intelligence was brought to Lord Galway (who was so able an examiner of all French deserters, that he could not easily be imposed on) by two young French Gentlemen of a good Protestant family, who had been educated in the principles of the Reformed Religion by the care of their parents, a practice very common in France after the persecution. They told him, they had entered as Volunteers into the French service, in a regiment that was coming to Spain, in hopes of meeting with an opportunity to come over to the English. Lord Galway, after a very long conversation, was so well satisfied with the truth of what they said, that he gave full credit to their intelligence, and took his measures accordingly (1). He ordered that night a new camp to be marked out in a plain, not far from Villena, designing to meet the enemy there, if they came to attack us. But, as they did not, it was resolved to go in search of them. The whole army marched in three columns, the 13th of April, from Villena, to la Torre de Bougarres near Caudeta, with an eager expectation to meet the enemy, but none appeared. News being brought, that the enemy were near the town of Almanza, a great Council of war was held, in which it was unanimously agreed to go the next day, and give them battle. Accordingly, about three in the morning, we began to march in four columns, till we had passed the hilly country, which was computed at six long miles, and then, coming into better ground, the army formed, and marched the other three miles in order of battle. About twelve, we saw, from some rising grounds, the town of Almanza, and soon after the enemy drawn up, and ready to receive us. They began to fire very briskly with two or three batteries, and we returned their fire with one. Lord Galway, having seen the disposition of the right and of the center, came to the left, which he commanded, as general Erle did the center, and the Marquis das Minas the right. He ordered the enemy's advanced guard to be attacked by a party of a hundred dragoons, who put them to flight. Being pursued beyond their second line, they left the army, and took to the high-road with such haste upon a full gallop, that they were soon got some miles from the field of battle; and meeting with the Duke of Orleans, who was coming to take the command upon him, told him, their army was beat, and all was lost. This put the Duke upon going back till night, when he received other news. Lord Galway viewed the right of the enemy, whole

1707. whose line was extended far beyond ours, having many more squadrons than we had in our left, and sent for Count Alalaia, who commanded in the second line, to bring up all the horse (which were eleven squadrons of Portuguese) and draw them up so on our left, as far as the center, that they might prevent the enemy's flanking us. Then he commanded Carpenter's and Essex's squadrons to go and attack the battery over-against our left, which did very much gall our horse. This was instantly executed very gallantly, but with ill success. Here the battle began about two. The battery was placed upon a steep rising ground, which covered every thing behind it; so that when the two squadrons came up with it, the guns were in a moment drawn away by the mules that continued fastened to them, and eight or ten squadrons of their best horse fell upon our two with incredible fury, and cut them all to pieces. Then they and the rest of their horse attacked our English and Dutch squadrons, who maintained a very obstinate and bloody fight near two hours, but were at last overpowered by their far superior number, and so cut off, that not above four or five officers, and ten or twelve private men, were left in each squadron. The squadron of Guiscard's dragoons stood their ground the longest of any, and no wonder, for they had thirty-four Officers in their front rank, most of them veterans, who had served in all King William's wars. They had charged three times, but, when they saw their friends were gone, the standard was ordered to be secured; after which they attacked three squadrons that faced them, having the Lords Galway and Tyravoley, and Brigadier Carpenter, at their head, of whom the Commander begged, as they came separately to him, that they would be pleased to take the command of the squadron, which they all declined. So the brave old Colonel la Fabreque (whose name ought to be mentioned with honour for his courage and conduct) having these three great Volunteers with him, fell upon the three squadrons with so much intrepidity, that he routed them, and retired in good order from the field of battle with the three Generals. Lord Galway received, in this last bold attack, a cut over his eye (having before lost his right hand, with which he might have parried the blow) and with such a long sword, as wounded his Aid de Camp in the forehead at the same time.

The center, that is, the English and Dutch, were engaged all this while, and drove the enemy with great success before them. They had pushed the first line upon the second, so that, though our left was routed, we still had some hopes, in case the Portuguese horse in the right behaved well, to get the day. But our hopes were soon defeated; for, as soon as the enemy marched up to them, and some battalions gave them a fire, they all galloped away, and the foot ran into some neighbouring woods upon our right, in which flight many of them fell, tho' none were killed in charging. The Duke of Berwick, having nothing to fear from our right and left, ordered all his horse to come and sustain his foot, who had been very severely beaten by ours, during three or four hours. The Generals to prevent their being surrounded, ordered all the battalions to form themselves into a hollow square, which so well answered the design, that the enemy could gain no advantage of them, and by that means they retired from the field of battle with little or no loss, though still pursued till night parted them. And, if they could have continued their retreat a few miles farther, the enemy would have had no great reason to boast of a victory, nor would the battle of Almanza have been so much talked of, to say no worse, as it has been in this Nation. But the loss of twenty-three battalions English and Dutch was too great to be easily repaired at so great a distance. How these brave men, after having fought so gallantly for so many hours, and made so glorious a retreat, could at last come to the resolution of surrendering to an enemy that was some miles from them, and reckoned them quite out of his reach, is not so easy to be accounted for, unless their excuse be admitted, which was, that the soldiers, after marching nine hours without any refreshment, and fighting about six, could march no farther: They had spent all their ammunition, and had not so much as bread and water to refresh themselves with: They were all strangers to the country, and did not know of any place to retire to: Besides all this, they thought themselves in danger of being pursued and attacked the next morning by the enemy's whole army, against which they could not pretend to defend themselves, being abandoned by all the horse. Upon these considerations, after a long consultation, in which were very warm debates, they came to the resolution of surrendering themselves, as the French infantry had done at Blenheim, and of sending to the Duke of Berwick to desire honourable terms, which were gladly and readily granted; namely, that they should be prisoners of war, till they could be exchanged: That they should be all disarmed but the Officers, who should keep their swords: And that they should have liberty to send for their baggage, before they marched any farther.

The Duke of Berwick is said to have been astonished, and could hardly believe the Officer who brought him this welcome message, which did compleat his victory. For till then it might have been called a drawn battle, the number of the slain being reckoned very equal, our baggage safe, and only a Portuguese train of twenty field-pieces lost. But twenty-three battalions, carried prisoners into France, were marks of a triumph to all the places through which they passed. To their long and obstinate resistance, the safety of our baggage was certainly owing: for, had the enemy detached a thousand men to secure the very difficult pass of Pont de la Guiera, through which all the Portuguese horse made their escape, and the baggage after them, they must have all fallen into their hands. Two Officers of dragoons, that were taken prisoners by the fall of their horses, assured the Author of this account, that, when they were carried towards the town of Almanza, they found it in our hands, and above a thousand prisoners in it, the enemy's foot being pushed far beyond it by ours. Almanza was in the center of the field of battle, and the enemy's second line was on both sides of the town (1).

[(1) Bishop Burnet, p. 475, says, That the Confederates had about ten thousand killed or taken prisoners. Numb. 52. Vol. IV.

The next day the Portuguese horse, and part of the English, got into Xativa, with the foot that guarded the baggage; and the day after to Alcira, a very strong town on a river defended by almost inaccessible mountains. Here our broken army assembled, and Lord Galway joined it from Obinaute, with the dragoons that had secured his person and retreat (1).

From Alcira the worst of the wounded, and the baggage of the Officers killed in the battle, were sent to the grove of Valencia, to be embarked for Barcelona. Here a Trumpet arrived, with the shocking news of all our infantry having surrendered, and several letters from the Officers, with the articles and the before-mentioned apology for their conduct, which was not much relished; for a great difference was made between the French battalions at Blenheim, and ours in the neighbourhood of Almanza. The French were surrounded by a victorious army in a village, and could not pretend to fight their way through it: But ours were in the open field, without any enemy near them. However, their baggage and money were sent to them. Many of our foot lifted among the enemy, desirous to come back to us as soon as they

Among the wounded and slain, these were the most remarkable: The Lord Galway was wounded in the face: Brigadier Killigrew, being wounded in the first assault, still kept the field, and was killed in a second charge: Lieutenant-Colonel Raper (of Major-General Harvey's horse) Lieutenant-Colonel Lawrence (of Brigadier Carpenter's regiment) Lieutenant-Colonel Dorchester (of the Lord Essex's) Lieutenant-Colonel Deleches (of Colonel Pierce's) and Lieutenant-Colonel Green (of the Lord Peterborough's) were killed at the head of their respective squadrons, having behaved themselves with extraordinary resolution and undauntedness: And Colonel Pierce, and Mr. O'Hara, son of the Lord Tyravely, were wounded. Of the foot, Lieutenant Austin of the Guards, Lieutenant-Colonel Mac-Neale, (of Southwell's) Lieutenant-Colonel Woollet, and Lieutenant-Colonel Withers (of Blood's) Lieutenant-Colonel Ramsey (of Macartney's) Lieutenant-Colonel Erskin (of Lord Mark Kerr's) were among the slain; and Lord Mark Kerr was wounded in the arm, and Colonel Clayton in the body.

Father Daniel's account of the action is to this effect: The action began at three in the afternoon, and the victory stood long doubtful. The regiment of Mayne distinguished itself upon this occasion. Marshal Berwick shewed a great presence of mind, and a vast capacity in the art of war, by providing remedies wherever they were wanting, and guarding against all inconveniences. The enemy was pursued about two leagues. Thirteen battalions were made prisoners in the pursuit, besides five others, which were taken in the field of battle. Six Marshals de Camp, ten Brigadiers, twenty Colonels, and eight hundred other Officers were taken with all their artillery, and six-score colours and standards. Near five thousand men were killed on the spot, besides the wounded, which were very numerous, and, among the rest, the Lord Galway and the Marquis das Minas, General of the Portuguese. The Conquerors lost two thousand men, and, among others, the Marquis de Silly and Monsieur de Polastron, Brigadiers; and, among the wounded were the Duke of Salerno, General of the Spanish guards, who received eleven wounds with a broad sword, the Marquises de St. Clair and de Silly, Marshals de Camp: The Duke of Orleans, who was lately arrived from France, and was to have commanded the armies of the two Crowns, though he made all possible haste, after he had heard, that the two armies were not far distant from each other, could not come up till the action was over. The Marquis de Feuquieres in his Memoirs observes, that this was an action of the first species, since the two armies charged through the whole extent of their front; and that the Confederates were masters of the two entire Kingdoms of Valencia and Aragon, and of all Catalonia, and were preparing to enter New-Castile. "A few days before the battle (continues the Marquis) they had received a powerful reinforcement from England and Holland, and were determined to improve the time of the first campaign. With this intent they passed the Xucar, and advanced near Almanza. The Duke of Berwick marched up to them without the least hesitation, and the armies engaged. The Portuguese infantry being entirely broke

"in the first charge, and our cavalry having thrown "that of the enemy into disorder, we remained absolute masters of the field of battle. The Duke of Berwick likewise pursued with his cavalry thirteen "of the enemy's battalions, who were retreating in "good order through the mountains, with an intention to repass the Xucar, and retire to Valencia; "but, as the body of infantry was extremely fatigued "and destitute of bread, they were obliged to halt "before they could arrive at the Xucar. This discontinuance of their march gave our infantry time "to approach them; and they were all made prisoners of war. The recovery of the Kingdoms of " Valencia and Aragon was owing to the success of "this battle." Dr. Hare, in a letter to a Tory-Member, p. 13, fourth Edition, tells us, "That it was owing to "the reinforcement sent the Duke of Anjou after the "evacuation of Milan, that we owed the loss of the "battle of Almanza, which proved so fatal to our affairs "on that side. If these troops had not joined, we had "been superior to the enemy; and that battle had either "not been fought, or it had been won, and Spain with "it, considering the ill condition the Duke of Anjou's "affairs were then in; and the true reason we ventured that battle was to prevent the junction, which "we did not know, or, at least, did not believe, was "made at the time we fought; a mistake, we may "think, very easily made in Spain, when it is known, "we owe the victory of Ramilles to the French making the very same mistake in Flanders, where they "thought the English had not at that time joined the "Confederate army, and reckoned for certain, that "the Danes at least neither had nor could. And "this persuasion made them venture a battle, which "the French had so much reason to remember, without waiting for a considerable body of troops, that "were coming to them from the Rhine, the head of "which were actually at Namur, when Monsieur Villeroi began his march towards the Confederates. But "to return, it is plain the French had not gained the "battle of Almanza without that reinforcement from "Italy, and even with it, though the battle was fought "in April, and our army was in a manner ruined by "that blow, all they did that year was only to take "Lerida."

(1) And here (says our Author) I had the pleasure of being eased of a very troublesome burden, which had much endangered my life by the imprudence of the Officers, who had given me their purses at the head of the three squadrons; and very large they were, by the management of Earl Rivers, who, unwilling to carry the treasure back to England, had obliged the Paymasters of the regiments to take four months subsistence in advance, which, it was said, was no small perquisite to his Lordship, upon the account of the high price gold was at in Spain. When I returned their purses to the Officers, it was computed I had no less than fifteen hundred pounds about me, besides some gold watches: So that I should have been a good booty for some desperate deserter, which the owners of the money were more afraid of than myself. Manuscript account of the war in Spain, from 1706 to 1712, by a Chaplain in the army.

(1) Which

1707. they found an opportunity, which indeed hundreds of them did in a very short time, the Valencians, Aragonese, and Catalans, who were all very zealous in King Charles's interest, assisting them in their escape and march to us.

The day after the battle, the Duke of Orleans came to Almanza, and took upon him the command of the enemy's army, which, as will be related, was of some service to us. What foot we had left, remained at Alicia and Xativa, and we marched all our horse through the city of Valencia, and some other towns, as far as Tortosa. The enemy followed us, but very civilly, for they generally encamped in the evening on the ground we left in the morning, till we came to the Ebro, and marched over the bridge of Tortosa, to a camp about two miles from the City, up the river. The army did not continue here long, for, on the 11th of May, the enemy appeared on the hills, and an advanced party came down into the plain, a mile from the town, where they staid all that day in sight of our Horse-guard. The next day their whole army came down, and, having pushed in our Horse-guard, encamped in a long line over-against the town. Upon this we burnt the suburbs on that side the water, and manned a half-moon at the bridge-foot on the same side, whilst our cannon from the castle made a continual fire on their camp. The night of the 13th, they brought down some gabions and lodged themselves near our half-moon; but we made a sally and destroyed that work, which they soon replaced, and firing continued on both sides many days. There being no prospect of any succours to enable us to keep that advantageous post, the Lord Galway, after putting a good garrison into Tortosa and Gironne, and leaving the rest of the foot in Tarragona, marched up the river with the horse, and the Duke of Orleans, at the same time, ordered most of his cavalry to observe and follow us on the other side of the Ebro. We continued for three months in marches and counter-marches, observing one another's motions, our great care being to prevent the enemy passing the Cinea, which would have been of very bad consequence to us; for the country about Tarragona must have fallen into their hands, unless we were in a condition to make a vigorous stand, which we were not. But the Duke of Orleans proved a very pacific General for some time, having private views, and a very extraordinary scheme for a peace (1). Mr. Stanhope, the Queen's Envoy Extraordinary, came to our camp near the Cinea to visit the General. During his stay the Duke of Orleans sent a letter to the Lord Galway, to desire he would send two trusty persons, by whom he had some proposals of the highest nature to make to him. Mr. Stanhope was not long in suspense, but gladly accepted the offer Lord Galway made him of being one of the two, and the General's Aid de Camp was appointed for the other (2). These two Gentlemen went to the place assigned for a Conference, which lasted some hours, and was managed in such a manner, and with so much secrecy, that no one suspected any thing in either army. Lord Galway was not a little surprized at the overtures that were made, and dispatched his Aid de Camp to the Duke of Orleans, with the same answer in substance, General Stanhope had given him. This advantage we reaped from the Conference, that we lived some weeks like good neighbours, the enemy on the one side, and we on the other, of the river Cinea, and at a very small distance from one another; but not without great fatigue on both sides, for they made many motions to pass the river, which alarmed our camp, and kept us always, chiefly in the night, upon our guard, ready to mount, and our baggage to be loaded.

Brigadier Carpenter took this opportunity to have his own Squadron, Essex's and Guisard's, sent to Manresa, to refresh their horses, now almost dead, and unfit for service (3). From hence we soon marched to las Borgues, where we remained some time. About the beginning of August, the enemy detached a good number of horse and foot for France, and the Duke of Berwick quickly followed them. On the 30th of that month, they marched from Belpuis towards Lerida (having plundered several villages without sparing the Churches) and, passing the Segre, they invested the town the next day on both sides. General Wills commanded the garrison, with the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt. The Duke of Berwick returned to the army, but without any forces; and it was the 21st of September before they opened the trenches, and the 27th before they erected their batteries. Whilst the siege was carried on, all the forces, that could be drawn from all parts of Catalonia, the Lord Galway assembled at las Borgues, and encamped within a few miles of Lerida, with a resolution to attempt the relief of that place. But, before this resolution could be executed, news came that the garrison had capitulated, who marched out of Lerida, on the 2d of November, with all the marks of honour customary after a brave defence (4). In a few days, the horse went into winter-quarters, under the command of Major-General Carpenter (who had lately

(1) Which scheme (says our Author) I do not think prudent to divulge. His scheme, it is said, was to be made King of Spain himself, for which he offered very advantageous terms to England. But this is only conjecture.

(2) A man (says our Author) of tried capacity and integrity, who afterwards died Deputy-Governor of Guernsey.

(3) Manresa is a fine and rich town, in the mountains of Catalonia, famous for giving birth to Ignatius Loyala, founder of the order of Jesuits. The whole town is entirely devoted to that Saint, who had borne arms many years. The house where he was born is turned into a Nunnery, where the Inhabitants affirm, that on every Whitunday, when the Magistrates and all the religious orders in the town make a procession to that Cloyster, the Holy Ghost appears, as a white dove, and perches a good while upon the cross on the top of the Chapel. This miracle, which is managed by the Priests, is firmly believed by these poor Mountaineers, who are pleased, beyond measure, to have so remarkable a token of the divine favour to boast of above their countrymen. Manuscript account, &c.

(4) Burnet's account of this affair is as follows: The Duke of Orleans, being reinforced with troops after the design upon Toulon had miscarried, sat down before Lerida, in the end of September, with an army of thirty-thousand men: The place was commanded by a Prince of Hesse, who held out above forty days: After some time, he was forced to abandon the town, and 1707. lately received a Commission from King Charles, appointing them to that rank) and the foot under Major-General Wills marched to the City of Tarragona. The Portuguese and Dutch marched likewise into their quarters, all in Catalonia, between Lerida and Barcelona. And thus ended this long and unfortunate campaign, which had been so unsuccessful, that the principality of Catalonia was all that remained in King Charles's obedience. The Lord Galway, General Erle, and the Marquis das Minas, with three other Portuguese Generals embarked at Barcelona for Lisbon, and Carpenter remained Commander of the English.

The Allies in Spain were in hopes the Portuguese would have favoured them with a diversion, but were disappointed. For, on the contrary, the Spaniards, under the Duke of Ossuna, took Serpa and Moura, and at the same time, the Marquis de Bay possessed himself of the bridge of Olivenza, threatening, with the assistance of the Duke of Ossuna, to lay siege to that place. The Portuguese, being reinforced with four English regiments⁽¹⁾, began to move on their frontiers. Upon which the Marquis thought fit to lay aside his enterprize, and, destroying part of the bridge of Olivenza, retired to Badajoz. The Portuguese excused themselves for the little resistance, they made, by their feebleness, since their best troops were in Catalonia.

to retire into the castle; the army suffered much in this long siege. When the Besieged saw how long they could hold out, they gave the Earl of Galway notice, upon which he intended to have raised the siege; and, if the King of Spain would have consented to his drawing, out of the other garrisons, such a force as might have been spared, he undertook to raise it, which was believed might have been easily done; and, if he had succeeded, it would have given a new turn to all the affairs of Spain. But Count Noyelles, who was well practised in the arts of flattery, and knew how much King Charles was alienated from the Earl of Galway, for the honest freedom he had used with him, in laying before him some errors in his conduct, set himself to oppose this, apprehending that success in it would have raised the Earl of Galway's reputation again, which had suffered a great diminution by the action of Almanza: He said, this would expose the little army they had left them to too great a hazard, for, if the design miscarried, it might occasion a revolt of the whole principality. Thus the humours of Princes are often more regarded than their interest; the design of relieving Lerida was laid aside. The French army was diminished a fourth part, and the long siege had so fatigued them, that it was visible the raising it would have been no difficult performance, but, the thoughts of that being over, Lerida capitulated in the beginning of November.

(1) These four regiments, namely, Pearce, Newton, Sankes, and Stanwix, were embarked at Cork for Portugal, about the latter end of April, and arrived at Lisbon the 4th of June, consisting of two thousand nine hundred men. These were all the forces then in the Queen's pay in that Kingdom.

(2) The substance of which was, "1. That there should be a universal and sincere peace between the Queen of Great-Britain and the King of Spain, their Heirs, Successors, and the Subjects of both Nations. 2. That all the treaties of peace, friendship, confederacy, free commerce and navigation between both Crowns, should be held to be as firmly renewed and established, by virtue of this present treaty, as if they were inserted therein verbatim, provided they were not contradictory to one an-

Mr. Stanbope, who, besides his post of Brigadier, had also the character of Envoy Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, took the opportunity of King Charles's broken affairs, to conclude with him a treaty of commerce, which would have been of great advantage to the English Nation, had that Prince remained quiet possessor of the Spanish Throne. In order to effect this, Mr. Stanbope ingratiated himself with the Countess of Oropeza, a Lady of great wit, whose husband was one of the chief Grandees of Spain, but, who having abandoned all his great employments and vast estate, to follow King Charles's fortune, was reduced to extreme indigence; and therefore was the more liable to be managed by a Lady, for whom Mr. Stanbope had obtained a considerable present from the Queen. This Nobleman, who had the greatest weight in King Charles's Spanish Council, being gained, and appointed one of his Catholic Majesty's Plenipotentiaries, together with the Prince of Litchjenslein and Count de Cardona, Admiral of Arragon, a treaty was concluded and signed by them and Mr. Stanbope at Barcelona, on the 10th of July⁽²⁾.

After the signing of this treaty, King Charles was made sensible, that the concessions granted therein to the English Nation were too large, and such, as would not easily pass with his own subjects, in case he should ever be possessed of the Spanish Throne; and therefore it was not with ther, nor any way lessen the force of these present articles: And that the Royal Cédulas or Patents, which contain divers privileges granted by Philip the Fourth, confirmed by the treaty of May 1st 1667, and all other grants formerly made by any King of Spain, should have the same force and effect with this present treaty. 3. That all the Subjects on both sides, who had been made prisoners by either, whether in America, or any where else, should be restored, and set at liberty, as speedily as possible, without charge or ransom. 4. That all merchandise and goods, which the Subjects of Great-Britain might bring and import into the Dominions of Spain, for which any Customs under the name of Consumption, or other tolls used to be demanded, should not be obliged to pay the said tolls till six months after the unloading, or sale and delivery of the said goods. 5. That the Subjects of Great-Britain might bring and import into the Dominions of Spain all sorts of goods, wares, manufactures and fruits, the produce of the Dominions of Morocco; nor should any greater toll be demanded for the same than usual. 6. That books of rate, commonly called Pueros, containing an exact account of the customs agreed on by the Commissioners from the Queen of Great-Britain and the King of Spain, should be adjudged and established within twelve months after the signing of this treaty, and be published through all the Spanish Dominions. Nor should the British Subjects be obliged to pay any greater duties than what is therein set down; and for all other goods not mentioned in these tables, the rate of seven per cent. should be demanded upon the credit of the instrument, declaring the charge and prizes of the merchandize and goods, which should be exhibited by the Merchant or Factor, confirmed by witnesses on oath. 7. That all goods taken as prize by ships of war, set out either by the Queen or private Subjects of Great-Britain, should, without any difference, be esteemed as merchandize and goods of the produce of the British islands. 8. That the Queen of Great-Britain and the King of Spain should confirm and ratify these articles within ten weeks." To this treaty 1707. without reluctance, and merely in compliance with the necessity of his affairs, that he confirmed and ratified the articles of it on the 9th of January 1707-8, six months after they had been concluded and signed. The person, who was intrusted to carry this important treaty to London, having embarked for Barcelona on board a small vessel for Genoa, that vessel was unluckily taken by a French frigate. The Express, as is usual in such cases, threw his mail over-board; but it being taken up by some divers, was transmitted to the Marquis de Torci at Versailles, who took care to send privately a copy of the treaty to the States General, in order to excite their jealousy of the English, who were endeavouring by it to engross the trade of the West-Indies (1).

Affairs of Germany. Brodrick. The affairs of the Upper Rhine, this campaign, were attended with no greater success to the Confederates than those of Spain. For the German forces were so inconsiderable in their numbers, and so ill provided, as not to be able to stand a sudden irruption of the enemy. Marshal de Villars, who had with great diligence and secrecy assembled his army early in Alsatia, resolved to pass the Rhine, and committed the execution of his design to the Marquis de Vi-vans and the Count de Broglie. To this end, he caused a bridge of boats to be laid over an arm of the Rhine, and, having landed a great number of Grenadiers on the Island over-against Newbourg the Count de Broglie advanced to the Germans, and attacked them with considerable success. After that Marshal de Villars, May 22d, advanced to the lines of Bubl with forty squadrons and ten battalions; and in his march intirely defeated the Germans advanced guard of horse. On the 23d, at break of day, a fog made it difficult to discover whether the Germans, whose tents were standing, and who fired some cannon-shot, continued behind their intrenchments: But, as soon as it was cleared up, it appeared, that they had abandoned them, for fear of being attacked in the rear, having notice, that the whole body, commanded by the Marquis de Vivans and the Count de Broglie had passed the Rhine; so, at five in the morning, Marshal de Villars entered, without loss, those lines, which had been esteemed the rampart of Germany, and in which he found a great many pieces of cannon, and vast quantities of ammunition and provisions. The same day he advanced to Rastadt, took possession of the castle belonging to the Prince of Baden, and prepared to was annexed a secret and most important article, importing, "That the Queen of Great-Britain and the King of Spain being desirous to knit the ties of the friendship and alliance now concluded in such a manner, as that the mutual advantages of it might redound so visibly to the benefit of the Subjects of both Crowns, that their common interests might cement an eternal and indissoluble Union between them; and considering, that the most effectual and proper means to this end would be to form a Company of commerce to the Indies, whereby these vast and rich Provinces of the Dominions of his Catholic Majesty would inable the Monarchies of Great-Britain and Spain to make such dispositions of force, as should, by curbing their enemies, secure to their Subjects an universal and lasting tranquillity: It was therefore agreed, that such a Company of commerce should be formed, consisting of the subjects of Great-Britain and Spain, in the Dominions of the Crown of Spain, in the Indies. But, because it was not possible, at present, to enter into the particulars of such a settlement, because the Duke of Anjou was, at this time, possessed of those Provinces of Spain, which are the principal seats of trade, it was referred to settle the form of the said Company of commerce to the Indies, till his Catholic Majesty should be possessed of the Court of Madrid. But, in case unforeseen accidents should hinder the settlement of such a Company, his Catholic Majesty obliged himself, and promised for himself, and all the Kings, his Successors, that he would grant to the Subjects of Great-Britain the same privileges, and the same liberty of a free trade to the Indies, which his Majesty's own Spanish Subjects should enjoy; a previous security being given for the payment of the Royal duties. That his Catholic Majesty likewise obliged himself, that from the day, that the general peace should be settled, and consequently, that he should be in possession of the Spanish Indies, to the day that the said Company of commerce should be settled, he would give licence and permission, that the Subjects of Great-Britain might send every year to all the ports and other places of the Indies, under the Dominion of the Crown of Spain, ten ships, of five hundred tons each or more, or fewer ships, provided their whole burden did not exceed in all five thousand tons; in which they should be at liberty to transport, sell, and traffick for all the merchandizes and commodities, which the Spanish Subjects were permitted to transport and traffick for; provided, that they pay all the Royal duties, and that the said ten ships should be registered in the port of Cadix, or in such other port of Spain, as his Catholic Majesty should appoint, setting out from such port to sail to the Indies, and giving an obligation, that from the Indies they should return to the same port in Spain, without touching before at any other port of Spain, Great-Britain, or France, except in case of being forced to do so by storm. That his Catholic Majesty would likewise permit, that the said ten ships of trade be accompanied by such a number of British ships of war, as should be necessary for their greater protection and security, provided, that, on board the said ships of war, there might not be loaded any kind of merchandise: His Catholic Majesty declaring likewise, that he would not cause to be paid, or demand any indulto's, or any other kind of donative, on account of the trade of the said ships, contenting himself barely with the punctual satisfaction of the Royal duties. And the Queen of Great-Britain offered and promised on her part, that the said ships of war should, both in going to, and in returning from the Indies, take under their convoy such ships belonging to his Catholic Majesty, returning the same to the persons, to whom they should be consigned. That it being evident to all men, that the forces, with which the Crown of France had disturbed Europe, had been furnished and supplied by the great treasures it had drawn from the Spanish Dominions in the Indies, by the fraudulent introduction of their commodities, and their trade in those Countries; it was therefore agreed, that from this time forward, for ever, all Frenchmen, being Subjects of France, should be intirely excluded, as well out of the said Company of commerce, as out of all other kind of trade, within the Dominions of the King of Spain, obliging themselves never to consent, by any treaty, public or private, to any matter, which should be repugnant to this exclusion of the subjects of France."

(1) Dr. Swift means this treaty in his Conduct of the Allies and of the late Ministry, p. 38, fifth Edition, in the following passage: "Our trade with Spain was referred the same way: But this they will pretend to be of no consequence, because that Kingdom was to be under the House of Austria; and we had already made a treaty with King Charles. to follow the Germans with all possible expedition. The Marshal having proceeded successfully thus far, continued four days at Radstadt, waiting for his waggons and artillery, and to give necessary directions; and, on the 28th, marched with his main army, and incamped at Erlingen, where he found a considerable quantity of provisions. The same day, the Marquis de Vivans, whom the Marshal had sent out with fifteen hundred horse on the road of Pfortzheim, having information, that a body of German horse were coming towards him, advanced to meet them, who, at his approach, posted themselves behind a rivulet; but he charged them so vigorously, that they were broke and intirely defeated, a hundred and fifty of them being killed, eighty made prisoners, particularly a Major of Count Merc's regiment, who commanded them, and Count de Berlo, together with all their officers, and above a hundred and fifty horses were taken. The Germans not being able to stand their ground, Marshal de Villars advanced to Pfortzheim, and there halted to wait for a convoy of bread and meal from fort Louis; and, on the 31st, marched before with the horse of the right wing, and all the dragoons, to follow the Germans, and observe their motions; and, on the first of June, advanced within two leagues of Stutgard, where he made and had his own demands. The contributions of the Duchy of Wirtemberg were regulated, at two millions and two hundred thousand livres, payable in three months; those of the little Imperial City of Erlingen on the Neckar, at one million and one hundred thousand, and six hundred thousand livres were demanded of the City of Baden. In Stutgard they found a magazine of four thousand Sacks of meal, besides ten thousand furnished by the Regency; and Marshal de Villars, not being able to come up with the flying enemy, marched towards Schorndorf, which he caused to be invested by the Marquis de Fremont. The next day, the Marshal came before the place with his whole army; but though the town was pretty strong, both by its fortifications and advantageous situation; yet, the inhabitants refusing to assist in the defence of it, the garrison, to the number of about five hundred men, surrendered the place, upon condition of their being conducted to the Imperial army. The French found in the place two mortars, fifty-four pieces of cannon, and a considerable quantity of ammunition and provisions. After this success, the Marshal being informed, that three thousand Germans, commanded by General Janus, had intrenched themselves near Lorch, very advantageously, he attacked, and totally defeated them. Janus made a brave resistance; but, being overpowered, his troops were broke, and pursued almost as far as Gemund, with the loss of about six hundred men killed, and as many taken prisoners, and among the latter General Janus himself, and twenty-seven Officers. shal afterwards did some execution on the rear of the Imperial army, who thought it proper to retire towards Hailbron.

The Marshal de Villars had certainly greater designs in view, no less than restoring the Elector of Bavaria to his Dominions. But, having been obliged to send considerable detachments towards Provence in France, he durst not venture further, nor undertake any considerable siege. While the Empire was thus expoled, all men's eyes turned toward the Elector of Hanover, as the only person that could recover their affairs out of those extremities, into which they were brought. The Emperor pressed him to accept of the supreme command. This was seconded by all the Allies, but most earnestly by the Queen and the States. The Elector used all the precaution that the embarking in such an affair required, and he had such assurances of assistance, from the Princes and Circles, as he thought might be depended upon; so he undertook the command. His first care was to restore military discipline, which had been very little considered or submitted to for some years past; and he established it with such impartial severity, that the face of affairs was soon changed. But the army was too weak, and the season too far spent to enter on great designs. One considerable action happened, which very much raised the reputation of his conduct. Being informed, that the French had seven regiments of horse and dragoons incamped near Offenburg, under the command of the Marquis de Vivans, he detached fourteen hundred men, and one hundred grenadiers under Count Merc, to surprize the enemy. That General executed his orders with great conduct; and attacked the Marquis, Sept. 24, by break of day, and intirely defeated them, killing several Officers, and eight hundred private men. As the French knew nothing of the march of the Germans, they had appointed that day for a forage, which facilitated their defeat. The General made his escape with no small difficulty, and his men finding themselves closely pursued, quitted their horses, and made their retreat through the hedges; so that the Germans brought away four standards, a hundred and fifty prisoners, and near thirteen hundred horses, having had only two Lieutenants and thirty private men killed. Soon after, Marshal de Villars took the opportunity to repass the Rhine, by the way of fort Louis and fort Kebl; and the Elector of Hanover separated his army, and disposed them so conveniently in their winter-quarters, that they might assemble in forty eight hours upon any emergent occasion.

The Duke of Marlborough, who had made so glorious a campaign the last summer, merited this year the public attention, chiefly by his important negotiations. Upon his arrival at the Hague, he had a Conference with the Deputies of the States-General, wherein, among other particulars, he told them, "That the troubles of

"have indeed heard of a treaty made by Mr. Stanhope that Prince for settling our commerce with Spain. But, whatever it were, there was another between us and Holland, which went hand in hand with it, I mean that of Barrier, wherein a clause was inserted, by which all advantages propo"sed for Britain are to be in common with Holland." The Doctor's assertion in this passage is a very groundless one; for the treaty of commerce with Spain and the Barrier treaty could not go hand in hand, since the former was signed on the 10th of July 1707, and the other on the 29th of October 1709.

1707. "Saxony occasioning a great distraction in the Empire, which brought infinite prejudice to the common cause; the Queen, his Mistress, had thought fit to fend him thither, to pay a compliment to the King of Sweden, and endeavour to engage him to remove the just jealousies, which his long stay in the heart of Germany gave to some of the high Allies, for which purpose he had the necessary powers from her Majesty, and desired the same from the States." The Pensionary having acquainted the States of Holland and West-Friseland with the necessity of the Duke of Marlborough's journey, the matter was thought of so great importance to the common cause, that they readily concurred in those measures, and the Duke immediately set out for Leipzig by the way of Hanover. Monsieur Auverquerque, Velt-Marshall of the States forces, having had several Conferences with the Duke of Marlborough, set out the same day for Brussels, in order to assemble the Confederate troops, and observe the French, who began to be in motion about Namur.

Character
King of Sweden.
Burnet.

The Court of England, it seems, had been advised by the Elector of Hanover to send the Duke of Marlborough to the King of Sweden. It was thought this would please him much, if it had no other effect. That King still remained with his army in Saxony, to the great oppression of that Country, and to the terror of the Court of Vienna, who were apprehensive of his quarrelling with them. His designs were kept so secret, that they could not be penetrated, which made the Allies very uneasy. The King of Sweden was very remarkable on many accounts. He affected a neglect of his person, both in cloaths, lodging and diet; all was simple, even to meanness; nay, he did not so much as allow a decent cleanliness: He appeared to have a real sense of Religion, and a zeal for it, but it was not much enlightened: He seemed to have no notion of public liberty; but thought Princes ought to keep their promises religiously, and to 1707. observe their treaties punctually: He rendered himself very acceptable to his army, by coming so near their way of living, and by his readiness to expose his own person, and to reward services done him: He had little tenderness in his nature, and was a fierce enemy, too rough and too savage: he looked on foreign Ministers as spies by their character, and treated them accordingly; for he kept himself on great reserves with them, nor would he suffer them to come near him, except when they had a particular message to deliver. He used his own Ministers rather as instruments to execute his orders, than as Counsellors.

Whilst the King of Sweden was in Saxony, the Czar over-ran Poland, so that King Stanislaus was forced to fly into Saxony to the King of Sweden, for protection. Both he and his Queen staid there all the winter of 1706, and a great part of this summer. The Czar pressed the Poles to proceed to the election of another King, but could not prevail with them. It was therefore generally believed, that they were resolved to come to a treaty with King Stanislaus, and to settle the quiet of the Kingdom, exhausted by a long and destructive war. The Czar tried, if it were possible to come to a peace with the King of Sweden, and made great offers to that purpose; but that King was implacable, and seemed resolved to pull him down as he had done King Augustus.

To discover this King's intentions was the Robin-son's letter chief aim of the Duke of Marlborough's journey to Alt-Ransbad, about two German leagues from Leipzig, where the King of Sweden had his head-quarters. The Duke was accompanied by Mr. Robinson, the Queen's Envoy Extraordinary, and Monsieur Cronenburg, the Dutch Minister. Being informed on the way, that the King could not give him an audience till the next day, the Duke thought fit to go directly to Count Piper's quarters (1). The Count made ample protestations, how acceptable his coming would

(1) This is the account of Mr. Robinson, afterwards Bishop of London, in his letter from Leipzig, of May 1707, to the Earl of Manchester. But Mons. Voltaire, in his Life of Charles XII. King of Sweden, affirms, "That, as soon as the Duke of Marlborough arrived at Leipzig, where King Charles then was, he made his application privately, not to Count Piper, the first Minister, but to Baron Gortz, who began to have a share in the King's confidence with Count Piper. He told Gortz, that the design of the Allies was, in a short time, to propose to the King of Sweden his being once more Mediator between them and France. His motives for this were his hopes of discovering the King's intentions by Gortz's answer, and because he would much rather have had Charles for an Arbitrator, than an enemy." Mr. Lediard, in his Life of the Duke of Marlborough, Vol. I. p. 457. second Edition, observes, That this piece of private History of Monsieur Voltaire's is mentioned by no other Historian, and seems very improbable. "I was, says he, that night in the City of Leipzig, and the next morning in the camp; but no such thing ever came to my knowledge. Is it probable, that so remarkable an incident should escape the knowledge of every one, but Monsieur Voltaire's Informant? Were not the eyes of every one on the Duke at his arrival? Could this interview be so privately managed, as not to come to Count Piper's knowledge? Would not this have raised a jealousy in him, that must have put a stop

"to, or very much intangled, the whole negotiation? And can it be believed, that so great a Statesman, as the Duke was, would have thrown such a stumbling-block in his own way, as this would have been, at the very beginning of his treaty? Baron Gortz began indeed at this time to rise in the King's esteem and confidence; but he was not yet arrived to that height in his favour to be a rival to Piper, or to dare to enter into a secret negotiation without his knowledge." Monsiur de la Motraye, in his Remarks on Voltaire, carries the matter yet farther against that Writer, and says, "That Gortz was out of the question, he being then Grand-Marshal of the Bishop of Lubeck, Administrator of the Duchy of Holstein, and was certainly then very little known to the King of Sweden." But it is evident from Mr. Robinson's letter to the Earl of Manchester above-cited, that the Duke had a Conference, on the 28th in the afternoon, with Baron Gortz, as well as with Count Piper; though he limits that Conference with the Baron to the affairs of Holstein, in which, he says, things were concerted to mutual content. Monsiur de la Motraye mentions a remarkable incident upon the authority of a Gentleman, who was in the coach with the Duke, when he went to the audience he had demanded of Count Piper: "The Duke, says he, coming to the gate of Count Piper's quarters precisely at the time appointed, sent in his message, but was answered the Count was busy. The Duke waited a good half hour before he came down;

would be to the King, his Master, and appointed eleven of the clock the next morning for his repairing to the head-quarters, when his Majesty came from Church. The Duke went thence to the quarters prepared for him about an English mile and a half from the King's; and the next morning, at the time appointed, went to wait upon his Majesty. The Intendant of the Court and other Officers received him, and in the Anti-chamber Count Piper, who conducted him into the Cabinet, where the King was, with several Senators, Generals, and other Officers about him. The Duke made a short compliment in English (1), which was interpreted by Mr. Robinson, as the King's answer was by Count Piper (2). Afterwards the Duke spoke in French, which the King understood, but did not speak; and the conversation was general for about an hour, when his Majesty took the Duke with him to dinner, placing him on his right hand, and Count Piper on his left. After dinner the Duke returned with the King to the audience-room, which, after a little while, was voided by the rest of the Company; and then the Duke spoke at large, his Majesty giving great attention to what was said, with all appearances of much content. Count Piper, who, together with Mr. Harmelin, staid with the King, could not refrain from shedding some tears at the very pathetic expressions, which the Duke used to assure the King of her Majesty's friendship, and, on the King's part, made suitable returns (3). Those discourses, and others about military matters, took up an hour and a half, when his Majesty went again to Church. Afterwards the Duke made a visit to the Countess Piper, and had then a conference with the Count, and from thence went to see the Veldt-Marshal Reinsfeld's Lady. On the 28th he went to Leipsick, to wait on King Augustus, with whom he had a private Conference of about half an hour, and then returned to Count Piper's quarters, where he dined. He had that afternoon a Conference with Count Piper and Baron Gortz about the affairs of Holstein, in which things were concerted to mutual consent. In the evening he supped with Veldt-Marshal Reinsfeld. On the 29th he was visited by Count Piper, Veldt-Marshal Ogilvy, and many others; and, after having dined with Baron Gortz, had his audience of leave of the King of Sweden. Before it was ended, notice was given, that King Stanislaus was in the Anti chamber; whereupon the Duke saying, that he had no objection against his coming in, the King of Sweden went and brought him. Some civilities passed between that King and the Duke, who soon after took his leave, and went to Leipsick, and thence, without making any stay, proceeded on his journey to Berlin. On the 30th of April, he arrived at Charlottenburg, the King of Prussia having sent Monsieur Grumkew to desire him to pass that way. He supped that night with the King, and was lodged in the apartment belonging to the Margrave. The next day, being Sunday, he accompanied the King to Divine Service, and Monsieur Lenfant, the Author of the Histories of the Councils of Basil and Constance, by his Majesty's particular order, preached in French on that occasion. On the 2d of May the Duke left Charlottenburg, in order to proceed towards Hanover, where he arrived on the 3d; and, the day following, had a private Conference with the Elector. In the afternoon he set out for the Hague, where he arrived on the 8th, having received the highest marks of honour and esteem in the several Courts, through which he had passed since his departure from thence.

The next day, the Duke was in Conference with the Deputies of the States-General, to whom

"but he no sooner saw him at the gate ready to receive him, than he came out of his coach, and, putting on his hat, passed by the Count without saluting him, and went aside, as if to make water; and then, after having made him wait longer than was necessary for that purpose, he went up to him, and addressed him with that eloquence and politeness, which every one knows was natural to him."

(1) This is Mr. Robinson's own account, who was present, and interpreted it; and therefore Mr. Boyer is mistaken in asserting, that the Duke made his compliment in French. Lamberti, Vol. IV, p. 434, says, that it was in English, and to this purpose:

S I R,

"I present to your Majesty a letter, not from the Chancery, but from the heart of the Queen, my Mistress, and written with her own hand. Had not her sex prevented her from taking so long a journey, she would have crossed the sea, to see a Prince admired by the whole universe. I esteem myself happy in having the honour of assuring your Majesty of my regard; and I should think it a great happiness, if my affairs would allow me to learn under so great a General as your Majesty what I want to know in the art of war."

(2) It was, according to Lamberti, to this effect:

"The Queen of Great-Britain's letter and your person are both very acceptable to me; and I shall always have the utmost regard for the interposition of her Majesty of Great-Britain, and the interests

"of the Grand Alliance. It is likewise much against my will, that I have been obliged to give the least umbrage to any of the parties engaged in it: But your Excellency cannot but be convinced, that I had just cause to come into this country with my troops. On the other hand, you may assure the Queen, my sister, that my design is to depart from hence as soon as I have obtained the satisfaction I have demanded, but not sooner. However I shall do nothing, that can tend to the prejudice of the common cause in general, or to the Protestant Religion in particular, of which I shall always glory to be a zealous Protector."

Monsieur de Limiers, in his Life of Lewis XIV., tells us, that the King of Sweden added, "That he was not accountable to any one for his actions; and that he would discover his designs, when he should think proper." This indeed agrees pretty well with the King's general character, but his whole deportment to the Duke seems to be a contradiction to it.

(3) Monsieur Voltaire says, "That the Duke, who was never hasty in making proposals, and had learned by a long experience the art of penetrating into the minds of men, as well as of diving into the secret connexion between their inmost thoughts and their actions, gestures, and discourse, fixed his eyes attentively upon the King. When he spoke to him of the war in general, he imagined, that he saw in his Majesty a natural aversion towards France, and that he took a secret pleasure in speaking of the conquests of the Allies. He mentioned the Czar to him, and took notice, that his eyes kindled whenever he was named, notwithstanding the moderation

1707. whom he communicated the assurances he had received from the King of Sweden. This entirely dissipated the jealousies, which some of the Allies had conceived of his Swedish Majesty's designs, which were industriously fomented by the emissaries of France, who, on the other hand, used all their endeavours to engage that King in an open rupture with the Emperor; for which he did not want plausible pretences. For, about this time, an unlucky quarrel happened between Baron Strahlenheim, Envoy of Sweden, and Count Zbor, an Hungarian Lord, son-in-law of Prince Adam of Litchenstein. The occasion was this: Being both at dinner at the Count de la Tour's, and discoursing of the affairs of Europe, Count Zbor said, Three Knaves occasioned a great deal of mischief in the World. He named indeed only Prince Ragotzki for one, and King Stanislaus for another, but he made use of such expressions, as evidently shewed, that he meant the King of Sweden for the third: Upon which the Swedish Envoy thought himself in honour obliged to give him a box on the ear. The company prevented any farther mischief at that time, and Count Zbor was at first confined by order of the Emperor, and shortly after sent prisoner to the castle of Gratz in Stiria; the Commissaries appointed to make enquiry into that affair, having reported, that he had been guilty of disrespect towards the King of Prussia. Baron Strahlenheim having informed the King, his Master, of what had passed, his Swedish Majesty ordered him to declare, that he approved his conduct; and that he had orders to absent himself from Court, till he had received a just satisfaction, as well on that account, as for the affront offered to some Officers of his troops, who, being listing men at Breslau, were insulted by the people. The Imperial Ministers shewed a willingness, at this critical juncture, to give the King of Sweden all reasonable satisfaction: But, with regard to Count Zbor, they thought, that, Baron Strahlenheim having given a blow to a person of his quality, and his Imperial Majesty having since confined him close prisoner, the Swedish Court ought not to insist upon farther satisfaction.

This was not, however, the most material point, that made the Court of Vienna uneasy; for the Swedes had started other pretensions of a more delicate nature; and, in a declaration, which Count Piper had communicated to Count Zinzendorf, his Swedish Majesty insisting on the delivering up of the Muscovite troops, which, when they escaped the year before out of Saxony, were entertained in the Imperial army on the Upper Rhine. These troops being informed, what was in agitation in regard to them, disbanded themselves, and marched off, in parties of about twenty, through Bohemia and Moravia into Poland. This so exasperated the King of Sweden, that he renewed and strenuously insisted upon his Demand of the surrender of those troops; adding, that he expected a more ample satisfaction, as well for the affront offered to Baron Strahlenheim, as for the recruits which were raised for him in Silesia, and had been taken from his Officers at Breslau. The very day that these demands, which were made to Count Zinzendorf, were communicated by him to the Imperial Court, Baron Strahlenheim received orders from the King, his Master, to repair to him, without taking leave of that Court. He was prevailed upon to stay four days, that he might carry with him the Emperor's answer to his Master's demands; but that answer not being then ready, he left Vienna, and set out for Saxony. Two days after, the answer was, however, sent, and imported, in substance, "That the Emperor could not deliver up the Muscovites, they not being in his power: That Count Zbor should be prosecuted as a criminal in the course of law; and, as for what had happened in Silesia, with respect to the levies for his Swedish Majesty, sufficient satisfaction should be made, after due examination into the matter of fact." To give further satisfaction to his Swedish Majesty, the Imperial Court soon after declared, that some troops had been detached in pursuit of the Muscovites, in order to their being delivered up to the King of Sweden, but had not been able to overtake them; and, farther, solemnly averred, that the Muscovites made their escape from the Rhine, without their connivance or participation. This declaration was, however, contradicted by Baron Strahlenheim, who in his way from Vienna to Saxony, meeting some of those troops, and pretending to be Count Wackerbaert, a General in the service of King Augustus, they frankly owned, that their escape was concerted with the Imperial Court. This, being entirely believed by the King of Sweden,

"tion of the Conference. He moreover remarked, that the King had a map of Muscovy lying before him on the table. This was sufficient to determine him in his judgment, that the King of Sweden's real design and sole ambition were to dethrone the Czar, as he had already done the King of Poland. He found that he had no other views by remaining in Saxony, than, by that means, to impose some hard terms on the Emperor of Germany. He knew his Imperial Majesty would comply, and that thus matters would be easily brought to a conclusion. The Duke left Charles XII. to his natural Inclination; and, being satisfied with having discovered his intentions, he made him no proposal." Monsieur de la Motraye, in his remarks upon this passage of Monsieur Voltaire, says, "I never heard these circumstances mentioned; nor do I know it was ever surmised, that the Duke, by a bare view of the map of Muscovy lying before the King of Sweden, penetrated into the real design of that Monarch, which you yourself afterwards own the Swedes them"selves were ignorant of, even when they were actually on their march." In answer to which Monsieur Voltaire refers to Monsieur Fabricius as his Author, and an eye-witness. Monsieur de la Motraye adds: "I had the honour to be frequently in the presence of Charles XII. during his sojourning at Bender; but I never knew him shew any aversion towards France. On the contrary, he always employed Frenchmen in his army preferably to all other Foreigners, and could not conceal his concern for them, when he heard of their Losses. I never knew a Swedish Officer, but what wished well to France; and I never heard any complaints, but only that France had forsaken them in their misfortunes, and had never paid one penny of the subsidies stipulated between them after the battle of Pultowa." To this Monsieur Voltaire answers; "Cabinet Messengers are admitted to the presence of their Sovereigns, and are the Bearers of their secret Councils, and yet are never the better informed of them."

1707. Sweden, irritated him the more, and made him insist peremptorily upon full satisfaction, with regard to all the three points, before he left Saxony. The Emperor dreading the consequences of a rupture with the Swedes, who might easily have over-run his hereditary countries; and having nominated Count Wratisslaw to go to the King of Sweden, to adjust all differences, that Nobleman wrote to Count Piper, to know whether he should meet with a favourable reception. But Count Piper let him know, "That, if he came with power to give his Master real satisfaction, he would be welcome; but that, if he only came to enter into a discussion of his Swedish Majesty's pretensions, he might save himself the trouble of that journey." Upon this, the Imperial Court sent orders to Count Zinzendorf to urge Count Piper to declare, what satisfaction his Master insisted upon, since he refused to allow his Minister to discuss it, and to assure him, that the Emperor was ready to refer the controverted points to the arbitration of the Queen of Great-Britain (1). Her Majesty wrote likewise to the King of Sweden, to exhort him to forbear all hostilities; but his answer was, "That, seeing the Emperor did not give him the satisfaction he expected, he should be obliged to take it, since his delaying to do himself justice had encouraged people to offer him new affronts." Which last expression related to the escape of the Muscovites. The Imperial Court not only complied with the King of Sweden's demands, as to the delivering up both Count Zabor, and the Imperial Officers, who hindered the raising of the Swedish levies in Silesia, as preliminaries to the admission of Count Wratisslaw as Envoy from the Emperor; but declared likewise, that the City of Breslau should pay four thousand crowns to the widow of a Swedish Corporal, who was killed in that City, in a scuffle, occasioned by the seizure of those levies. But this forced compliance did not fully satisfy the King of Sweden, who, upon Count Wratisslaw's arrival at Alt-Ransbach, refused to admit him to his audience. This Minister was therefore obliged to content himself with conferring with Count Piper and Monsieur Hermelin, concerning the escape of the Muscovites, which the Imperial Court now thought was the only important point, that remained unadjusted. But they were deceived.

It seems the Protestants in Silesia had their Churches, and the free exercise of their Religion, stipulated to them by the treaty of Munster, 1707. and the Crown of Sweden was the Guarantee for the observation of this article. Now, these Churches being taken from them, the King of Sweden, upon their application, very readily embraced the opportunity which had been long neglected or forgotten by his father, to restore them to their just rights and privileges. To this end, having sent four regiments of Swedish horse into that Country, he multiplied his demands into the following articles: "I. That the Emperor should give it under his hand, that he knew nothing of the march of the one thousand two hundred Muscovites, who escaped through the Hereditary Countries. II. That he should forthwith decide the affair of the election of Lubeck in favour of the Duke Administrator of Holslein, and confirm the agreement between that House and the Chapter for the two next Generations. III. That the Country of Hadeln, on the river Elbe, be sequestered into the hands of his Swedish Majesty, till the right of all the Pretenders to it be decided. IV. That the Protestant Religion in Silesia be restored according to the treaty of Westphalia. V. That his Imperial Majesty should renounce all pretences to the quora which the King of Sweden had not furnished towards the present war, and should draw no consequences from the Crown of Sweden's not having done homage for the Dominions they have in the Empire, since the year 1664. VI. That the whole Swedish army, in their return through Silesia into Poland, should be maintained at the Emperor's charge." There were about the same time certain other articles handed about privately in Holland, which, it was insinuated, the King of Sweden designed to propose to the diet, the chief of which were: "1. That the Elector of Bavaria should be restored, or, at least, his Electorate given to the King of Sweden, and he be declared Elector in his room, as being his nearest relation. 2. That, for the future, the Election of Emperor should be alternately out of the three Religions, since the Electoral College was composed of them. 3. That the Protestant Churches should be re-established in Silesia, Moravia, Bohemia, Hungaria, &c. on the same foot they were on at the time of his great Predecessor, Gustavus Adolphus. 4. That the King of Sweden should have the Sovereignty of the City of Bremen." These articles were probably forged in France; but, with

(1) This is confirmed by the following passage, in a letter of the Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Sunderland from Vienna, May 14, 1707, printed in Mr. Cole's Memoirs of affairs of State, p. 447.

"The Ministers (says Lord Manchester) have spoke to me of the proceedings of the King of Sweden towards this Court. This Envoy has again renewed with strong expressions his demands of having the Muscovites delivered to him by the Emperor, and satisfaction for what has passed between the Count Zabor and his Minister, which he carries so high, as to make it a capital crime, as also reparation in the matter of Breslau; and, in case he has not immediate satisfaction, he has orders to go away. These things make them very uneasy here, they lying so exposed. All this he has done within these few days; and since the Duke of Marlborough has been in Saxony, which they hoped had made all things easy. I believe, they have not yet determined what measures to take; but I believe they have wrote this whole matter to England, and I cannot tell whether it will not stop the detachment for Naples, though by this time it should be marched. I do believe, that they wrote this whole matter to England, to be laid before the Queen; and I hear they have also sent an express to Holland. I wish it may not be the occasion of recalling some troops out of Italy for their own preservation." Here the Earl of Manchester seems doubtful, whether the Duke of Marlborough had been so effectually successful, as had been hoped; but the Earl of Sunderland, in a letter to his Lordship from Whitehall, May 6, 1707, says, "Lord Marlborough has, I hope, left matters with the King of Sweden in as good a way as one could expect, which will be a great ease on that side."

1707. with regard to the other six articles, they occasioned several Conferences between Count Wraisslaw and Count Piper; and the former, being convinced of the necessity of preventing a rupture, which would have proved fatal to the common cause, passed over several formalities, and granted some points, which, at any other time, would have been rejected by the Court of Vienna. The confirmation of the treaty between the Chapter of Lubeck and the Ducal House of Gothorp in the year, 1647, and the restoration of the exercise of the Protestant Religion in Silesia, were the two articles of hardest digestion with the Imperial Court, and therefore met with the greatest difficulty. The Swedes insisted, that they should be allowed to keep some troops in Silesia, till the Churches of the Protestants should be rebuilt, which the Imperial Court would not agree to; and, on the other hand, they refused to approve and ratify the treaty about the Bishoprick of Lubeck, till that affair was fully examined. But the Guaranty of the Queen of Great-Britain and the States-General removed all obstacles, and on the 1st of September, N. S. all matters were agreed upon.

The next day the King of Sweden decamped very early from his quarters at Alt-Ranstadt, and Count Wraisslaw, having waited upon him, the treaty was signed at Wolkwitz that very day; and the Imperial Minister set out on the 3d, for Vienna to have the agreement ratified.

King Augustus being indisposed, the King of Sweden went to Dresden, and made him a visit, with whom he had a long Conference. His Swedish Majesty, being returned to his army, continued his march for Silesia, where the Imperial ratifications of the Convention, signed by Count Wraisslaw, were delivered to him. That Prince was so well pleased with the dispatch used at the Imperial Court in this affair, that he resolved to quit Silesia immediately, and march into Poland, so that all his forces were on the other side of the Oder before the 25th of September. However, his Swedish Majesty left the Baron de Strahlenheim in Silesia to see the execution of the treaty; and, before his departure from Leibnitz, he had the satisfaction to see several Churches restored to the Protestants, which was no small mortification to the Jesuits and Popish Priests, who made great opposition to the performance of what had been stipulated; but the Imperial Court would not provoke a Prince who they thought was seeking a colour to break with them. It is observable, that the Bishop of Breslau, fearing the resentment of the Pope, took a pretence to absent himself from that City, to avoid signing the orders given for restoring the Protestants to their former rights. But the King of Sweden, being displeased with that Prelate on this account, signified, that he expected, that he should sign and approve those orders; which formality he thought necessary, because the Bishop of Breslau is the chief person in the Regency of Silesia next to the Emperor; and therefore his refusing to subscribe the orders might afterwards have been drawn into ill consequence against the Protestants. As for Count Zobor, whom the King of Sweden had sent prisoner to Stetin, he was upon his humble submission set at liberty with great marks of generosity. Upon these proceedings the King of Sweden was highly magnified, and great endeavours were again used to engage him in the Alliance; but he was so set against the Czar, whom he designed to dethrone, that nothing could divert him from it.

To return to the Duke of Marlborough. He arrived at Brussels the 13th of May, N. S. and having immediately held a Council of war with Monsieur Auverquerque and the Field-deputies of the States, orders were sent to the Confederate troops to march to their rendezvous at Anderlach near Brussels; from whence they moved to Billigen and Lembeck. Upon Intelligence, that the Elector of Bavaria and the Duke of Vendosme, who commanded the French army, were come out of their lines, the Allies marched to Soignies, with a design to engage them in the plain of Flerus: But being further informed, that the enemy were much superior in number, and had drained all their garrisons, with a design to plunder the rich open cities of Brabant, in case the Allies should undertake any siege; the Confederate Generals marched back from Soignies towards Brussels, and posted themselves at Meldert. At the same time, the French advanced to Gemblours; and so both armies continued above two months in their respective camps. At length, upon certain advice, that the French had detached thirteen battalions and twelve squadrons from their army towards Provence, the Duke of Marlborough, in concert with Monsieur Auverquerque and the Deputies of the States, resolved to march from Meldert towards Genap, in order to attack the enemy with less disadvantage, in their fortified camp at Gemblours. Accordingly, the disposition was made for the army to pass the Zeule at the Abbey of Florival; which being done, they marched towards Genap, where they incamped with their right at Promettes, and their left at Davieres. Here they had intelligence, that the enemy no sooner received advice, that the army of the Allies was in motion, than they were extremely alarmed, and immediately ordered their troops to their arms. They likewise cut down several trees in the roads and passages, which led to their camp, and, having got certain information which way the Allies were moving, they began their march with all imaginable precipitation towards Flerus and Hespenay, intending to be that evening at Gosseliers, and take possession of the strong camp at Pieton. The Confederate Generals received advice, that the French army had made but a short halt at Gosseliers, and were advanced to Senéff, the Elector of Bavaria having taken his head-quarters in the castle of Vanderbeck, and the Duke of Vendosme in the farm-house of Rel, between Vanderbeck and Senéff, with the river Pieton before them. The Duke of Marlborough and Monsieur Auverquerque having conferred together, it was resolved to march directly to Nivelle, and attack the enemy; but, coming too late to attack them that day, and having reason to believe, that they would attempt to retire in the night, in order to gain the camp at Cambion, all possible diligence was used to prevent their effecting it. To this end, Count Tilly, with forty squadrons of horse and dragoons, which were commanded, under him, by the Earl of Albermarle, and the Major-Generals Count d' Erbach and Rofs, and a detachment of between five and six thousand grenadiers, commanded by Lieutenant-General Scholten and Major-General Zoutland, was ordered to post himself between the two armies; and,

and, in case the enemy decamped, to fall upon their rear, and keep them in play, till the whole army should come up. These troops, notwithstanding they marched with all possible dispatch, could not reach their posts before midnight. The French, in the mean time, foreseeing what was the Duke of Marlbrough's design, and perceiving, that it would not be possible for them to avoid an engagement, if they continued in their camp till the morning, resolved to decamp in the night, and Count Tilly, advancing before break of day with his detachment, saw their army in full march, making their retreat in very good order from hedge to hedge, and observed the country to be so difficult, that it would be next to impossible to come at them. He gave immediate notice of this to the Duke of Marlbrough, and informed him, that he was marching to endeavour to attack their rear, according to his orders. Upon this the Duke detached twenty battalions, and thirty squadrons, under the command of General Count Lottum, to support Count Tilly; the horse being commanded by Lieutenant-General Doppf, the Sieur Schwelburg, and the Earl of Athlone, Major-Generals; and the foot by Lieutenant-General Eagel, and Major-General Welderem. Count Tilly marched with all possible speed, and had several skirmishes with the enemy's rear; but, having pursued them three or four hours, as far as the plains of Marimont, and observing, that it was to no purpose to fatigue the troops, he returned to the camp. The country was cut by many deep roads, which very much favoured the enemy's retreat; for there they posted some of their infantry, which hindered the Confederate horse from making openings to follow them. The Duke of Marlbrough, who was advanced with a detachment, being returned to the camp, resolved to remain there that day, to give the troops some repose, after the fatiguing march they had made; and, because he was under an uncertainty, whether the enemy marched towards their lines, or to Cambren, Monsieur Auverquerque sent one of his Aids de Camp, with one hundred and fifty Hussars, to post himself on the hills of the Great-Roulx, from whence they discovered the enemy's march at about half a league's distance. That Officer reported, that the Vanguard was advanced to St. Dennis, having the river Haisne behind them; which was confirmed by the spies, who added, that the Elector of Bavaria had his quarters at St. Dennis, and the Duke of Vendome at Caslieux. From this march the Generals concluded, that the enemy did not design to retire within their lines, but rather to possess the advantageous camp at Cambren: Upon which the Confederate army decamped from Nivelle; but, having the whole day a very violent rain, which made the roads almost unpassable, it was very late, when the right came to Soignies, and the left could not come up till the next morning, though a thousand pioneers had been three days at work to repair the road from Arquennes to Soignies. The Confederate army suffered very much in this march, but the enemy laboured under much greater difficulties; for, having lain on their arms at St. Dennis all night, they pursued their march early the next morning with great precipitation, and in the same confusion as before, to Chievres, where they arrived at the same time the Confederates came to Soignies. This hasty retreat, besides the fatigue, occasioned a very great desertion among the French; for, their soldiers having been without bread for more than two days, and without rest for three, not having time to put up their tents between Senef and Chievres, about a thousand of them went over to the Confederate camp, and as many more at least to Brussels and other places. The enemy was, besides, in want of all sorts of necessaries, during their whole march from Gemblours, their baggage being sent away from thence, with their artillery to Charleroy, upon the first motion of their army to avoid an engagement.

The great rains, which continued for some days, having rendered the ways wholly unpassable, obliged the Duke of Marlbrough to give over the pursuit of the enemy, and detained the Confederate army in the camp at Soignies. The enemy, in the mean time, fortified the avenues to theirs, as well as the unseasonableness of the weather would allow them; and though their army was soon after reinforced with six battalions and two regiments of horse from the flying camp of Count de la Moite; yet they retired farther beyond the Marque, and incamped with their right at Pont à Trefin, and their left under the cannon of Lisle. Monsieur Rouffet, in his account of this march, observes, that the Confederate army left their camp at Soignies, on the 31st of August, and marched directly towards the enemy, who were at Cambren: That the Prince of Orange, as General of the Republic, put himself at the head of the Dutch Infantry; but that the French had no sooner advice of this march, than they quitted the camp at Cambren with great precipitation, notwithstanding the advantageous situation, passed at length the Scheld, and retired behind their lines between Lisle and Pont à Trefin: That, if the Allies had begun their march an hour or two sooner, they might have fallen upon the rear-guard of the French army, whom they saw following the body of it: And that the van of the Allies got into their camp, where they found beer, wine, and several other things, which the French had not time to carry away with them. The Allies advancing again towards them, the Duke of Marlbrough had intelligence, that the French had made a disposition to forage at Templeuve and the villages thereabouts: He therefore marched out by break of day with twenty thousand foot, five thousand horse, and twelve pieces of cannon, with a design to attack the guard, that covered them, and, by that means, endeavour to bring them to a general action; but the enemy, being informed of the Duke's intention, did not think fit to venture out of their camp. The Duke therefore ordered his troops to forage those places, that the enemy might have no farther benefit from them; which was done without the least opposition, though under the cannon of Tournay, within a league of the enemy's camp, and three from that of the Confederates; so fearful were the French of exposing themselves to any hazard, though with never so visible an advantage. The Duke of Marlbrough finding it impossible to bring the Duke of Vendome to an engagement, the French camp being covered with the Scheld and their intrenchments, he left the camp at Helckim on the 4th of October, N. S. and went to the Hague, where he arrived, on the 6th, at nine in the morning, and immediately made a visit 1707. visit to the Grand Pensionary and Monsieur de Slingerland, Secretary of the Council of State. The same afternoon he had a Conference with the Deputies of the States-General, wherein he communicated the orders he had received from the Queen of Great-Britain, to repair to Frankfort, and confer with the Electors of Mentz and Hanover about the operations of the next campaign. The next morning he had another Conference with these Deputies, and, in the evening, set out for the army, to give the necessary orders for the marching into winter-quarters. Immediately after his arrival there, the troops which were designed for the garrisons of Menin, Courtray, and Oudenarde, went into those places; and, when the rest of the army came to Afche, they continued there till they heard the French army was separated, upon which all the Confederate troops went into winter-quarters, being much the same as they had been the last year.

The Duke of Marlborough
Germany.

The Duke of Marlborough set out for Germany, and was met by the Elector Palatine at Bruck, about a league from his castle of Banfsberg; and, the next day, he arriv'd at Frankfort, where the Electors of Hanover and Mentz being already come, they had several Conferences together, but nothing was concluded, till the arrival of Count Wratisslaw, the Emperor's Plenipotentiary; nor even then neither, because the Count declared, that he was not fully instructed. Upon this the Conferences broke off; and the two Electors left Frankfort, and the Duke of Marlborough return'd to the Hague, attended by Count Wratisslaw, and arrived there on the 3d of November. During his stay, he communicated to the States-General what had pass'd at Frankfort; and, their Deputies having had several Conferences with the Imperial Ministers, the States resolved to use all possible means to engage the Empire, to make greater efforts for the future than they had hitherto done. In order to this, they wrote a pressing letter to the diet of Ratisbon, wherein, after having represented the great deficiencies and delays of the Germanic body from time to time in the performance of what they were by treaty bound to, and the ill consequences, which had hitherto attended them, they concluded with saying, "That their High Mightinesses would continue to contribute their utmost towards bringing about the great work, which they had, jointly with them, undertaken; but that they expected the like from his Imperial Majesty and the Empire, seeing they were obliged to it by their Alliances and the common Interest; and, in case of non-performance, their High Mightinesses protested against all the ill consequences thereof."

The Duke of Marlborough, having settled several other affairs with the States, embarked for England, and came to St. James's on the 7th of November, O. S.

England.

The Queen of Great-Britain, the States-General, and the Duke of Savoy had formed (as hath been said) a project of invading Provence in France, in order to take or destroy Toulon and Marseilles; which design, if it could have been effected, would have ruined the maritime power of France, and been of infinite advantage to Great-Britain and Holland, by securing and enlarging their trade, and to the whole Confederacy, by depriving the enemy of means to carry on their profitable commerce to the West-Indies, which alone enabled them to prosecute the war. But the Court of Vienna laid the design of reducing the Kingdom of Naples, which, as it tended to divide the Confederate army in Italy, clash'd with the other enterprize, and therefore was strongly oppos'd by Great-Britain and Holland, the Earl of Manchester, who pass'd thro' Vienna in his way to Venice, having remonstrated against it (1). These representations having proved ineffectual, and the Court of Vienna insisting,

Whitehall, March 7, 1706-7. O. S.

Having received by the last post an account of an agreement between Prince Eugene and the Prince of Vaudemont, for the withdrawing left the Court of Vienna, upon this, may be more intent than ever, upon the design of sending troops into the Kingdom of Naples, and Monsieur Vryberge having, in a memorial to her Majesty, represented the same thing; her Majesty has commanded me to acquaint your Lordship, that it is her pleasure, that you hasten your journey to Vienna as much as possible; and that you do represent to that Court, in her Majesty's name, how destructive any such design would be to the carrying on the war in Dauphine and Provence, which is settled and concerted with the Duke of Savoy, and which is the only way, by which France can be affected, or a diversion made in favour of King Charles.

na; and that her Majesty did intirely concur with the States-General, in relation to the project concerted with the Duke of Savoy. He seem'd to think, that the agreement, that is made in Italy, for the French troops to retire to Susa, may be of ill consequence; and this he supposes is the reason, why her Majesty nor the States-General were not made acquainted with it from the Imperial Court, lest they should have dissuaded them from it.

Marquis de Prié to Count Leichtenstein.

April 8, 1707.

We are at last come to the favourable moment to be able to undertake the conquest of Naples, with all the appearances of a speedy and happy success. The Kingdom is intirely unprovided with troops; the people shew openly enough a good disposition for the very August House, and they are at liberty to follow it. The retreat of the enemies out of Lombardy will give still more courage to the well-intentioned. We have even all the reason to believe, that France has already resolved to renounce that Kingdom, which she would, besides, have difficulty enough to support. The Cabinet of France will reflect without doubt, that the sending a small body of men would be sacrificing them with the Country; and she cannot send thither a great one without unarming the frontiers on the side of Piedmont, which is intirely open, after the demolition she has made of Nice and Montmeilan, rather to satisfy her animosity against his Royal Highness of Savoy, than to follow gisting, that the forces of the Allies were sufficient to carry on both these enterprizes at once; Count Thaurin, with a strong body of Imperialists, marched from Lombardy into the Ecclesiastical State, and struck no small terror into the Court of Rome, as they passed near it. It was apprehended, that some resistance would have been made in Naples by those, who governed there under King Philip; but the inbred hatred, which the Neapolitans bore the French, together with the feverities of their Government, had put that whole Kingdom into such a disposition

follow her intentions. Our army will be stronger and in a better condition to act, than that of the last campaign, which has surmounted so many obstacles. All the troops of the Allies remain in Italy. The Imperial army will be reinforced considerably by the recruits and the remounting. That of his Royal Highness will be re-established to the number of seventeen thousand men. We are here almost ready to undertake the expedition of Naples, and the entry into France, both at the same time. The enemies will not be able in this uncertainty to send troops into the Kingdom of Naples, which they would hereafter not be able to withdraw, or to reinforce, as soon as the fleet shall appear in the Mediterranean. On our side, we can carry on that war with all sort of convenience and advantage. Our troops, and especially our horse, will go by land, whilst France will be obliged to immense difficulties and expences to embark their cavalry. She may remember the consequences of the engagements at Mysina: The too great distance caused her to great a diversion, that the Court of France was at last persuaded to abandon, scandalously enough, that enterprize, at a time when she made war every where else with advantage enough. But, if she would even make all sorts of efforts, we shall be always able to make detachments from this army great enough to maintain a superiority. So that she will either ruin herself in supporting a distant war, full of expence and difficulty, or we shall have fair play; and we can finish the expedition in one march, and even make use elsewhere of the troops, that will not be necessary to guard the Country; whence we can easily embark the foot, and transport them in a little time to Final, or perhaps into Provence. We could even, in case of necessity, send them into Spain. I have made good use of these reasons to persuade the Ministers of England and Holland of the facility of this enterprize. I have shewn, that it does not hinder us at all in any of the operations, and the view we have of entering into France, which they have much at heart; and, far from that, the conquest of these two Kingdoms will facilitate the means to push that war more vigorously, and to finish it perhaps more quickly, whilst it may chance to determine the Spaniards to return to their duty, to preserve the estates in Italy to their Monarchy. I have also endeavoured to confirm his Royal Highness in the first resolutions which were taken, and of which we formed the projects at the end of the last campaign, which were then sent to England; whilst he was very much attacked by the remonstrances and difficulties, which the two powers made, and by the zeal he has to push his point vigorously on the side of France, according to the desire and instances of England and Holland, and the hopes we have to cause some commotions. His Royal Highness has declared, that he would submit to what the Emperor should order about it, and that he will be ready to execute it.

I arrived here on the 21st, and had been here sooner, had I not met with contrary winds on the Danube, tho' I find it would have been much the same thing, for this week every one is in devotion. I have, nevertheless, seen Monsieur de Zinzendorf and Monsieur Wratislaw, and did not fail to take the first opportunity to shew them the ill consequence to the intended design of prosecuting the war into France, should they first undertake that of Naples; and I did acquaint them with the orders I had received from her Majesty. As for Count Zinzendorf, he was not so positive as the latter;

but they both agreed in this, that it would not in the least prejudice that undertaking; for since the French were entirely out of Italy, there were troops sufficient for both. That Prince Eugene was to stay, though his presence would have been of very great consequence: That they had given their reasons to Monsieur Duff, which they hoped would satisfy her Majesty; as also the States-General. I had a great deal of discourse on that subject with the latter, who, I fear, has no great opinion of the project concerted with the Duke of Savoy. When I pressed that matter, he did say, that, by the Grand Alliance, that of Naples was first to be undertaken; and that the Emperor was not able to sustain this war without some assistance of that nature: That every thing was ready here, and they had reason to believe, they should succeed with a small number of troops. I do not doubt but her Majesty is already informed of the reasons they alleged; and I cannot but think, though they do not positively own it, that the orders are already gone to Italy.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Sunderland.

Vienna, April 27. 1707.

Yesterday I had my audience of the Emperor, when, after I had made him the usual compliments on the part of her Majesty, and told him how great a satisfaction it was to her, as also to her Allies, that his Majesty had granted the investiture of the Duchy of Milan to the King of Spain, and that her Majesty had commanded me to receive his orders before I went to Italy; then I acquainted him, that the expedition into France was of the last consequence, not only in relation to the common cause, but also to the securing the crown of Spain to the King: That her Majesty did hope, that he had given all the necessary directions, in order to support it as far as it is possible: That it was a matter that so nearly concerned her Majesty, in regard it related to the King of Spain, that she did hope there would be no objections made to it. I also took notice of the orders I had received in relation to the Duke of Savoy. The Emperor answered me, in relation to her Majesty, with all the acknowledgments imaginable; but did not touch on any thing of the investiture of the Duchy of Milan. As to the Duke of Savoy, he said, that he had done, and would do what remained, not only in regard to him, whom he spoke extremely well of, but also in regard to the Queen. I have again pressed all the Ministers to lay aside for the present the sending a detachment to Naples, &c.—Yesterday arrived an express from Count Galas. The letters are of the 9th Instant, O. S. I perceive they do not please here, for they are much fet on the expedition to Naples. I asked Monsieur Zinzendorf, whether the reasons they had given Monsieur Duff had changed their minds in England, in the affair of Naples; but he seemed to own it had not.

Memorial of the Dutch Envoy.

The States-General of the United-Provinces have ordered the under-written Minister at the Imperial Court, under the date of the 11th of April 1707, to represent here, that they must judge, by the small preparations that are made by the said Court in Italy, for the concerted expedition against France from that side, that the Imperial Court takes the said expedition very little to heart; but that it seems rather, that they think here only on that of Naples; which their High Mightinesses can, however, not approve of, nor can they find the reasons alleged on the part of the said Court sufficient to justify it, because, the great aim of the war and the Alliance being to bring France to reason, the invasion

1707. to revolt, that the small party, which adhered to King Philip, found it not advisable to offer any resistance, and had only time enough to convey their treasure, and all their richest goods to

Gaeta, and to retire thither. They reckoned, 1707. that they should either be relieved from France by sea, or obtain a good capitulation; or, if that failed, they had some ships and galleys, in which invasion of France is the most certain and the most likely method to do it; and the more the forces, that are to be employed in this, shall be considerable, so much greater will be the effect hoped from it, whilst the expedition for Naples deviates from it, and cannot but lessen the success of it, by lessening the forces, without causing the enemy any diversion; and whilst we shall by this put ourselves in danger of losing Spain, which would be a loss by no means to be made up by all the advantages, that can be obtained by the expedition of Naples. It is therefore, that their High Mightinesses hope, that his Imperial Majesty would still be pleased to desist from the said enterprize to Naples; and they have ordered their underwritten Minister to make the most pressing instances, that all the forces, that are in Italy, may be employed in the expedition against France; and that all the necessary preparations for this may be forthwith made, with more seriousness and application, than could hitherto be perceived.

The Earl of Manchester to Mr. Secretary Harley.

Vienna, April 30, 1707.

Here are no letters yet from England; so that I continue, as often as I see the Ministers, to persuade them to lay aside the expedition of Naples, which I believe they will do, unless it be approved of by her Majesty. What makes them more zealous in that matter is the apprehension, that in Holland they might be brought, at a general peace, to consent to the dismembering it from the Spanish Monarchy; and, if once they are in possession of it, England will never consent to it. They flatter themselves, that, upon their appearing, the people will declare. As to the intended expedition into France, it is certain, that this Court has sent the recruits they promised, as also the mounting for their horse. They also assure me, that they are doing what is necessary in relation to their magazines; but I am confident, that in this they will fall short; and I can easily perceive, that their meaning is, only till their troops can enter into France; and then they must subside themselves, or we must do it: which I find is the true reason, which makes them say, that of Provence is most practicable, because, as I suppose, they think they can be subsisted by our fleet. They assure me, that what is agreed on will be performed.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Sunderland.

Vienna, May 4, 1707.

They are still zealous for the expedition of Naples. These troops, as they promise, shall not exceed seven thousand men; and that, in case they do not succeed, they will not send a man more; but those troops are to canton, and to keep their ground, till a more favourable opportunity. General Thaun is to command them, and under him General Kriegbaum, who set out yesterday with orders to Prince Eugene to have the troops ready; and it may be to march, for there is no time to be lost. But I am still of opinion, they will wait till they see what the King of Sweden will do, and what assurances the Duke of Marborough has. Here are letters come from thence, which mention, that his Grace was in conference with Count Piper for several hours; that my Lord Duke arrived there on the 26th, and was to go away on the 29th, but they could not tell any particulars. No express is come here from the Emperor's Ministers, which makes them fear here, that things are not right. The letters all agree, that they very much doubt it, which, I believe, will be the only inducement to prevent sending a detachment to Naples. For the present, I take all occasions to dissuade them from it; but their answer is always what I have already mentioned; as also that there will be more troops left, after this detachment shall be made, than can be employed. The Emperor will have thirty-five thousand men in Italy, and in our pay, as they say, twenty-thousand. There should be twenty-eight thousand. But the Hessians, Sax-Gotha, and Palatines will not be complacit. The Duke of Savoy has thirteen thousand. So that the army will consist of about sixty-eight thousand men. Now the conclusion is, that, if seven thousand out of this army go, there will still remain troops sufficient for garrisons, and a very great army for the expedition, and more than can be subsisted. These are the arguments they make use of, both to the Envoy of Holland and to myself. We still persist to persuade them to lay aside this expedition for the present. What they will do, time must shew; for nothing is certain here, as your Lordship cannot but know very well.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Sunderland.

Vienna, May 7, 1707.

Here are no letters from England by the Dutch post; but the orders, the Envoy of Holland has received, continue the same in relation to the expedition of Naples, which, they continue to say, cannot fail to succeed, all things being prepared there for a general revolution, and that, if they should not go, they would expose all their friends. Here are some persons of quality of Naples, to whom they give pensions. These are to go with the troops, but I do not find as yet, that they have any orders. The arguments here are still, that the Duke of Savoy does not propose for this expedition more than thirty-five thousand men: That there will be left a great body of men, after what is intended is executed: That they are very much surprized at our being so much against this expedition; but they give me to understand, that they know from whence all this comes: That there may be a particular view in a certain Prince, that the Duke of Anjou should have Naples at a general peace. They are very well satisfied by what I have said, that this can never be the intention of England, or that they can ever agree to it: I must confess, that, by all the informations I can get, I cannot see, but there will be seventy thousand men in Italy; and if the detachment to Naples should amount to ten thousand men, and the garrisons in Lombardy to ten thousand more, there will still remain a very great army: What there is to be apprehended is, that there are not those magazines prepared, as, in case this Court is to do it, are necessary.

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Sunderland.

Vienna, May 11, 1707.

I believe you will have received, before this comes to your Lordship, the certainty of the detachment's going to Naples. It consists of five regiments of foot, and five of horse, which, though not complete, will amount to ten thousand men, as you will see by the inclosed. They are at present in the Moldenese; and, about the 16th instant, they begin their march to Naples. I have done all I could to persuade them to defer it. Their arguments are still the same; only they say farther, that Prince Eugene has wrote to England to satisfy the Queen, that it will not prejudice the great design against France. They have all often repeated, and do still promise, that there shall not be a man more sent, let the success be what it will, till they see the event of the other expedition, which, as I can perceive, they have no great opinion of, though they agree, that it ought to be attempted.

which they might hope to escape. The Imperialists took possession of Naples, where they were received with great rejoicing. But their ill conduct quickly moderated that joy, and very much disposed the Neapolitans to a second revolt; but, upon applications made to the Courts of Vienna and Barcelona, the excesses of the Imperialists, who carried the ravenous disposition with

The Earl of Sunderland to the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, May 6, 1707.

I have the honour of your Lordship's letters of the 27th and 30th of April, N. S. and am very glad to find you have some hopes, that that Court will lay aside their thoughts of the expedition to Naples. It was always very unreasonable, but particularly so now, since our great misfortune in Spain.—Upon these accounts her Majesty would have your Lordship insist, in the strongest manner possible, against this expedition to Naples, as that, which will very much obstruct, if not totally defeat the main design of entering France by Dauphiné or Provence, which seems to be the only means of bringing France to reason, and retrieving our misfortune in Spain.

M^r. Secretary Harley to the Earl of Manchester.

I received this morning the honour of your Excellency's letter of April 30. I am heartily glad your Excellency has had so much success, as to shake that Court from their speculative expedition against Naples. But I am very sorry, that the misfortune of our army in Spain is an irresistible argument to lay aside wholly that project. The accounts we have of this disaster are only got from France; yet they bring too many marks of truth not to be credited so far, as that we have received a very great loss there. The Queen has done all that is possible on the sudden event, and in this great uncertainty. Orders are gone this night to encourage the King of Portugal to keep firm to the Alliance; and likewise to Holland, to consult with them the best way to recover the blow. But all will be to no purpose, unless the Emperor will exert himself upon this occasion, not only to lay aside the expedition to Naples, to push vigorously into France, but also to act offensively upon the Rhine. These are points which the Queen hath so much at heart, that her Majesty hath wrote to the Emperor with her own hand, which I inclose herewith to your Excellency, that you may please to deliver it with all possible speed; and that you may be better apprized of it, I inclose also a copy for your own perusal. Your Excellency will enforce it with such arguments, as you will find, according to your great sagacity, may best incline his Imperial Majesty to comply with so reasonable a desire; and you will be pleased also to press the Emperor to send his Brother the King of Spain some troops. Without that, it will be hard for her Majesty to prevail with the States-General to join with her in sending more troops.

The Queen to the Emperor.

SIR, my Brother,

The advantage, which the enemy has now obtained in Spain, might have such dismal consequences, that I could not forbear to tell you, that it is of the utmost importance, that all your troops, that are in Italy, should be employed to make an invasion in France; and that, at the same time, the army in the Empire should act with vigour on the Rhine. Spain is so far from the countries, in which my troops, and those of the States-General, are, that there is no remedy so quick nor so powerful, as that of making this invasion. Your Majesty is too well informed, to amuse yourself with a little expedition for some member or dependency of that Kingdom, when the noble and principal parts of the Monarchy in question, the honour and welfare of my Brother the Catholic King, and in his person the dignity of the August House of Austria, are concerned. I promise myself therefore from your prudence, that you will think only on the re-establishment of the affairs of that Prince, by obliging his enemies to recall their troops for the defence of their own Dominions.

Kennington, May 6, 1707.

I am
Your Majesty's most affectionate Sister,

ANNE R.

The Duke of Marlborough to the Earl of Manchester.

Brussels, May 17, 1707.

I did not receive the honour of your Excellency's letter of the 27th of last month, till my return from Saxony to the Hague, where I made so short a stay, that I hope you will excuse my not answering it sooner. I have seen by other letters from Vienna of later date, how obstinately they pursue the expedition against Naples, notwithstanding all the representations, that have been made to dissuade them from it. A jealous humour prevails so much at that Court, that they will not seriously weigh and consider their own interest, so that the best arguments are thrown away. I expect soon to hear, whether our misfortune in Spain has made such impression, as it ought, with them.

The Earl of Manchester received on the 18th of May 1707, a note from Mr. Hamel Bryxins, Envoy from the States-General at Vienna, to let his Excellency know, that he had received from the Prince of Salm an extract of a letter, wherein it was said, among other things, that the detachment for Naples was great enough to maintain a superiority, which the Envoy said would by no means please his Masters at the Hague. "It was then pretty plain," says Mr. Cole, that the Germans "had no great desire for Spain, but wanted only Italy;" and that they had not the expedition of Torin at heart, fearing the aggrandizing the Duke of Savoy, whilst they spread reports, as if that Prince was not to be trusted, and prepared to lay the blame on him, if, according to their wish, the expedition should not succeed.

The Earl of Manchester to the Lord-Treasurer Godolphin.

Vienna, May 18, 1707.

I was unwilling to leave this place without acquainting your Lordship with the situation of affairs here, where there are so many Ministers, each opposing the other, that every thing, how reasonable soever the matter is, meets with delays, and sometimes fatal ones. This has made the Emperor sling himself more than ever entirely into the hands of the Prince of Salm, who is so troubled with the gout, that the Emperor comes to him. The whole business of the rest is to bring their own designs about through his means. I do not find one of them, but what was extremely bent on the expedition to Naples, and speaking very doubtfully of that of France, and of the difficulties it would meet with; not but they all agree, it ought to be attempted; and the Emperor did assure me he had given the necessary orders to Prince Eugene. I find, that the subsisting of this army is still one of the arguments against that expedition, which makes me fear, that they do not intend, or cannot contribute much towards it.

Whitehall, May 9, 1707, O. S.

I have the honour of your Lordship's from Vienna of the 4th of May, N. S. and I am sorry to find that Court continues to obstinate in their wrong measures;

1707. with them wherever they went, were somewhat corrected, so that they became more tolerable (1). As soon as a Government could be settled at Naples, they undertook the siege of Gasta, which went on at first very slowly; so that those within seemed to apprehend nothing so much as the want of provisions, upon which they sent the few ships they had to Sicily, to bring them supplies. When these were sent away, the Imperialists, knowing what a rich booty was lodged in the place, pressed it very hard, and in conclusion, took it by storm, and so were masters of all the wealth that was in it. The garrison retired into the castle, but they were soon after forced to surrender, and were all made prisoners of war. It was proposed to follow this success, with an attempt upon Sicily; but it was not easy to supply Naples with bread; nor was the English fleet at liberty to assist them; for they were ordered to lie on the coast of Spain, and to wait there for orders; which, when they arrived, required them to carry the Marquis das Minas, and the Earl of Galway, with the forces of Portugal, to Lisbon: The thoughts of attempting Sicily were therefore laid aside for this time; tho' the Sicilians were known to be in a very good disposition to entertain it. A small force was sent from Naples to seize on those places, which lay on the coast of Tuscany, and belonged to the Crown of Spain; some of which were soon taken; but Porto Longone and Port Hercule made a better resistance.

In the month of June, the design upon Toulon began to appear. The Queen and the States-General sent a strong fleet thither commanded by Sir Cloudesly Shovel. Prince Eugene had the command of the Imperial army, which was to second the Duke of Savoy in this undertaking, upon the success of which the final conclusion of the war depended. The army was not so strong, as it was intended it should have been, on account of the detachment, which was sent to Naples, and the stopping in Germany of eight or ten thousand recruits, that had been promised to be sent to reinforce Prince Eugene; for the Emperor was under such apprehensions of a rupture with Sweden, that he pretended it was absolutely necessary, for his own safety, to keep a good force at home. Prince Eugene had likewise orders not to expose his troops too much; by which means they were the less serviceable (2). Notwithstanding these disappointments, the Duke of Savoy, after he had for some weeks covered his true design by a feint upon Dauphiné, by which he drew most of the French troops to that side; as soon as he heard, that the Confede-

but I will still hope, that the news of the fatal blow we have had in Spain, will bring them to their senses, so as not to divert their arms from the only part, where we may hope to retrieve that misfortune; at least they must never hope to have the Queen's consent to it; and this your Lordship will let them know in the strongest manner, if you are yet there.

The Dutch Envoy to the Earl of Manchester,

Vienna, May 28, 1707.

I hope, that this will find your Excellency happily arrived at Turin. The Count of Rechteren arrived here the 25th instant; and though we have, according to our orders newly received from their High Mightinesses, again opposed the expedition of Naples, and even protested against the bad consequences, which it may have, especially after the melancholy news of a defeat in Spain; we have not been able to obtain, that this expedition be countermanded; these Ministers make use of the same reasons, which they alledged, when your Excellency was here; which makes me with the more to hear from your Excellency, how you have found things in Italy; and if the conjectures of this Court are true in their utmost extent; and, above all, whether there be so many troops, as they persuade themselves here; whether they apply themselves with vigour to the expedition against France; whether they be ready; and agreed in regard to the magazines; when the passage of the mountains will be practicable; and whether the expedition to Naples will cause no prejudice to the other. They had even given out, on the part of this Court, in England and Holland, that your Excellency was entirely come into the same sentiments with them in this affair, which their High-Mightinesses can scarce believe, whilst they have seen the contrary in my advices; and I do again this day justice to your Excellency upon that in writing to my Masters.

Turin, June 8, 1707.

The Envoy of Spain presses for five thousand men to be sent to Spain; but since the detachment for Naples does proceed according to the positive order from the Court of Vienna to Prince Eugene, I cannot see, that any can be spared from this side; neither do I think, that they will be inclined to send their troops, unless it be from Naples, if they succeed, as they imagine they shall. I received here your Lordship's of May 6, O. S. as also one of the same date from Mr. Secretary Harley. I am satisfied, that, had I been at Vienna, nothing could have prevailed with them to alter their design of Naples.—The Duke of Savoy is not in the least pleased with the Imperial Court, of which I shall soon acquaint you more fully.

(1) The Earl of Manchester, in a letter to the Earl of Sunderland, dated at Venice, August 19, 1707, writes thus: "I fear the Germans begin to make the most of the Kingdom of Naples. They laid a duty on fruit and herbs, which so incensed the people at Naples, that there has been a tumult, which might have had worse consequences, but was prevented by revoking it." And Mr. Cardonnel, in a letter to Mr. Cole from the camp at Helchin, dated October 2, 1707, and printed in the Memoirs of the latter, has these words: "It looks as if the Germans were resolved to ruin the Kingdom of Naples, as they have done the Electorate of Bavaria; but in all likelihood they may repent it, when it is too late. It is a miserable Council governs that Court of Vienna. In the mean time we are sufferers; for, instead of assisting the King of Spain, as the revenues of Milan and Naples ought certainly to do, they do not stick to say, it is none of their concern; and that we must carry on the war in Spain for our own interest. God preserve us hereafter from such Allies."

(2) Mr. Cole informs us in his Memoirs, page 457, that the Earl of Manchester told him, That he had been with the Duke of Savoy, when Prince Eugene made many difficulties about the expedition against Toulon, and the Duke of Savoy answered them all. When Prince Eugene was gone, his Royal Highness asked my Lord Manchester, what he thought now of Prince Eugene. His Excellency answered, that he was sorry to hear him make so many difficulties. Then the Duke said, I will tell you, my Lord, what I think of him and all the Germans. I believe they have no great mind to take Toulon, and their whole mind is set on Italy. But his Excellency attributed this to the warmth of that Prince, and believed Prince Eugene would do his best.

1707. rate fleet was come upon the Coast, he made a quick march through ways, that were thought impracticable, to the river Var, where the French had cast up such works, that it was reckoned these must have stopped his passing the river; and they would have done it effectually, if some ships had not been sent in from the fleet into the mouth of the river, to attack these works where there was no defence, because no attack from that side was apprehended. By this means the works were abandoned, and so the passage over the river was free.

Upon this the Duke of Savoy entered Provence, and made all the haste he could towards Toulon. The artillery and ammunition were on board the fleet, and were to be landed near the place, so the march of the army was as little encumbered as was possible; yet it was impossible to advance with much haste in an enemy's country, where the provisions were either destroyed or carried into fortified places, which, though they might have easily been taken, yet no time was to be lost in executing the great design; so this retarded the march for some days: Yet, in conclusion, they came before the place, and were quickly masters of some of the eminencies, that commanded it. At their first coming, they might have possessed themselves of another called St Anne's Hill, if Prince Eugene had executed the Duke of Savoy's orders: He did it not, which raised a high discontent; but he excused himself, by shewing the orders he had received, not to expose the Emperor's troops (1). Some days were lost by the roughness of the sea, which hindered the ships from landing the artillery and ammunition. In the mean while, the troops of France were ordered to march from all parts of Toulon: The garrison within was very strong; the forces that were on their march to Spain, to prosecute the victory of Almanza, were countermanded; and so great a part of Pilar's army was called away, that he could not make any further progress in Germany. So that a great force was, from all hands, marching to raise this siege; and it was declared, in the Court of France, that the Duke of Burgundy would go and lead on the army. The Duke of Savoy lost no time, but continued cannonading the place, while the fleet came up to bombard it: They attacked the two forts, that commanded the entrance into the mole with such fury, that they made themselves masters of them; but one of them was afterwards blown up. Those within the town were not idle: They sunk some ships, in the entrance into the mole, and fired furiously at the fleet, but did them little harm: They beat the Duke of Savoy out of one of his most important posts, which was long defended by a gallant Prince of Saxe-Gotha; who, not being supported in time, was cut to pieces. This post was afterwards regained, and the fleet continued for some days to bombard the place, with so good success, that a great number of houses were destroyed, several magazines blown up, and eight men of war either burnt or rendered unserviceable (2). But, in the end, the Duke of Savoy, whose strength had never been above thirty thousand men, seeing so great a force marching towards him, who might intercept his passage, and so destroy his whole army, and there being no hope of carrying the place, found it necessary to march home in time. Accordingly, having ordered all the artillery and the sick and wounded to be embarked, he decamped in the night, retiring in very good order the same way he came, without being the least insulted by the enemy (3). After his return into Piedmont, he concluded the campaign on that side, with the recovery of his important place of Susa, which the French had left unprovided,

(1) On the 3d of August, Mr. J. Chetwind wrote the following letter from the camp there to the Earl of Manchester, printed in Cole's Memoirs, p. 465: The situation of affairs here is somewhat changed since I left, but not so much as I could wish, or indeed as I did expect. This is the 9th day, that our army has been before Toulon; and all that we have done has been to oblige the enemies to quit us some small posts, where we design to make our batteries; but their camp before the town is in the same place where it was when we came, though most people will have it, that they might easily have been forced away. I do not know, my Lord, what is the meaning of it, but things do not go as they ought to do. Of our great men, I only find his Royal Highness hearty. I fear, if we do not make better haste, that we shall pass our time but ill, since we are informed, that the enemies are gathering together from all parts to drive us from hence.

(2) Namely, Le Triumphant of eighty-two guns; Le Sceptre, ninety; Le Vainqueur, eighty-six; Le Neptune, seventy-six; L'Invincible, seventy; Le Serieux, sixty; Le Laurier, sixty; and Le Sage, fifty-four.

(3) The progress of the siege will appear from the following Journal of Mr. Chetwind, dated at the camp at la Valette, August 20, 1707, and printed in Mr. Cole's Memoirs, p. 470:

The 14th. My last to you was this day, since when I hear, that some deserters from Toulon bring word, that the enemies have given out powder and ball to every soldier; upon which orders are now given to reinforce the guard upon the left of our line with three battalions, the right having already a reserve of four battalions ordered for some days before. The 15th the enemies, as the deserters had reported, marched all night to gain the hill above our camp upon our right, and that with so much diligence and secrecy, that they seized on our advanced guards, and began their true attack on our right by break of day, after having made their signal for the attack by firing three guns, making at the same time a false attack on our left. Our troops on the right received the enemies very well at first; but being over-powered by their superiority, and the situation of the ground being such, that the reserve could not immediately come up, they were obliged to give way, and retire into the other posts on the right, which they did in very good order, till the Prince of Saxe-Gotha, who was General of the day, was killed; and this, though they were exposed to the fire of the place, and of three ships, which did not cease firing during the whole action. The enemies endeavoured to push their good fortune farther; but, after a dispute of about two hours, at a little cañon in the middle of our communication, they were obliged to stop in the post of St. Catherine, for fear the troops, which his Royal Highness and Prince Eugene, who arrived a little after the action was begun, had ordered to march to the top of the hills, should cut off the retreat to the camp; which they had great reason to apprehend, since they could not but perceive our whole army in motion, which our Generals had ordered so, in view of a general action, upon the news we had received the day before, that the enemies had above sixty battalions in their camp. But things went no further, and towards the evening the enemies abandoned all they had taken, after having set fire to our batteries, and ruined all the works we had made on the right.—A detachment of horse we had in the valley

1707. vided, and which surrendered to him at discretion; by which means he shut up that inlet into his own Dominions, and opened himself a free passage into Dauphiné.

Remark on the expedition into Provence. Thus ended the expedition into Provence, on which the eyes of all Europe were fixed, and which failed in the execution, chiefly by the Emperor's means (1). England and the States General performed all that was expected of them; nor was the Duke of Savoy wanting on his part, though many suspected him as backward, or at least told in the undertaking. But though this great valley of *Ardenne*s on the right of our camp, with a small body of foot, was attacked by the enemies at the same time, but came off without any loss, Colonel Pheffercorn, who commanded them, having been killed the day before, as he went to reconnoitre the enemy. We do not know the loss of the enemy in the attacks of our works on the right, but to judge by our own loss, and the resistance our troops made at first, methinks it cannot be less than two thousand or fifteen hundred men. We had between five and six hundred men killed, wounded, or taken prisoners. Besides the Prince of Saxe-Gotha, we had a Lieutenant Colonel of the Hessians, a Major of the Palatines, with several Captains and Under-Officers killed; General Efeldt, a Palatine Brigadier, with several Under-Officers wounded; a Piedmontese, and a Saxe-Gotha Colonel taken prisoners, with one or two Captains; besides which, we lost two small field-pieces, which our gunner had forgot to carry off from the post of St. Catherine. At night we began to bombard the town with six mortars, which immediately set fire in two places. This evening the Fort St. Marguerite, the outmost near to the sea, surrendered at discretion. The garrison was composed of a Lieutenant-Colonel, and three other Officers, with one hundred and thirty soldiers. We found in the place some provisions, and fourteen pieces of iron cannon, four of which were forty-eight pounders. By the reddition of this castle our ships can come near the shore, and the artillery, &c. which was landed at Hieres, may be re-embarked here with much more ease, which was ordered to be done to-morrow, the siege of Toulon not being practicable, because of the reinforcements the enemies have received since we are here, and by reason of the works they have had time to make. The 16th our batteries on the left continued to play against the town and ships, as also against Fort Louis, where the breach is near made. Our bombardiers flung several bombs last night, and all this day, into the town with very good success; but no ship has yet been touched, as we know of. We continue to embark our artillery, &c. The Admiral commanded ships to attack Fort Louis, but the wind was so strong, that our ships could do little service. However they lay so near, that one of our ships had thirty men killed or wounded. This day the wind blew so hard, that the Royal Anne lost one of her masts, was drove from her anchor, and ran foul upon a Dutch man of war, who was somewhat damaged. The 17th drummers and trumpeters were sent to and from Toulon, to inquire after several Officers and soldiers; and the enemies did desire to exchange their prisoners made at St. Marguerite, to which his Royal Highness and Prince Eugene do consent. The 18th the greatest part of the artillery, which is not on batteries, and almost all the powder, balls, &c. are re-embarked. Our bombs destroy the town of Toulon very much; but none have yet been flung into the basin among the ships. The breach of Fort Louis is practicable, and orders will be given to attack it to-night. All our sick and wounded are ordered to Hieres, where they are to be embarked to be carried to Nice, Oneglia, and Finale. The 19th, last night we took the Fort St. Louis, the enemies having abandoned it as our grenadiers mounted the breach. By the fall of this place, I believe our bomb-vessels may come to bombard the town and ships, which is the only hurt we can now pretend to do here.

Mr. Chetwynd likewise, in a letter to the Earl of Manchester, dated August 20, writes thus: All things have been so managed with us, that I had not spirit nor courage enough to write to you, knowing how much you had the good success of our designs at heart. Our scene is not yet finished, for we are to steal away as we can, and as soon as we can. Now every thing is in the greatest confusion, and I fear will continue so till we are got on the other side of the Var.

Sir Claudefly Shovel wrote the following letter to the Earl of Manchester, dated on board the Association before Toulon, August 22, 1707.

My Lord,

After all the hopes we had entertained of success in our enterprise on Toulon, the enemy, on the 1st instant, made a vigorous salley with a great number of troops, and attacked our works, and took great part of them, and kept them all that day, and destroyed what they had possession of, and drew off four or five of our cannon into the town. The killed and wounded on our side is said to be about one thousand, and among the slain is the Prince of Saxe-Gotha; and since that time it has not been thought proper to carry on the siege; the enemies, as our army say, growing everyday more numerous, and our troops continually deserting. And the 2nd his Royal Highness the Duke of Savoy sent to me to embark the sick and wounded, and to take off the cannon, mortars, ammunition, provisions, &c. in order to raise the siege, which is now only a cannonading and bombardment, and we are getting every thing a-board, his Royal Highness having informed me, he designs to decamp with the army to-morrow morning. Before the enemies had made this salley, and destroyed our works, they were so frightened, that they sunk twenty of their ships; ten of them or more we reckon to be three-deck ships; and we believe some of them can never be recovered. The Duke has desired me to accompany him back with the fleet, which I design to do as far as the Var.

P. S. August 22, about ten in the morning.

Our sea-bombs last night fired very briskly, and beyond any expectation about midnight set the town on fire, which burnt very furiously all night, and is not yet extinguished; and, in the opinion of every body here, it is somewhat more than dwelling-houses, that are on fire, we suppose store-houses. We cannot see the town or basin by reason of a hill between us. Our army being decamped, they have brought guns and mortars against our bomb-vessels, and have obliged them to come off, being pretty much shattered by the enemy's shot.

Mr. Chetwynd concludes his account of the siege in a letter to the Earl of Manchester, dated from the camp at Sealín, September 16, 1707, with these words:

The difficulties we met with at Toulon were very great, but they were made much more so by the indolence and ill-will of some of our Generals. If we had pushed upon our arrival, there was a very great probability of success; but, as things went, it was almost impracticable to do any good three or four days after our arrival; and I do not know the reasons, why we did not then set to bombarding the town and ships, instead of amusing ourselves about what we were sure could do us no good.

(1) Dr. Swift, in his conduct of the Allies and of the late Ministry, p. 27, fifth Edition, asserts, That one instance of the Emperor's indifference, or rather dislike of the common cause, was the business of Toulon; his design, says he, was indeed discovered here at home

1707. great design failed in the main point, it proved of great service to the Allies, and was attended with many good consequences, which, perhaps, ought to balance the expence: For, besides the great damage, which the French sustained in their shipping; the blowing up of several magazines; the burning of above one hundred and sixty houses in Toulon; and the devastations committed in Provence by both armies, to the value of thirty millions of French livres; this enterprise, which had struck a greater terror throughout all France, than had been known there during the whole reign of Louis XIV., brought

this further advantage to the Common Cause, 1707. that it gave great diversion to the enemy's forces, whereby their army in Germany was weakened; the Duke of Orleans's progress after the battle of Almanza retarded in Spain; the succouring of Naples prevented; and the conquests of the Allies in Italy secured.

Admiral Shovel, who was not a little chagrin'd at the miscarriage of an expedition, upon which he had set his heart; having assigned Sir Thomas Dilkes a Squadron of thirteen sail for the Mediterranean service, sailed from Gibraltar with the rest of the fleet, containing fifteen men of war home by a person, who every body knows to be the creature of a certain Great Man, at least as much noted for his skill in gaming as in politics, upon the base mercenary end of getting money by wagers, which was then so common a practice, that I remember a Gentleman in employment, who, having the curiosity to inquire how wagers went upon the Exchange, found some people deep in the secret, to have been concerned in that kind of traffic, as appeared by premiums named for towns, which no body but those behind the curtain could suspect. However, although this project had gotten wind by so scandalous a proceeding, yet Toulon might probably have been taken, if the Emperor had not thought fit, in that very juncture, to detach twelve or fifteen thousand men to seize Naples, as an enterprise, that was more his private and immediate interest. But it was manifest, that his Imperial Majesty had no mind to see Toulon in possession of the Allies; for even with these discouragements, the attempt might have yet succeeded, if Prince Eugene had not thought fit to oppose it, which cannot be imputed to his own judgment, but to some politic reasons of his Court. The Duke of Savoy was for attacking the enemy as soon as our army arrived; but, when the Marshal de Théflé's troops were all come up, to pretend to besiege the place, in the condition we were at that time, was a farce and a jest. Had Toulon fallen then into our hands, the maritime power of France would in a great measure have been destroy'd.

But Dr. Harris, in his piece, intitled, The Allies and the late Ministry defended against France, and the present friends of France, Part III. p. 13, gives a particular answer to this passage of Dr. Swift, and observes, That every proposition advanced by him is false in whole, or in part. First, he tells us the design was discovered here by a creature of a certain Great Man laying wagers about the taking of it. This is a very odd preamble to a proof, that this design was lost by the Emperor's fault, to tell us, that probably it was not; the design was discovered here. But these inconsistencies are nothing with this Writer, if he can but bring in one or two certain Great Men, whose reputation stands cruelly in his way, and will do so, let him employ never so many pens to blacken them. Now, in answer to this, I affirm, that this design was not discovered by the creature of this Great Man, but by the Clerk of another great man, who was then Secretary of State. But to go on; our Author argues, that the Emperor had no mind Toulon should be taken, because he detached twelve thousand men to seize Naples, as he ingeniously expresses it. That the Emperor did, at that time, make an expedition to Naples, is true; but was it, because he had no mind Toulon should be taken? No, it was because those, who would make a scandalous peace now, were attempting the same thing then; and he was afraid, the interest of his family in Italy would have been sacrificed to other views. This was the true reason of that expedition, and this Writer knows it was, which makes his virulence and malice the more unpardonable. As things were managed, it is plain, there was a want of troops. But, when the Emperor was pressed to put off that expedition, he did not want an answer. He told them, that without those twelve thousand men, they had as many, as they had before desired; and indeed as many, as would be able to find substance, and that more would be but a burden to them: That, while they were employed in the reduction of Toulon, the other troops should, by great marches, hasten to Naples, and then return to join them for any further services. But, it is manifest, says our Author, that the Emperor had no mind we should take Toulon, because the attempt might have succeeded, if Prince Eugene had not thought fit to oppose it. This is false again. The Duke of Savoy had the chief command in that expedition, and not Prince Eugene. What was the true reason they delay'd so long the beginning of that march, I cannot pretend to say; but, when they had pass'd the Var, I desire this Author would tell us, who it was, that propos'd the holding a Council of war on board the fleet, and did hold one, to consider, whether they should proceed directly to Toulon, or besiege Antibes? A man must be a very ill judge in affairs, that could not from that step see, what was likely to come of the expedition. Again, to clear up this affair, I would fain know, who govern'd the motions of the army, till they came before the place; for it is incredible, how so small an army could be so many days making to short a march. And, if they had advanced with half the speed that they retired, it is certain they might have invested the place, before the works the enemy were making would have been finish'd, and before any considerable number of the enemy's troops were arriv'd. But the slowness of our motions made our arrival too late in both these respects. And the enemy's troops were in possession of the high ground about the place, before we came in sight of it. And therefore, if the Duke of Savoy did not seem willing to attack the enemy, that is not very hard to account for; nor might it be any fault in Prince Eugene, that he did not think it reasonable. But, beside, there was particular reason at that time to think, the Prince might have strict orders from Vienna, to be very cautious how he expos'd that body of troops; and that was the neighbourhood of the King of Sweden, who was pleas'd to pick many quarrels with the Emperor; and nobody could tell where his demands would stop, or what would satisfy him. This gave very great umbrage to the Imperial Court; and, had they lost that body of troops before Toulon, they had reason to fear they should soon feel the want of them. This was certainly a good reason for not venturing a battle to disadvantage, where the least misfortune would have been the ruin of them all. But, had that expedition either begun ten days sooner, or the march from the Var had been made in less time, the design would have succeeded without the hazard of a battle. There is more might be said upon this subject; but I am not in so much haste to discover some truths, as our Author is to tell the most pernicious lies. Upon this instance then I must observe, 1. That the expedition to Naples was not the effect of any disregard to the Allies, but of self-preservation. 2. That Prince Eugene's declining a battle was not the cause of our ill success against Toulon. 3. That it is no way chargeable on the late Ministry, who formed the design with the greatest secrecy, and made the most effectual preparations for it, and did all they could to put off the expedition to Naples, and remove every difficulty, that might hinder the success of it. And, lastly, That it was not discovered first by any creature of the late Ministry, nor

1707. war of the line, five of a less rank, and one yacht (1). On the 22d of October, he had ninety fathom water in the Soundings, and brought the fleet to, and lay by from twelve till about six in the afternoon, the weather being hazy; but then, the wind coming up fresh at South South-west, he made the signal for sailing. The fleet steered East by North, supposing they had the Channel open, when some of the ships were upon the rocks to the Westward of Scilly, before they were aware, about eight of the clock at night, and made a signal of distress. The Association, in which Sir Cloudeſly was, struck upon the rocks called The Biſhop and his Clerks, and was lost, with all the men in it; as were also the Eagle and the Romney. The Firebrand was likewise dashed on the rocks, and founder'd; but the Captain and four and twenty of his men saved themselves in the boat. Captain Sansom, who commanded the Phoenix, being driven on the rocks within the Island, saved all his men, but was forced to run his ship a-shore. The Royal Anne was saved by a great presence of mind, both in Sir George Byng, and his officers and men, who, in a minute's time, set her top-sails, one of the rocks not being a ship's length to the leeward of her, and the other, on which Sir Cloudeſly Shovel was lost, as near as in a breach of the sea. Nor had the Lord Durſley, Commander of the St. George, a less strange escape; for his ship was dashed on the same ridge of rocks with the Association, and the same wave, which he saw beat out all Sir Cloudeſly Shovel's lights, set his own ship a-boat. Sir Cloudeſly Shovel's body being, the next day after this misfortune, taken up by some country-fellows, was stripped and buried in the sand; but, on enquiry made by the boats of the Salisbury and Antelope, it was discovered where he was hid;

from whence being taken out, and brought on board the Salisbury into Plymouth on the 28th of October, it was afterwards carried to London, and decently interred in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected in honour of the Admiral, who was one of the greatest Sea-Commanders of that, or any other age; of undaunted courage and resolution, and, at the same time eminent for his generosity, frankness, and integrity. He was the artificer of his own fortune; and, by his personal merit alone, from the lowest beginnings, raised himself to almost the highest station in the navy. He was born in the County of Suffolk of mean parentage, and, having an early inclination to the sea, became a cabin-boy to Sir Christopher Mingo, and, improving daily by quick progress in the knowledge of naval affairs, was soon advanced to the rank of Lieutenant; and gave early proofs of his valour on the 14th of January 1673-4, when, being Lieutenant to Sir John Narborough, Admiral of the English fleet in the Mediterranean, he burnt in the harbour, and under the castle of Tripoli, four men of war belonging to the Pirates of that place, which forced them to accept such conditions of peace, as Sir John Narborough was pleased to prescribe them. He distinguished himself in the first sea-engagement, that happened after the Revolution, in Bantry-Bay, on the 1st of May 1689, for which he received the honour of Knighthood, being the Commander of the Edgar. He was soon after advanced to the post of a Flag-officer; and upon, the breaking out of the war in 1702, he was sent, with a Squadron of about twenty men of war to join the grand fleet, and bring home the Galleons, and other rich booty, taken by the Duke of Ormond and Sir George Rooke at Vigo. The next year he was appointed to command in chief had France any suspicion, till the expedition was actually begun, as any one may see, that will look back into the history of that affair. Dr. Hare, in the Postscript to the Fourth Part of the Allies and the late Ministry defended, p. 78, 79, observes, That in the passage above-cited, where he mentions, That the design on Toulon was discovered by the Clerk of a Great Man, who was then Secretary of State, he did not mean Gregg, who was afterwards hanged, but another person then alive; nor did he mean a direct discovery made to France, but such a one, as was occasioned by laying wagers; a folly, which the person hinted at has paid dearly for.

A late Writer pretends to have discovered the secret springs of raising the siege of Toulon, and the peaceable retreat of the Duke of Savoy's army. 'France (says he) perceiving the loss of Toulon would be a mortal blow, ordered Buzenval (her Minister to the King of Sweden then in Saxony) to try to engage that victorious Prince to declare against the Emperor. Count Monasterelli, the Bavarian Minister, had the same orders. These two Ministers gained Count Piper, who had a great ascendancy over his Master. The King of Sweden, who had given repeated assurances not to undertake any thing against the Allies, was very much embarrassed. He fought a quarrel with the Emperor, and to that end made exorbitant demands, accompanied with threatnings to invade Silesia and Bohemia. The Emperor laid the storm by agreeing to all his demands. Whilst the treaty was negotiating, the siege of Toulon was undertaken. The King of Sweden, who wished to hinder the loss of that place, caused it to be insinuated with great secrecy to the Duke of Savoy, not to persist in the siege of Toulon, because, if it was taken, he should be obliged to invade the Emperor's Hereditary Dominions. The Duke of Savoy, who had a great penetration and foresight, reflected, that the King of Sweden was steadfast in his resolutions, and that his success had given him that steadfastness; that, after all, the matter was only the taking of a town, which perhaps it would be difficult to keep, and would be demolished. These weighty considerations induced the Duke, by an unparallel'd generosity, to prefer the interests of the common cause to the advantage of taking Toulon. Hence the secret reason of raising the siege. This circumstance is said to be warrantable by the Duke himself, who was pleased to declare it to some persons of distinction. French continuation of Rapin, Vol. II. 172.

chief the Confederate fleet designed for the Streights, consisting of thirty-five English, and fourteen Dutch men of war; and, being come into Leghorn road, maintained the honour of the English Union-flag, and forced the Governor of that City to give him a royal salute, which he had at first refused. In that expedition, Sir Claude endeavoured to supply the Cevennois with money, arms, and ammunition; but, for want of intelligence, the Cevennois not coming to the sea-shore, the Admiral expressed a great concern, that he could not relieve them, having been always zealous for Liberty and the Protestant Religion. In June 1704, he joined the grand fleet, commanded by Sir George Rooke, in the Mediterranean, had his share in the honour of taking Gibraltar, and by his bravery and admirable conduct in the sea-fight, that happened soon after, obliged the enemy's van to bear away out of the reach of his cannon; and, tho' but the second in command, yet he got the principal honour of the day, and contributed most to the preservation of the Confederate fleet. For this signal piece of service, he was, some months after, appointed Rear-Admiral of England, and Admiral and Commander in chief of her Majesty's fleet, in conjunction with the Earl of Peterborough. In 1706, he commanded the whole Confederate fleet, which had on board ten thousand men, under the command of Earl Rivers, designed for a descent upon France; but, being detained by contrary winds in Torbay, till the 1st of October, the Admiral, according to his new orders, failed for Lisbon, and from thence to Alicant, where having set on shore the land-forces, he returned to Lisbon, to prepare for a greater expedition in the year 1707; and, accordingly, in the latter end of June that year, he cast anchor in the road of Nice, where he nobly entertained the Duke of Savoy, Prince Eugene, and the English and Dutch Ministers on board his ship, and with them concerted measures for the attack of Toulon; and had the satisfaction of seeing eight of the enemy's capital ships burnt and destroyed.

sea.

France set out no fleet this year, and yet the British Nation never had greater losses on that element. The Prince of Denmark's Council was very unhappy in the whole conduct of the cruisers and convoys. The Merchants made heavy complaints, and, not without reason. Convoys were sometimes denied them; and, when they were granted, they were often delayed beyond the time limited for the Merchants to get their ships in readiness; and the sailing orders were sometimes sent them so unhappily (but, as many said, so treacherously) that a French Squadron was then lying in their way, to intercept them. This was liable to very severe reflections; for many of the Convoys, as well as the Merchants ship, were taken.

However, about this time an account was brought of the success of Captain Underdown, Commander of the Falkland, in his expedition against the French fisheries in the North of America, in which the French sustained the following damage: Two ships taken, one of thirty guns, and an hundred men; one ship taken and burnt, of twenty guns, and eighty men; two ships burnt by the enemy, one of thirty-two, and another of twenty-six guns; two hundred and twenty-eight fishing boats burnt; four hundred and seventy boats and sloops, that were not employed in the fishery this season; twenty-three stages, and twenty-three train fats burnt; seventy-seven thousand two hundred and eighty quintals of fish; and one thousand five hundred and sixty eight hogheads of train oil destroyed. But all this was too inconsiderable, to alleviate the loss of the men and ships that perished with Sir Claude Schovel.

This year there was carried on a negotiation, in which the Allies were greatly concerned, and in which the Queen of Great-Britain, in particular, made not the least figure. The Dukes of Nemours, Princes of Neuchâtel and Valangin, dying at Paris on the 16th of June, N. S. no less than thirteen Competitors laid claim to that Sovereignty.

Among these Competitors, were the King of Prussia, and several of the French Nation, of whom the Prince of Conti was the chief (1). Upon news of the Dukes's death (in whom the House of Longueville ended) the Prince of Conti, and some other of the French Competitors, repaired to Neuchâtel; and others sent their Ministers and Agents thither, to prosecute their respective claims.

(1) The Competitors were: 1. The King of Prussia, as Heir to the House of Orange, and consequently of that of Châlons. 2. The Marquis of Maily, in the name of his Lady, who stiled herself Princess of Orange, and pretended to be Heiress of the House of Châlons. 3. The Prince of Baden Durlach, by virtue of an agreement, made in the year 1490. between the families of Hochberg-Neuchâtel and Hochberg-Baden. 4. The Prince of Conti, as universal Heir to the late Duke of Longueville. 5. The Chevalier de Saifons's relict, who stiled herself Princess of Neuchâtel, by virtue of a deed or gift, made by the late Dukes of Nemours, of that principality to the said Chevalier, although he could not be ignorant of the decree of the three Estates, dated March the 8th, 1694, whereby they declared the said deed and gift void and illegal, and acknowledged the said Dukes of Nemours, merely as the only sister, and the next Heir to the late Duke of Longueville. 6. The Prince of Carignan, as nephew, on the mother's side, to the late Dukes of Nemours; but, this Sovereignty being devolved to her by the right of her father, the Count of Matignon, and the Dukes of Lesdiguières, who set up the seventh and eighth Candidates, objected, that being Heirs by right of consanguinity, viz. the first, nephew to the Dukes of Nemours, in the third degree, and the Dukes in the fourth, the said Count pretended, that the principality ought to be adjudged to him, as the next Heir, though of a later descent; and, on the other hand, the Dukes of Lesdiguières contended, that the Lineal Succession being to take place, the principality ought to be conferred on her by right of Primogeniture, as being descended from the eldest. 9. The Count of Montbelliard. 10. The Baron of Montjoy, as a descendant of the House of Châlons. 11. The Prince of Furstenburgh, by titles, which he could not produce. 12. The Marquis d' Allegre, in the right of his Lady, as descended from the House of Châlons. 13. The Swiss Canton of Uri claimed the City and County of Neuchâtel, because when that State, which formerly belonged to the thirteen Cantons of Switzerland, was yielded by twelve of them, the Canton of Uri refused to subscribe the deed of resignation.

1707. French King's resentment towards the inhabitants of Neuchâtel, if they admitted a stranger in competition with his subjects, having been industriously spread among the people, and other artifices used, to induce them to make choice of a Frenchman; Count Metternich, the Prussian Ambassador, acquainted the Magistracy, that the King, his Master, would be supported by the whole Confederacy in the justice of his pretensions. Accordingly, Mr. Abraham Stanyan, the Queen of Great-Britain's Envoy Extraordinary to the Protestant Cantons, in a memorial to the Magistrates of Bern, recommended his Prussian Majesty's right, and repaired to Neuchâtel. The day after his arrival, he delivered by his Secretary two letters from the Queen; in the first of which, directed to the Governor and Counsellors of State of the Sovereignty of Neuchâtel and Valengin, she said, "That, having been informed of the death of the Dutchess of Nemours, her Majesty thought there was an indispensable obligation incumbent upon her to write to them in favour of his Prussian Majesty, that, by virtue of his right to the City and Country of Neuchâtel, both by hereditary title, and by the cession of the late King of Great-Britain, William the Third, her Brother, they would acknowledge and admit him for their lawful Sovereign. That she hoped they would do it the more readily, not only because that Prince was united with them by the sacred bond of the Reformed Religion, which both he and they equally professed; but also because he had hitherto shewn the same care and affection for their interests, which he ever expressed for the good and advantage of his own good subjects. Wherefore her Majesty did not doubt, that, being mindful of their country's welfare, and endowed with so much prudence as they were, they would carefully avoid chusing for their Prince a person, who being a subject, and intirely devoted to the Government of France, ought, for that reason, to be as suspected to them, as he would be to her Majesty, and to all her other Allies: Which persuaded her at the same time, that, without any delay, they would grant his Prussian Majesty's just demand; and, as the same would give her Majesty a singular satisfaction, so, on her part, she would ever be disposed to shew them the effects of her friendship." The Queen's letter to the Ministres and Counsellors of Neuchâtel was much to the same purpose; and the Secretary presented at the same time to the Council of State a memorial in behalf of the King of Prussia. Not long after Mr. Runckell, Envoy from the States-General, arrived at Neuchâtel, with instructions to join with Mr. Stanyan in all proper measures to assist Count Metternich; and a letter from the King of Sweden to the Canton of Bern, in favour of the King of Prussia, added no small weight to the interposition of Great-Britain and Holland.

The Allies looked on this as a matter of great consequence; since it might end in a rupture between the Protestant Cantons and France, for the Popish Cantons were now wholly theirs. After much pleading and a long debate, the States of the Principality gave judgment in favour of the King of Prussia, to whom the Investiture of Neuchâtel was solemnly granted on the 3d of November, N. S. The French Competitors protested against this, and left the place in high discontent: The French Ambassador threatened that little State with an invasion, and all commerce with them was forbid. The Canton of Bern espoused their concern with a spirit and a zeal, which was not expected from them, and declaring, they were in a Comburghership with them, came to an unanimous resolution, to defend the Principality of Neuchâtel with all their forces; pursuant to which resolution, they sent, a few days after, four thousand five hundred of their men to the frontiers of Neuchâtel. The French continued to threaten, and Marshal de Villars had orders to march a great part of his army towards them. But, when the Court of France saw, that the Cantons of Bern and Zurich were not terrified by those marches, they let the whole matter fall, very little to their honour; and so the intercourse between the French Dominions and that State was again opened, and the peace of the Cantons was secured. The King of Prussia engaged his honour, that he would govern that State with a particular zeal for advancing both Religion and Learning in it; and upon these assurances he persuaded the Bishops of England, and the Bishop of Sarum in particular, to use their best endeavours to promote his pretensions; upon which they wrote, in the most effectual manner they could, to Monsieur Ostervald, who was the most eminent Ecclesiastic of that State, and one of the best and most judicious Divines of the age. He was bringing that Church to a near agreement with the forms of worship in the Church of England. The King of Prussia was well disposed in all matters of Religion, and had made a great step, in order to reconcile the Lutherans and the Calvinists in his Dominions, by requiring them not to preach to the people on those points, in which they differed, and by obliging them to communicate together, notwithstanding the diversity of their opinions; which was indeed the only wise and honest way of making up their breach.

The Protestant Cantons of Switzerland observing the zeal, which the King of Sweden shewed in favour of their Religion, in supporting the pretensions of the King of Prussia to the Principality of Neuchâtel, by his letter to the King of France, as well as to the Cantons, sent to him a French Gentleman of Quality, the Marquis de Rochegude, to let him know, what regard they had to his recommendations, and to desire him to interpose his good offices with the French King, for setting at liberty about three hundred persons, who were condemned to the galleys, and treated most cruelly in them, upon no other pretence, but because they would not change their Religion, and had endeavoured to make their escape out of France. The King of Sweden received this message with a particular civility, and immediately complied with it; ordering his Minister at the Court of France, to make it his desire to that King, that these Confessors might be delivered to him. But the Ministers of France said, That was a point of the King's Government at home, in which he could not suffer foreign Princes to meddle. The King of Sweden seemed sensible of this neglect; and it was hoped, that, when his affairs would admit of it, he would express a due resentment of it.

Whilst the House of Austria was struggling this year with great difficulties, two pieces of 1707. pomp and magnificence consumed a great part of their treasure. An embassy was sent from Lisbon to demand the Emperor's sister for that King, which was done with an unusual and extravagant expence. A wife was to be sought for King Charles among the Protestant Courts, for there was not a suitable match in the Popish. He had seen the Princess of Anspach, and was much pleased with her; so that great applications were made to persuade her to change her Religion; but she could not be prevailed on to buy a Crown at so dear a rate; and, soon after, she was married to the Electoral Prince of Brunswick, and her firmness to the Protestant Religion rewarded with the Crown of Great-Britain. The Princess of Wulsenbuttle was not so firm; she was brought therefore to Vienna, and some time after married by proxy to King Charles, and sent to Italy in her way to Spain. The solemnity, with which these matters were managed, amidst all the distress of the Austrian affairs, consumed a vast deal of treasure; for such was the pride of those Courts on such occasions, that, rather than fail in a point of splendor, they would let their most important affairs go to wreck. That Princess was landed at Barcelona; and the Queen of Portugal, the same year, came to Holland, to be carried to Lisbon by a squadron of the English fleet.

The City of Hamburg was this year thrown into great confusion by a contest, which arose between some private persons, one of whom was a Lutheran Minister, and gave occasion to a division there. One side was protected by the Senate, which so highly disgusted the other, that it was like to end in a revolt against the Magistrates, and a civil war within the City; and it being known, that the King of Denmark had, for many years, an eye on that place, the neighbouring Princes apprehended, that he might take advantage from those commotions, or that the weaker side might chuse rather to fall under his power, than under the revenge of the adverse party. The Kings of Sweden and Prussia, with the House of Brunswick, resolved therefore to send troops thither, to quiet this distraction, and to chastise the more refractory; while the Emperor's Ministers, together with the Queen's, endeavoured to accommodate matters, without suffering them to run to extremities.

Mil. Hist.

Before the opening the campaign this year in Flanders, a very extraordinary attempt was made by a partizan in the Imperial army for carrying off the Dauphin, or some other Prince of the blood of France, which very narrowly missed of success. This man's name was Queintem; he had served the Prince of Conti, as a Valet de Chambre, when he went to Hungary; he afterwards became one of the Elector of Bavaria's band of music, and then his huntsman. Some of the Princes of Germany used to have a great number of those huntsmen, whom in time they incorporated into their troops. This man going over to the Imperialists served as a partizan, and was honoured with a brevet as a Colonel for some good services he had performed. This animated him to do still greater things; and, the alterations produced by the battle of Ramillies making it no difficult matter to get from Flanders into France, he formed a project of carrying off some Prince of the blood from the road between Verfailles and Paris; and, it was generally believed, that his view was particularly upon the Dauphin. In order to effect this, he made choice of sixteen Officers and fourteen Dragoons, all enterprizing men, and of great resolution. He procured three passports, each for ten men; and having given them to persons, whom he could trust, he divided his troop into three small corps, each of which entered France by a different route, joining in the neighbourhood of Paris. The two Commanders of his small squadrons were directed by him, that ten should post themselves in the wood of Chantilly, ten at St. Ouen, and the other ten at Seve, on the road from Paris to Verfailles; these last, to prevent discovery, were lodged in different public houses. One of them, who was a Lieutenant, went frequently to Paris, where he sold two English horses. He walked from time to time in the street of Seve, and on the bridge, that crosses the Seine there. He one day met the Duke of Oleams, but it happened to be too light for him to undertake any thing. Two days after the Dauphin and the Princesses passed him, going to hunt in the wood Boulogne; but they were too well attended for the partizan to hope any thing from an attack. At last, on the 24th of March, he, who was sentinel, perceiving Monsieur de Berrington, first Equerry to the King, in a coach and six, with the King's liveries, with a few attendants, it being but half an hour past seven in the evening, took him for some Prince of the blood, and immediately made a signal for the nine others, who passed the bridge. As for the sentinel, those, who guarded the bridge, seeing him cross it three or four times in a hurry, at last threw down the barrier, stopped him, and gave notice to the Grand Provost. In the mean time his nine companions, among whom was the partizan Queintem, stopped the coach, and put out the flambeaux; and then the partizan taking Monsieur le Premier (so in France they style the King's first equerry) by the sleeve, told him, that they arrested him by the King's order. Monsieur le Premier answered, that he just came from his Majesty; that he would be glad to know who he (the partizan) was, and whether he had not some Officer with him, to whom he might speak. The partizan, without making him any answer, obliged him to get out of the coach, and mount a spare horse, which one of the servants rid. Monsieur le Premier's Valet de Chambre would have followed him, had not one of the soldiers threatened to shoot him, upon which his master bid him go back; but he desired, that he might have his cloak; upon which one of the men took it from his servant, and threw it upon his shoulders. He, who was stopped at Seve, was their guide; and his loss proved a great misfortune to them, because it retarded them very much in their journey. They turned by the walls of the wood of Boulogne, from whence they went to St. Ouen, where they had left a post-chaise, with the ten men above-mentioned; but, as they did not know the roads perfectly, they lost a good deal of time in getting to that place. Monsieur le Premier's Valet de Chambre soon carried the news of his Master's misfortune to Verfailles, so that the King heard of it by nine o'clock, and sent an order to Monsieur Chamillard to dispatch Couriers immediately to the Intendants to stop all the passages. He sent likewise an exempt with twenty lie-guards to follow the partizan. Monsieur 1707: d'Epines and all the other Equerries mounted and rode, some towards Normandy, some towards Flanders, and others towards Germany. They learned, that, Monseigneur le Premier finding himself much out of order, the Partizan made a halt for three hours to give him time to rest, and had even cut and lowered the back of the chaise, which hindered its going, that his prisoner might be the less incommoded. The Guards and Equerries rode so fast, and spread intelligence so quick, that the Partizan, as he got out of the forest of Chanilli, heard the alarm-bell ring in all the villages; upon which he began to doubt of the success of his expedition: However, he went on boldly and undisturbed as far as Ham, where he was discovered by a Quarter-Master, who rode up to him, and clapped a pistol to his throat. The Partizan, finding himself surrounded on all sides, was obliged to surrender. Monseigneur le Premier immediately cried out, That he had been extremely well used, and desired, that the man might not be hurt. He kept him that night to supper with him, carried him on his parole back to Versailles, and lodged him there in his own apartments. Madam de Beringsben, who happened to be gone before her husband in another coach, made the Partizan a very considerable present for the civilities which he had shewn Monseigneur le Premier. It is certain, that nothing but his condescension in stopping those three hours hindered him from getting clear off, since, at the place where he was stopped, he was within three hours march of a place of safety; and on this account it was, that he and his companions were discharged.

The affairs of Ireland. This was the state of our affairs abroad, both by sea and land. During these transactions, a Parliament was held at Dublin by the Earl of Pembroke, who was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. At the opening of the Session, on the 7th of July, he made a speech, wherein, among other things, he said, "That the Queen, considering the number of Papists in Ireland, would be glad of any expedient for the strengthening the interest of her Protestant subjects. That, the public service requiring that several regiments should be sent abroad, the Queen intended to supply the like number of forces, for the security of that Kingdom; and he did not doubt, but they would provide Supplies for them, as well as for defraying the expence of the Government."

Both Houses addressing the Queen, the Lords, it is said*, omitted congratulating her upon the late Union of England and Scotland, which the so much valued herself upon; whilst the Commons not only mentioned the glory she had acquired by it, but hinted at a much more Comprehensive Union. To this the Queen answered, "They might be sure, nothing should be wanting to make the Union of all her subjects as extensive as possible." Some thought this related to a comprehension in matters of Religion; but others more reasonably supposed, that, by their Comprehensive Union, the Commons meant the uniting of Ireland as well as Scotland with England, and forming the three Kingdoms into one.

Pursuant to the Queen's desire, expressed in his Excellency's speech, for strengthening the Protestant interest, a bill was brought in by the Commons, for explaining an act to prevent the farther growth of Popery, and it was resolved, I. That any Protestant Guardian, that permits a Papist to educate and dispose of his ward, does thereby betray the trust reposed in him, evade the law, and propagate Popery. II. That any Papist, who shall take upon him to manage and dispose of the substance and person of any infant committed to a Protestant Guardian, is guilty of a notorious breach of the law. III. That altering a Protestant Guardian duly appointed, without sufficient reason, is a discouragement to the execution of the act against the further growth of Popery. However, when the Committee had gone through the bill, and agreed to every paragraph except one (by which the sons of Papists that should turn Protestants might be injured) the House disagreed to that, and rejected the bill. But it was unanimously resolved, that all Popish Priests were obliged to take the oath of abjuration by the laws in force, and that it was the indispensable duty of all Judges and Magistrates to put those laws in execution.

The House of Commons having appointed a Committee to inspect the public accounts, upon their report being read, it was resolved, I. That this Kingdom had been put to excessive charge, by means of great arrears of rent, returned by the late Trustees, to be due out of the forfeited estates of this Kingdom; and that most of the said arrears returned appear to be unjust charges on the subject, and false returns, by receipts under the hand of the Trustees, or their Receivers, or entries in their own books. II. That an humble representation be laid before her Majesty, of the great charge and pressure the Kingdom lies under, by the said returns, and several other the oppressive proceedings of the late Trustees.

The House also resolved, That it would greatly conduce to the relief of the poor, and the good of that Kingdom, that the inhabitants should use no other than their own manufactures in their apparel, and the furniture of their houses; and all the Members mutually agreed and engaged their Honours to each other, that they would conform to the said resolution.

The Commons having granted the necessary Supplies, and the several bills they were upon being ready for the Royal assent, the Lord-Lieutenant gave it to

An act for registering lands, deeds, &c.

An act to explain an act to prevent Papists being Solicitors.

An act for explaining and limiting the privileges of Parliament.

An act for the more effectual preventing the taking away, and marrying Children against the wills of their parents.

And several other acts public and private.

This done, the Parliament was prorogued from the 29th of October to the 6th of May, and the Earl of Pembroke returned to England.

During the campaign, things went in England Proceeding in their ordinary channel. But the conduct, with relation to Scotland, was more unaccountable. For whereas it might have been reasonably expected, that the management of the newly-united part of this Island should have been particularly taken care of, so as to give no just distaste to the Scots, nor offer an handle to those, who were still endeavouring to inflame that Nation, and to increase their aversion to the Union; things

1707. things were, on the contrary, so ordered, as if the design had been to contrive methods to exasperate the spirits of the people there. Though the management of the Scots revenue was to fall into the Lord Treasurer's hands on the first of May, no care was taken to have all the Commissions ready at the day, with new officers to serve in them; so that the whole trade of Scotland was stopped for almost two months for want of orders, to put it into the new course, in which it was to be carried on. Three months passed before the Equivalent was sent to Scotland; and, when wines and other merchandize were imported into England from thence, seizures were every where made; and this was managed with a particular affectation of roughness. All these things heightened the prejudices, with which that Nation had been possessed against the Union. It was also known, that many messages passed between Scotland and France; and that there were many meetings and much consultation among the discontented party there. A great body appeared openly for the Pretender, and celebrated his birth-day very publicly, both at Edinburgh, and in other places of the Kingdom; and it was openly talked, that there was now an opportunity, that was not to be lost, of invading the Kingdom, though with a small force; and that a general concurrence from the body of that Nation might be depended upon. These things were done in so public a manner, that no check being given to them, nor enquiry made after them, by those, who were in the Government, it gave occasion to many melancholy speculations. The management from England looked like a thing concerted to heighten that distemper; and the whole conduct of the fleet afforded great cause of jealousy.

But, to open this more clearly, it will be necessary to give an account of a new scene at Court. It was observed, that Mr. Harley, who had been for some years Secretary of State, had gained great credit with the Queen, and began to set up for himself, and to act no more under the direction of the Lord Treasurer. There was one of the Bed-chamber-women, Mrs. Abigail Hill (1), who, being nearly related to the Duchess of Marlborough, had been taken care of by her, together

A new party at Court.

(1) The Duchess of Marlborough, in the account of her Conduct, p. 177, &c. gives the following account of Mrs. Hill and her practices. She was the daughter of Mr. Hill, a Merchant in London, by a sister of the Duchess's father. Mr. Hill lived very well for many years, till turning projector, he brought ruin upon himself and his family. The Duchess of Marlborough never knew, that there were such people in the world, till after the Princess Anne was married, and when she lived at the Cockpit; at which time an acquaintance of the Duchess came to her, and said, That she believed she did not know, that she had relations, who were in want; and gave her an account of them. The Duchess answered, That indeed she had never heard before of any such relations; and immediately gave out of her purse ten guineas for their present relief, saying, she would do what she could for them; and afterwards sent Mrs. Hill more money, and saw her.

Mrs. Hill told the Duchess, that her husband was in the same relation to Mr. Harley, as she was to the Duchess, but that he had never done any thing for her. Mr. Hill and his wife died not long after this, and left two sons and two daughters. The elder daughter (afterwards Mrs. Mafham) was a grown woman. The Duchess took her to St. Albans, where she lived with her Grace and her children, and was treated by her Grace with as great kindness, as if she had been her sister. After some time a Bed-chamber-woman of the Princess of Denmark died; and, as in that reign (after the Princesses were grown up) rockers, though not Gentlewomen, had been advanced to be Bed-chamber-women, the Duchess procured the vacant place for Mrs. Hill, whose younger sister she likewise took care of, and got to be made laundress to the Duke of Glocester, and afterwards obtained a pension for her of two hundred pounds a year. The elder brother was, at the Duchess's request, put into a place at the Custom-House; the younger, whom the bottlemen, says the Duchess, afterwards called Honest Jack Hill, was a tall boy, whom I clothed (for he was all in rags) put to school at St. Albans to one Mr. James, who had been an Usher under Dr. Busby of Westminster; and, whenever I went to St. Albans, I sent for him, and was as kind to him, as if he had been my own child. After he had learned what he could there, a vacancy happening of Page of Honour to the Prince of Denmark, his Highness was pleased, at my request, to take him. I afterwards got my Lord Marlborough to make him Groom of the Bed-chamber to the Duke of Glocester; and though my Lord always said, that Jack Hill was good for nothing, yet, to oblige me, he made him his Aid de camp, and afterwards gave him a regiment.

But it was his sister's interest, that raised him to be a General, and to command in that ever-memorable expedition to Quebec. I had no share in doing him these honours. To finish what I have to say upon this subject; when Mr. Harley thought it useful to attack the Duke of Marlborough in Parliament, this Quebec General, this honest Jack Hill, this once ragged boy, whom I clothed, happening to be sick in bed, was nevertheless persuaded by his sister to get up, wrap himself in warmer clothes than those I had given him, and go to the House to vote against the Duke. I may add here, that even the husband of Mrs. Mafham had several obligations to me. It was at my instance, that he was first made a Page, then a Querry, and afterwards Groom of the Bed-chamber to the Prince; for all which he himself thanked me, as for favours procured by my means.

As for Mrs. Mafham herself, I had so much kindness for her, and had done so much to oblige her, without having ever done any thing to offend her, that it was too long before I could bring myself to think her other than a true friend, or forbear rejecting at an instance of favour shewn her by the Queen. I observed indeed at length, that she was grown more shy of coming to me, and more reserved than usual, when she was with me; but I imputed this to her peculiar moroseness of temper, and for some time made no other reflection upon it. The first thing, which led me into enquiries about her conduct, was the being told, in the summer of 1707, that my cousin Hill was privately married to Mr. Mafham. I went to her, and asked her, if it were true. She owned it was, and begged my pardon for having concealed it from me. As much reason as I had to take ill this reserve in her behaviour, I was willing to impute it to bashfulness and want of breeding, rather than to any thing worse. I embraced her with my usual tenderness, and very heartily wished her joy; and then, turning the discourse, entred into her concerns in as friendly a manner as possible, contriving how to accommodate her with lodgings, by removing her sister into some of my own. I then inquired of her very kindly, whether the Queen knew of her marriage, and very innocently offered her my service, if she needed it, to make that matter easy. She had by this time learned the art of dissimulation pretty well, and answered with an air of uncertainty, that the Bed-chamber-woman had already acquainted the Queen with it, hoping, by this answer to divert any further examination into the matter. But I went presently to the Queen, and asked her, Why she had not been so kind, as to tell me of my Cousin's marriage, expostulating with her upon the point, 1707. together with her whole family (for they were fallen very low) in a most particular manner. She brought her not only into that post, but had treated her with such a confidence, that it had introduced her into a high degree of favour with the Queen; which, for some years, was considered as an effect of the Duchess's credit with her Majesty. She was also nearly related to Mr. Harley; and they two entered into a close correspondence. She learned the arts of a Court, and observed the Queen's temper with so much application, that she got far into her heart. She employed all her credit to establish Mr. Harley in the supreme confidence with the Queen, and to alienate her affections from the Duchess of Marlborough, who studied no other method of preserving her favour, than by pursuing the true interest of the Queen and of the Kingdom. It was said, that Prince George was brought into the concert, and that he was made to apprehend, that he had too small a share in the Government, and that he was shut out from it by the great power, which the Duke of Marlborough and the Lord Treasurer had drawn into their hands; that all depended upon them; that the Queen was only a cypher in the Government; that she was in the Duchess of Marlborough's hands, as her affairs were in the Duke's. It was likewise talked among those, who made their Court to the new Favourites, that there was not now a Jaobite in the Nation; that all were for the Queen; and that, without doubt, she would reign point, and putting her in mind of what she used often to say to me out of Montaigne, That it was no breach of promise of secrecy to tell such a friend any thing, because it was no more than telling it to one's self. All the answer I could obtain from her Majesty was this, I have a hundred times bid Matham tell it you, and she would not.

The Conduct both of the Queen and of Mrs. Masham convinced me, that there was some mystery in the affair; and thereupon I set myself to enquire as particularly as I could into it; and, in less than a week's time, I discovered, That my Cousin was become an absolute favourite; that the Queen herself was present at her Marriage in Dr. Arbuthnot's lodgings, at which time her Majesty had called for a round sum out of the privy-purse; that Mrs. Matham came often to the Queen, when the Prince was asleep, and was generally two hours every day in private with her: And I likewise then discovered Mr. Harley's correspondence and interest at Court by means of this woman.

I was struck with astonishment at such an instance of ingratitude, and should not have believed it, if there had been any room left for doubting.

My Lord Marlborough was at first no less incredulous than I, as appears from the following paragraph of a letter from him, in answer to one from me on this subject.

Meldest, June 3, 1707.

The wisest thing is to have to do with as few people as possible. If you are sure that Mrs. Matham speaks of business to the Queen, I should think, you might, with some caution, tell her of it, which would do good; for she certainly must be grateful, and will mind what you say.

It became easy now to decypher many particulars, which had hitherto remained mysterious; and my reflections quickly brought to my mind many passages, which had seemed odd and unaccountable, but had left no impressions of suspicion or jealousy. Particularly I remembered, that a long while before this, being with the Queen (to whom I had gone very privately by a secret passage from my lodgings to the bed chamber) on a sudden this woman, not knowing I was there, came in with the boldest and gayest air possible, but, upon sight of me, stopped, and immediately changing her manner, and making a most solemn courtesy, Did your Majesty ring? and then went out again. This singular behaviour needed no interpreter now to make it understood. But, not to dwell on such trifling incidents, as soon as I had got a thorough insight into her management, being naturally frank and open, I wrote to her the following letter:

September 23, 1707.

Since the conversation I had with you at your lodgings, several things have happened to confirm me in what I was hard to believe, that you have made me returns very unfavourable to what I might have expected. I always speak my mind so plainly, that I should have told you so myself, if I had had the opportunity, which

I hoped for. But, being now so near parting, think this way of letting you know it, is like to be the least uneasy to you, as well as to

Your humble Servant,

S. MARLBOROUGH.

Though I was to go to Woodstock the next day, I staid at Windsor almost all the morning to wait her answer. But this could not be had so soon, it being necessary to consult with her great director in so nice a matter. At length, however, an answer was sent after me, the whole frame and stile of which shewed it to be the genuine product of an artful man, who knew perfectly well the management of such an affair.

Windsor, September 24, 1707.

‘While I was expecting a message from your Grace, to wait upon you according to your commands, last night, I received a letter, which surprizes me no less than it afflicts me, because it lays a most heavy charge upon me of an ungrateful behaviour to your Grace. Her Majesty was pleased to tell me, that you was angry with me for not acquainting you with my marriage. I did believe, after so generous a pardon, your Grace would think no more of that. I am very confident by the expression of your letter, that somebody has told some malicious lye of me to your Grace, from which it is impossible for me to vindicate myself till I know the crime I am accused of. I am sure, Madam, your goodness cannot deny me what the meanest may ask the greatest; I mean justice, to know my accuser. Without that, all friendship must be at the mercy of every malicious liar, as they are, who have so barbarously and unjustly brought me under your displeasure, the greatest unhappiness, that could befall me. I therefore make it my most humble request to your Grace, that, if ever I had the least share of your friendship, you would be pleased to give me that parting token to let me know, who this wicked person is; and then I do not doubt but I shall make it plain how much they have wronged me, as well as imposed upon your Grace. As my affliction is very great, you will, I hope, in compassion let me hear from you, and believe me what I really am,

Madam,

Your Grace's most humble and faithful Servant,]

A. HILL.

As I believe nobody at this time doubts, whether the Writer of this letter was practising with the Queen to undermine me, I shall make no reflections upon it. My answer was in these terms:

‘I received your letter upon the road to this place; and I can assure you the occasion of my complaints did not proceed from any ill offices, that had been done you to me by any body, but from my own observation, which

1707. reign out peaceably her whole life, but she need not concern herself for a German family. These discourtesies began to break out, and gave melancholy apprehensions to those, to whom they were brought. This went on too long, little regarded. The Duchefs of Marlborough seemed secure of her interest in the Queen, and shewed no jealousy of a favour, to which herself gave the first rise. This was the state of the Court at the opening of the Parliament.

There were at that time three Bishopricks vacant. Sir Jonathan Trelawney, considerable for his birth and interest in Cornwall, had been removed the summer before from Exeter to Win- chester. The Lord-Treasurer had promised, that preferments should be bestowed on men well-principled with relation to the present Constitution, and on men of merit. The Queen, without regarding this, secretly engaged herself to Dr. Blackall for Exeter; and for Chester (being at the same time void by the death of Dr. Stratford) to Sir William Dawes. These Divines were in themselves men of merit, but their notions were all on the other side. They had submitted to the Government; but they, at least Dr. Blackall, seemed to condemn the Revolution, and all that had been done pursuant to it. Sir William Dawes was likewise looked on which makes the impression much the stronger. But I think the subject is not very proper for a letter; and therefore I must defer it till we meet, and give you no farther trouble at this time from

Your most humble Servant,

S. MARLBOROUGH.

About the same time, that I made this discovery of Mrs. Masbam's intriguing, my Lord Godolphin (as I before-mentioned) got notice of Mr. Harley's practices, both within doors and without. He was endeavouring to create in the Whigs jealousies of Lord Godolphin and Lord Marlborough; and at the same time, assuring the Tories, that they might depend upon the Queen's inward affection to them; and that it was wholly owing to those two great Lords, that the Tories were not still possessed of all the places and employments. His design was to ruin the Whigs, by disuniting them from the Ministry, and so to pave the way for the Tories to rise again, whom he thought to unite in himself, as their head, after he had made it impossible for them to think of a reconciliation with the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Godolphin. But, that this able Politician might in all things act suitably to his parts and genius, he, at the same time, that he was employed in the manner I have related, was endeavouring to blind the eyes of those whose destruction he aimed at, by the most elaborate compliments, and the most nauseous professions of affection and duty.

The Duchefs then gives several letters of Mr. Harley to the Duke and herself, wherein he extolled the Duke's services to his Country, spoke of his glory as beyond the power of envy or malice to hurt it, and professed a peculiar joy in the contemplation of it, while, at the same time, joy's she, he was contriving how to ruin that glorious man, in order to raise himself upon his ruins. The Duke was too backward to believe him capable of such designs, though it is certain he never had entertained the same good opinion of him, as my Lord Godolphin had; and though, as one may collect from a paragraph in a letter of Mr. Harley's, dated March 25, 1707, the Duke had been early warned of his practices. The paragraph contains these words:

‘ I return your Grace most hearty and humble thanks for the favourable expressions in your letter. I beg leave to assure you, that I serve you by inclination and principle, and a very little time will make that manifest, as well as that I have no views or aims of my own.’

The conduct, which Mr. Harley observed, after these assurances, was so directly contrary to them, and became quickly so notorious, that my Lord Godolphin could not help representing it to the Queen as of the utmost prejudice to her affairs. And when he found, that her Majesty would believe nothing of it, he went so far as to say, that, if Mr. Harley continued to act the part he did, and yet to have so much credit with her, as he perceived he had, Lord Marlborough and himself must of necessity quit her service. The Queen appeared pretty much alarmed at this, and presently wrote a letter to me, in which were several expressions of great kindness.

Kensington, October 30.

‘ If I have not answered all my dear Mrs. Freeman's letters (as indeed I should have done) I beg she would not impute it to any thing but the apprehension I was in of saying what might add to the ill impression she has of me. For, though I believe we are both of the same opinion in the main, I have the misfortune, that I cannot exactly agree in every thing; and therefore what I say is not thought to have the least colour of reason in it, which makes me really not care to enter into particulars. But, though I am unwilling to do it, it is impossible for me to help giving you some answer to your last letter, in which I find you think me insensible of every thing. I am very sorry, you, who have known me so long, can give way to such a thought, as that I do not think the parting with my Lord Marlborough and my Lord-Treasurer of much consequence, because I did not mention any thing of my Lord Marlborough's kind letter concerning me. The reason of this was, I really was in a great hurry, when I write to you, and, not having time to write on that subject to both, I thought it was the most necessary to endeavour to let him see he had no reason to have suspicions of any one's having power with me, besides himself and my Lord-Treasurer; and I hope they will believe me. Can dear Mrs. Freeman think, that I can be so stupid, as not to be sensible of the great services that my Lord Marlborough and my Lord-Treasurer have done me, nor of the great misfortune it would be, if they should quit my service? No, sure, you cannot believe me to be so void of sense and gratitude. I never did, nor never will give them any just reason to forsake me; and they have too much honour and too sincere a love for their Country, to leave me without a cause. And I beg you would not add that to my other misfortunes, of pushing them on to such an unjust and unjustifiable action. I think I had best say no more for fear of being too troublesome. But, whatever becomes of me, I shall always preserve a most sincere and tender passion for my dear Mrs. Freeman, to my last moment.’

After my return to London, I had another kind letter from her Majesty in the following terms:

Saturday night.

‘ My dear Mrs. Freeman, I cannot go to bed without renewing a request, that I have often made, that you would banish all unkind and unjust thoughts of your poor, unfortunate, faithful Morley, which I saw by the glimpse I had of you yesterday, you were full of. Indeed I do not deserve them; and, if you could see my heart, you would find it as sincere, as tender, and passionately fond of you as ever, and as truly sensible of your kindness in telling me your mind freely upon all occasions. Nothing shall ever alter me. Though we have the misfortune to differ in some things, I will ever be the same to my dear, dear Mrs.

1707. as an aspiring man, who would set himself at the head of the Tory party. This nomination therefore gave great disgust. To qualify this a little, Dr. Patrick, the pious and learned Bishop of Ely, dying at this time, the Queen advanced Bishop Mere from Norwich to that See; and Dr. Trimmel, a worthy person in all respects, was named for Norwich; yet this did not quiet the uneasiness, which many were under, by reason of the other nominations, which seemed to flow from the Queen herself, and so discovered her inclinations.

To prevent the ill effects, that this might have in the approaching Session, some of the eminent Members of the House of Commons were called to a meeting, with the Dukes of Somerset and Devonshire. These Lords assured them, in the Queen's name, that she was very sensible of the services, which the Whigs did her; and, though she had engaged herself so far

Mrs. Freeman, whom I do assure once more, I am more tenderly and sincerely her's than it is possible ever to express.

I was every day in expectation of hearing from Mrs. Majham, who, I supposed, would now endeavour to clear up what had created so much uneasiness between us. But, to my great surprize, I was twelve days at St. James's under the same roof with her, before I had so much as any message from her. At length, having one night passed by her window in my return home, she sent one of her maids to my woman to ask her how I did, and to let me know, that she was gone to Kenington. This behaviour was so very ridiculous, that, the next time I saw the Queen, I could not forbear speaking of it, and at the same time telling her all that had passed between us. The Queen looked grave, and said, She was mighty in the right not to come near me. I answered, that I did not understand that, since she had expressed such a concern at my displeasure, and since the clearing up of matters had been referred to our meeting. The Queen replied, that it was very natural for her to be afraid to come to me, when she saw I was angry with her. To this I answered, that she could have no reason to be afraid, unless she knew herself guilty of some crime. It was the Queen's usual way, on any occasion, where she was predetermined (as my Lord Marlborough has told me, that it was her Father's) to repeat over and over some principal words she had resolved to use, and to stick firmly to them. She continued therefore to say, It was very natural, and she was very much in the right. So that this conversation with her Majesty produced nothing but an undeniable proof, that the new favourite was deeply rooted in her heart and affections; and that it was thought more advisable to let the breach between me and Mrs. Majham grow wider and wider, than to use any method to make it up.

But now within two days Mrs. Majham contrived to make me a visit, when I was abroad. Upon observing this, and considering that our meeting could be to no purpose, but to draw fruitless and false professions from her, I gave a general order to my servants to say, whenever she should call, that I was not at home. After some time it was thought proper, that she should write to me, and desire I would see her; to which I consented, and appointed her a time. When she came, I began to tell her, that it was very plain, the Queen was much changed towards me; and that I could not attribute this to any thing but her secret management. That I knew she had been very frequently with her Majesty in private; and that the very attempt to conceal this by artifice, from such a friend as I had been to her, was alone a very ill sign, and enough to prove a very bad purpose at bottom. To this she very gravely answered, That she was sure the Queen, who had loved me extremely, would always be very kind to me. It was some minutes before I could recover from the surprize, with which so extraordinary an answer struck me. To see a woman, whom I had raised out of the dust, put on such a superior air, and to hear her assure me by way of consolation, that the Queen would be always very kind to me! At length I went on to reproach her with her ingratitude, and her secret management with the Queen to undermine those, who had so long, and with so much honour, served her Majesty. To this she answered, That she never spoke to the Queen about business, but that she sometimes gave her petitions, which came to the back-stairs, and with which she knew I did not care to be troubled. And with such insincere answers she thought to colour over the matter, while I knew for certain, she had before this, obtained pensions for several of her friends, and had frequently paid to others, out of the privy-purse, sums of money, which the Queen had ordered me to bring her; and that she was every day long with her Majesty in private. But thus our conversation ended; and, when we had fate a while silent, she rose up and said, She hoped I would give her leave to come sometimes, and enquire after my health: Which, however, it is plain she did not design to do, for she never once came near me after this. Notwithstanding this, when she owned her marriage publicly, I went with Lady Sunderland to visit her; not that I intended to have any farther intercourse with her, or to dissemble the ill opinion I had of her (as I had fully resolved to let her then know, in case I found an opportunity of speaking to her privately) but purely out of respect to the Queen, and to avoid any noise or disagreeable discourse, which my refusing that ordinary part of civility might occasion.

Not many days after this I went to pay my respects to the Queen in the Christmas holidays; and, before I went in, I learnt from the Page, that Mrs. Majham was just then sent for. The moment I saw her Majesty, I plainly perceived she was very uneasy. She stood all the while I was with her, and looked as coldly upon me, as if her intention was, that I should no longer doubt of my loss of her affections. Upon observing what reception I had, I said, I was very sorry I had happened to come so unseasonably. I was making my courtesy to go away, when the Queen, with a great deal of disorder in her face, and without speaking one word, took me by the hand; and, when thereupon I stooped to kiss her's, she took me up with a very cold embrace, and then, without one kind word, let me go. So strange a treatment of me, after my long and faithful services, and after such repeated assurances from her Majesty of an unalterable affection, made me think, that I ought, in justice to myself, as well as in regard to my Mistress's interest, to write to her in the plainest and sincerest manner possible, and expostulate with her upon her change to me, and upon the new counsels, by which she seemed to be wholly governed. My letter was in these terms:

' If Mrs. Morley will be so just as to reflect and examine impartially her last reception of Mrs. Freeman, how very different from what it has been formerly, when you were glad to see her come in, and sorry when she went away; certainly you cannot wonder at her reproaches upon an embrace, that seemed to have no satisfaction in it, but that of getting rid of her, in order to enjoy the conversation of one, that has the good fortune to please you much better, though I am sure nobody did ever endeavour it with more sincerity than Mrs. Freeman had done. And if I had considered only my interest, and that of my family, I might have borne this change without any complaint. For I believe Mrs. Morley would be sincere in doing us any good. But I have once been honoured with an open kind confidence and trust, and that made all my services agreeable; and it is not possible to lose it without a mortification too great to be passed with silence, being sure, that I have never done any thing to forfeit far with relation to those two Bishopricks, that she could not recall the promises she had made, yet for the future she was resolved to give them full content (1). But, while this was said to some Whigs, Mr. Harley, and his friends Mr. St. John and Sir Simon Harcourt, took great pains with the leaders of the Tories, particularly Sir Thomas Hanmer, Mr. Bromley, and Mr. Freeman, to engage them in the Queen's interests, assuring them, that her heart was with them; that she was weary of the tyranny of the Whigs, and longed to be delivered from it. But they were not wrought upon by that management; they either mistrusted it, as done only to ensnare them; or they had other views, which they did not think fit to own. This double-dealing came to be known, and gave occasion to much jealousy and distrust.

A little before the Session was opened, an eminent misfortune happened at sea. A convoy of five ships of the line (the Cumberland of eighty guns, Captain Richard Edwards Commandore; the Devonshire of like force; the Royal Oak of seventy guns; and the Chester and Ruby of fifty) were sent to Lisbon, to convoy thither a fleet of about a hundred and thirty sail of Merchant-ships, with merchandize, provisions, stores of war, and a thousand horses bought in England for the King of Portugal. They left Plymouth on the 9th of October, being ordered to sail, as if it had been by concert, at a time when a squadron from Dunkirk had joined another from Brest, and lay in the way, waiting for them under the command of Monsieur Forbin, and Monsieur du Gué Trouin, and making in all fourteen sail; one of seventy-two guns, others of sixty, some of fifty, and none under forty. Some advertisements were brought to the Admiralty of this conjunction, but they were not believed. When the French set upon the English ships off the Lizard, the convoy did their part very gallantly, though the enemy were almost three to one. One of the English men of war was blown up, and three of them were taken, so that only one escaped much shattered; but they had fought so long, that most of the Merchant ships had time to get away, and sailed on, not being pursued, and got safe to Lisbon. This coming almost at the same time with the loss of Admiral Shovel, the Session of Parliament begun with a melancholy face, and a dispute, upon the opening, had almost put the Houses into great disorder.

It was generally thought, that, though this was a Parliament that had now sat two years, yet it was a new Parliament, by reason it had been let fall, and was revived by a proclamation, as has been said. The consequence of this was, it, having never betrayed nor abused that confidence, by giving you a false representation of any body. My temper is naturally plain and sincere, and Mrs. Morley did like it for many years. It is not the least altered. But I cannot help thinking those things reasonable, that appear to be so. And I appeal to God Almighty, that I never designed or pursued any thing, but as I was thoroughly convinced it was for Mrs. Morley's true interest and honour: And, I think, I may safely put it to that trial, if any thing has yet proved unsuccessful, that was of any public consequence, that Mrs. Freeman has been earnest to persuade Mrs. Morley to. And it is not possible for me to dissemble, so as to appear what I am not.

So much by way of apology for what happened upon Wednesday last. And, if Mrs. Morley has any remains of the tenderness she once professed for her faithful Freeman, I would beg she might be treated one of these two ways, either with the openness and confidence of a friend, as she was for twenty years (for to pretend kindness without trust and openness of heart is a treatment for children, not friends) or else in that manner, that is necessary for the post she is in, which unavoidably forces her to be often troubling Mrs. Morley upon the account of others. And if she pleases to chuse which of these two ways, or any other she likes to have Mrs. Freeman live in, she promises to follow any rule, that is laid down, that is possible, and is resolved to her life's end, and, upon all occasions, to shew, that Mrs. Morley never had a more faithful servant.

My Lord Marlborough, or my Lord Godolphin (I have forgot which) carried my letter. The Queen took no notice of it to either of those Lords. But some days after she wrote me an answer, in which she very much softened what had passed. I was much pleased to find her Majesty in that disposition, and once more put on as easy an appearance as I could.

(1) The Duchess of Marlborough, in the account of her Conduct, p. 174, observes, that, notwithstanding the promotion of Lord Sunderland to the post of Secretary of State was carried by the Whigs, they were soon alarmed again by the Queen's choice of two High-Church Divines to fill two vacant Bishopricks. Several of the Whigs were disposed to think themselves betrayed by the Ministry; whereas the truth was, that the Queen's inclination to the Tories, being now soothed by the flatteries and insinuations of her private Counsellors, had begun to make it irksome to her to consult with her Ministers upon any promotions, either in the Church or the State. The first artifice of those Counsellors was to insinuate into the Queen notions of the high Prerogative of acting without her Ministers, and (as they expressed it) of being Queen indeed. And the nomination of persons to Bishopricks against the Judgment and Remonstrances of her Ministers, being what they knew her genius would fall in with more readily than with any thing else they could propose, they began with that; and they took care, that these Remonstrances should be interpreted by the world, and received by herself, as hard usage, a denial of common civility, and even the making her no Queen.

Her Majesty, however, to quiet the dissatisfaction of the Whigs for the late promotions, ordered her Ministers to assure them, that she would prefer no more Tories, and she gave the same assurances with her own mouth in the Cabinet-Council. And she was offered by her secret Counsellors so far to observe this promise, as to give, about the same time, the Bishopricks of Norwich to Dr. Timmels, a particular friend of Lord Sunderland's. And the also, some time after, gave the Professorship of Divinity at Oxford to Dr. Potter, the present Archbishop of Canterbury, who had Dr. Smaridge for his Competitor, recommended by the Tories. But this latter favour to the Whigs was not so easily obtained as the former. And, upon the delays, that were made in bestowing it, my Lord Marlborough thought it proper to try what credit he had with the Queen, whose glory he had carried to a height beyond that of any of her Predecessors. He wrote therefore a very moving letter to her, complaining of the visible loss of his interest with her, and particularly of her so long deferring the promotion he had promised, of the person recommended by her Ministry, as a faithful friend to her Government, adding, that the only way was to make her reign easy, was to be true to that rule, which she had professed to lay down, of preferring none of those, who appeared against her service and the Nation's interest, &c. He wrote at the same time to the same effect to me, and I wrote to the Queen; and at length by much sollicitation this matter was obtained, and Dr. Potter fixed in the Professorship.

1707. was, that they, who had got places, were to be re-elected. Others maintained, that it could not be a new Parliament, since it was not summoned by a new writ, but by virtue of a clause in an act of Parliament. Mr. Secretary Harley was for maintaining it to be an old Parliament; but the Duke of Marlborough, upon his coming over, prevailed to have it yielded to be a new one.

The first Session of the first Parliament of Great-Britain. Oct. 23.

Accordingly, when, on the 23d of October, the first Parliament of Great-Britain met at Westminster, all the forms usual in the beginning of a new Parliament were observed. The Queen came to the House of Peers, and, the Commons being sent for, they were directed by the Lord-Chancellor to return to their House, and chuse a Speaker, and present him that day se'nnight. They unanimously made choice of Mr. Smith their former Speaker, and then adjourned to the 30th of the same month. The Lords also adjourned to the same day, after thirteen Peers, of that part of Great-Britain called Scotland, had been admitted to their places, by virtue of their respective writs, each being introduced by two English Peers of the same rank.

On the 30th, the Queen came again to the House of Peers, and the Commons, being sent for, presented their Speaker, whose election was approved. Then the Lord-Chancellor acquainted both Houses with her Majesty's pleasure, that they should adjourn to the 6th of November; on which day the Queen made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Queen's Speech to the first British Parliament. Nov. 6. P. H. C. IV. 70.

" I T is with all humble thankfulness to Almighty God, and entire satisfaction to myself, that I meet you here in this first Parliament of Great-Britain, not doubting, but you come with hearts prepared, as mine is, to make this Union so prosperous, as may answer the well grounded hopes of all my good subjects, and the reasonable apprehensions of our enemies.

" To this end nothing is so immediately material, as to convince, as soon as possible, both our friends and our enemies, that the uniting of our interests has not only improved our abilities, but our resolutions also, to prosecute this just and necessary war, till we obtain a safe and honourable peace for Ourselves and for our Allies.

" In so great and extensive a war as this is, many things may be usefully undertaken, which are not fit to be communicated beforehand. The attempt upon Toulon was of this nature; and, though it had not wholly its desired effect, has nevertheless been attended with many great and obvious advantages to the common cause in this year, and has made our way more easy, I hope, to greater in the next.

" As the French have gained ground upon us in Spain, so they have been wholly driven out of Italy, by which it is become more easy for all the Allies to join their Assistance next year for enabling the King of Spain to recover his affairs in that Kingdom, and to reduce the whole Spanish Monarchy to his obedience.

" The Weakness and ill posture of affairs upon the Rhine, in the beginning of the year, has given an opportunity to the French to make themselves stronger in all other parts:

" But this defect seems in a very promising way of being fully remedied against next campaign, by the conduct and authority of the Elector of Hanover, whose reasonable acceptance of that command has strengthened and obliged the whole Confederacy.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

" The just application of the sums given me by former Parliaments, the plain necessity of continuing this war, the reasonable prospect of putting a good end to it, if we be not wanting to ourselves, and the honour of the first Parliament of Great Britain, are, I make no doubt, sufficient arguments to incite you to provide the necessary Supplies, which I am obliged to desire of you for the ensuing campaign in all parts, and particularly for the timely support of the King of Spain, and the making good our treaty with Portugal; as also for strengthening the Confederate army under the Command of the Duke of Savoy; all which services, I do not doubt, but you will think so necessary, that they ought not to be neglected, even though they should require an augmentation.

" The sums already expended in this war have been very great; and they are sufficient proofs how well satisfied my subjects have always been with the ends of my Government; of which I am so sensible, as never to ask any Supplies from them, but what are absolutely necessary for the preservation of Religion and Liberty. I look upon it as my great happiness, that I have not the least interest separate from that of all my good subjects.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" In a work so great and new in its kind as that of the Union, it is impossible, but that some doubts and difficulties must have arisen, which, however, I hope, are so far overcome, as to have defeated the design of those, who would have made use of that handle to foment disturbances.

" There are several matters expressly made liable, by the articles of the Union, to the consideration of the Parliament of Great-Britain, which, together with such others, as may reasonably produce those advantages, that, with due care, must certainly arise from that treaty, I earnestly recommend to your serious consideration.

" On my part, nothing shall be wanting to procure to my people all the blessings, which can follow from this happy circumstance of my Reign, and to extinguish by all proper means the least occasions of jealousy, that either the civil or religious rights of any part of this my united Kingdom can suffer by the consequences of this Union.

" Such a suggestion shall never, in my time, have any foundation, how restless soever our enemies may be in their endeavours and artifices to disturb our peace and happiness. Those great and valuable blessings cannot but be always secure to us, if we heartily endeavour to confirm and improve our present Union. I hope therefore you will suffer nothing to prevail with you to disunite among yourselves,

Address of the Commons.

Pr. H. L.
II. 179.

The Queen's speech variously affected both Houses. The Commons unanimously voted and presented an address of thanks, wherein they assured her Majesty, "That no disappointments should discourage them from making their utmost efforts to enable her, in conjunction with her Allies, to reduce the whole Spanish Monarchy to the obedience of the King of Spain, to make good the treaty with Portugal, and to strengthen the Confederate army under the command of the Duke of Savoy." But in the House of Lords, when the Queen's speech came first under consideration, instead of voting immediately an address of thanks, the Earl of Wharton made a speech, wherein, among other things, he took notice of the great decay of trade and scarcity of money, which he had observed in travelling in the country, so that the farmers were not able to pay their rents to their landlords. He was seconded by the Lord Sommers, who enlarged on the ill state and mismanagements of the navy, and on the great losses of the merchants at sea the last summer. The Earl of Stamford (at that time made one of the Commissioners of trade) endeavoured to put a stop to the prosecution of this subject, by moving and postponing the consideration of the state of the Nation till a more proper occasion, and proposing the returning thanks to the Queen for her speech. This was opposed by the Duke of Buckinghamshire, the Earl of Rochester, and the Lord Guernsey; who urged, that they ought, in the first place, to consider the state of the Nation; insinuating, at the same time, that addresses had before been made to little purpose; meaning, with relation to the navy. After some other speeches, it was ordered, that the state of the Nation should be taken into consideration, Nov. 19, in a Committee of the whole House, where the Queen was present incognito. The Lord Herbert of Chisbury being chosen Chairman, a petition given in by the two Sheriffs of London, and subscribed by about two hundred of the most eminent Merchants of the City, was read, complaining of the great losses, which they had lately sustained at sea, for want of convoys and cruisers, and begging a speedy remedy. After the reading of this petition, which was presented to the Committee by the Earl of Wharton, he began the debate, by laying open the miserable condition of the Nation, and the great decay of trade. Several other Peers spoke to the same effect; and, among the rest, the Lord Haverham, in his usual manner, made a long speech (1).

The debate growing high, some Lords endeavoured to allay it, by proposing ways and means to retrieve our losses at sea; and, among the rest, the Lord Halifax moved, That a Committee be appointed to receive proposals for encouraging of Trade and Privateers in the West-Indies; which motion being seconded by the Lord-Treasurer, and the question put, the same was carried in the affirmative. After which, a day was appointed to hear, in a grand Committee, what the Merchants had to alledge, to prove the Suggestions of their petition. It was observed, that, as soon as the debate was over, the Duke of Marlborough took the Earl of Wharton aside, and there passed some warm expostulations between them.

The Commons, in a great measure, made good their assurances to the Queen, and cheerfully voted the necessary Supplies for the navy, land-forces, and some other occasions. But, at the same time, upon a petition of several Merchants of London, complaining of the want of cruisers in the Channel and Soundings, the Commons, in a grand Committee, took into consideration the state of the navy and trade of the nation; and, a great many Merchants being admitted into the House, to make good the allegations in their petition, Mr. Heatbote, son of Sir Gilbert Heatbote, and Mr. Dawson, his Partner, two Russia Merchants, made long speeches against the Admiralty, whom they charged with frauds, malice,

(1). The most material passages of this speech were these: "My Lord Herbert, — The two things you have now under your consideration, your Fleet and your Trade, have so near a relation, and such mutual influence upon each other, they cannot well be separated. Your trade is the mother and nurse of your seamen; your seamen are the life of your fleet, and your fleet is the security and protection of your trade; and both together are the wealth, strength, security, and glory of Britain.

And this is so manifest, that those, who have writ upon these subjects, whether foreigners, or among ourselves, have all owned it: Which makes it astonishing, that a thing so clear and evident, and wherein our interest and safety do so much consist, should be postponed to any foreign consideration whatsoever; wherein we are less concerned. But we are so unhappy as to struggle with so many complicated difficulties, that what is proper for one thing, is prejudicial to another.

My Lord, — Your disasters at sea have been so many, a man scarce knows where to begin. Your ships have been taken by your enemies, as the Dutch take your herrings, by shoals upon your own coasts: Nay, your Royal navy itself has not escaped. And these are pregnant misfortunes, and big with innumerable mischiefs. Your Merchants are beggared; your commerce is broke; your trade is gone; your staple and manufacture ruined: The Queen has lost her customs, and the Parliament must make good the deficiencies, while, in the mean time, our Allies have an open and flourishing trade, and our enemies make use both of our own ships and seamen too against us!

There is yet a farther grievance: When, through a thousand difficulties and dangers, the honest trader has brought home some small effects, he is fallen upon and oppressed by vexatious and unjust prosecutions. I mention this with relation to the Union, and to shew, that, though I was always against it, yet, since it is made, I am for keeping firm and exactly to it.

My Lord, The face of our affairs is visibly changed in the space of one year's time, and the temper of the Nation too. Formerly men stifled their misfortunes, and were afraid of whispering them out, for fear of being over-heard and undone. Now it is hard to stop their mouths, or keep them within any bounds. The moving objects of sorrow we meet with every where, the tears of the fatherless, and cries of the widows, have raised both a compassion for the distressed, and a resentment and indignation against the Authors of those misfortunes; and the very fumes, which of late have flew abroad, no body knows from whence, and papers, which have been cried in your streets, are all marks of the great ferment the Nation is in.

My Lord, you are now upon the inquiry, by what ways and persons we have been brought into this miserable condition. I think it very indifferent which way you 1707. malice, and ignorance, particularly in relation to the Ruffia fleet. Some Members endeavoured to interrupt them; but Sir Richard Onslow, the Chairman of the Committee, desired them to proceed, which they did with great freedom, and offered to prove what they had advanced, both by papers, and the testimony of many Merchants there present. However, this debate was adjourned to the 4th of December, when Admiral Woolstone was ordered to attend, with the journal of his voyage towards Russia. But, after all, the affair ended only in this resolution, "That for the better securing the trade of this Kingdom, over and above the ships of war for the line, and the convoys to remote parts, a sufficient number of ships (which was afterwards settled to four) be appointed to cruise in proper stations." And a bill was ordered to be brought in for that purpose.

The losses at sea complained of were imputed to the weakness, or to a worse disposition in some, who had great credit with the Prince of Denmark, and were believed to govern that whole matter (particularly Mr. George Churchill) for, as they were entirely possessed of the Prince's confidence, so, when the Prince's Council was divided in their opinions, the decision was left to the Prince, who understood very little of those matters, and was always determined by others. By this means they were really Lord High Admiral, without being liable to the laws for errors and miscarriages. This Council was not a legal Court, warranted by any law, though they assumed that to themselves: Being Counsellors, they were bound to answer only for their fidelity. The complaints were feebly managed at the bar of the Commons; for it was soon understood, that not only the Prince, but the Queen likewise concerned herself much in this matter; and both looked on it as a design levelled at their authority. Both Whigs and Tories seemed to be at first equally zealous in the matter; but, by reason of the opposition of the Court, all those, who intended to recommend themselves to favour, abated of their zeal. Some were vehement in their endeavours to baffle the complaints. They had great advantages from the Merchants managing their complaints but poorly; some were frightened, and others were practised upon, and carried even to magnify the conduct of the fleet, and to make excuses for all the misfortunes that had happened. That, which had the chief operation on the whole Tory party, was, that it was set round among them, that the design of all these complaints was to put the Earl of Orford again at the head of the fleet: Upon which they all changed their note, and they, in concurrence with those, who were in offices, or pretended to them, managed the matter so, that it was let fall very little to their honour; and severe remarks were made on some, who had changed their conduct upon their being preferred at Court.

The affair was prosecuted with more zeal and courage in the House of Lords. The Committee appointed to examine the complaints, called the Merchants, who had signed the petition, before them, and treated them not with the scorn, that was very indecently offered them by some of the House of Commons, but with great patience and gentleness. They obliged them to prove all their complaints by witnesses upon oath. In the prosecution of the inquiry it appeared, that many ships of war were not fitted out to be put to sea, but lay in port neglected, and in great decay: That convoys had been often flatly denied the Merchants; and that, when they were promised, they were so long delayed, that the merchants lost their markets, were put to great charge, and, when they had perishable goods, suffered great damage in them. The cruisers were not ordered to proper stations in the Channel; and when convoys were appointed, and were ready to put to sea, they had not their sailing orders sent them, till the enemies ships were laid in their way, prepared to fall on them; which had often happened. Many advertisements, by which those misfortunes might have been prevented, had been offered to the Admiralty, but had not only been neglected you proceed. It seems reasonable, that those Lords, who first moved this order, should put it into what method they please; but I must take leave to say, that, begin where you will; if you do not end with the Ministry, we shall be in a worse condition, in my opinion, than we were before.

As to the Admiralty, if the Prince's Council have committed any fault, it is very fit they should have what they deserve; but, I hope, no persuasion will prevail with the Prince himself to lay down that Commission. The navy, I think, is safer in his hands, than in any other man's hands whatsoever, and I will give your Lordship my reason for it. He has advantages no other person can pretend to. He owes not his Commission to the favour of any great Minister whatsoever, nor is he within the reach of their power. He stands upon a much more unshaken and firm foundation; and, if there be any mistake, it is impossible to be the effect either of the fear, or the anger of a Great Minister, or a care to please him.

My Lord, I take the root of all our misfortunes to lie in the Ministry; and without a change of Ministry, in my opinion, no other remedy will be effectual. I may perhaps be told by some Lord, that I arraign the Ministry. I know that is not proper here; yet every Lord has liberty of speaking his thoughts freely, and taking notice of any thing he thinks a grievance to the Nation; And it is under this notion of complaint, and from a sense of our miserable condition, that I say this to your Lordship; and, if I were not confident I stand upon sure ground, I should not venture thus far; but I have my justification in my hand. And now, my Lord, it is fit I should prove what I say.

Should I mention the breach of the first, fourth, and last articles of the Union, I am within your order; and those Lords, who serve, at present, for the North part of Britain, I am confident have heard of a complaint and address of the Royal Boroughs. And I might remember the disappointment we have met with in Spain. But I hope those two points will be some time or other considered. I will therefore keep myself for proof strictly to your petition; and, I think, nothing is more evident, than that your Ministry has been the cause of these misfortunes; and the argument, which convinces me of it, is drawn from an address of your Lordships in 1704, which I have in my hand. I know before whom I speak: The Queen is a Princess of that consummate wisdom, as not to do any thing without the advice of her Ministry. Your Lordships did then most humbly advise and address her Majesty, that particular care might be taken of these points. None but those, that have her Majesty's ear, could prevail to the contrary; and the want of following your Lordships advice has lost the Nation near ten millions since; and therefore it evidently follows, that your Ministry have been the occasion of those losses.

lected by them, but those, who offered them, had been ill treated for doing it. The Committee made a report of all this to the House of Lords; upon which the Lord-Treasurer moved, that a copy of the report might be sent to the Lord-Admiral, which was done, and, in a few days, an answer sent to the House, excusing or justifying the conduct of the Admiralty in all the branches of it. The chief foundation of the answer was, that the great fleets, which were kept in the Mediterranean, obliged them to send so many of the ships and seamen thither, that there was not a sufficient number left to guard all the trade, while the enemy turned all their forces at sea into squadrons for destroying it; and that all the ships, that could be spared from the public service abroad, were employed to secure the trade. That the promise of convoys had often been delayed by reason of cross winds, and other accidents, that had hindered the return of the men of war longer than had been expected, they being then abroad, convoying other Merchant-ships: And it was said, that there was not a sufficient number of ships for cruisers and convoys both. The paper ended with some severe reflections on the last Reign, in which great sums had been given for the building of ships, and yet the fleet was at that time much diminished, and four thousand Merchant-ships had been taken during that war. This was believed to have been suggested by Mr. Secretary Harley, on design to mortify King William's Ministry. Upon reading of this answer, a newer and fuller examination of the particulars was again resumed by the same Committee; and all the allegations in it were exactly considered. It appeared, that the half of those seamen, whom the Parliament had provided for, were not employed in the Mediterranean; that many ships lay idle in the Port, and were not made use of; and that in the last war, in which it appeared there were more seamen, though not more ships, employed in the Mediterranean than were now kept there, yet the trade was so carefully looked after by cruisers and convoys, that few complaints were then made. And as to the reflections made on the last Reign, it was found, that not one half the sum, that was named, was given for the building of ships; and, that instead of the fleet's being diminished during that war, as had been affirmed, it was increased by above forty ships; nor could any proof be given, that four thousand ships were taken during that war. That all the seamen, who were then taken and exchanged, did not exceed fifteen thousand; and in the present war eighteen thousand were already exchanged, and there were two thousand still remaining in the enemy's hands; so much had the Prince been imposed upon in that paper, that was sent to the Lords in his name.

When the examination was ended, and reported to the House, it was resolved to lay the whole matter before the Queen in an address; and then the Tories discovered the design, that they drove at; for they moved in the Committee, that prepared the address, that the blame of all the miscarriages might be laid upon the Ministry, and on the Cabinet Council. It had been often said in the House of Lords, that it was not intended to make any complaint of the Prince himself; and it not being admitted, that his Council was of a legal Constitution, the complaining of them would be an acknowledging their authority; the blame therefore could be regularly laid no where, but on the Ministry. This was much pressed by the Duke of Buckinghamshire, the Earl of Rochester, and the Lord Haversham. But to this it was answered by the Earl of Orford, the Lord Sommers, and the Lord Hallifax, that the House ought to lay before the Queen only that, which was made out before them upon oath; and therefore, since in the whole examination the Ministry and the Cabinet Council were not once named, they could offer the Queen nothing to their prejudice. Some of the things complained of fell on the Navy-board, which was a body acting by a legal authority. The Lords ought to lay before the Queen such miscarriages, as were proved to them, and leave it to her to find out, on whom the blame ought to be cast. So far was the Ministry from appearing to be in fault, that they found several advertisements were sent by the Secretaries of State to the Admiralty, which, as appeared afterwards, were but too well-grounded; and yet these were neglected by them; and that, which raised the clamour higher, was, that, during the winter, there were no cruisers lying in the Channel; so that many ships, which had run through all dangers at sea, were taken in sight of land; for the Privateers came up boldly to our Ports. All this was digested into a full and clear address laid by the House before the Queen (1); who, in her answer, assured their Lordships, "That she would take care to make

(1) It was dated on the 25th of February, 1707-8, and began thus:

"We your Majesty's most dutiful and obedient Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, do humbly acquaint your Majesty, that early in this Session of Parliament a petition of several Merchants, on behalf of themselves and others, traders of the City of London, was presented to the House, whereby they complained of great losses by the ill-timing of convoys, and for want of cruisers; so that they durst no longer engage the remainder of their estates to carry on their several trades, unless immediate care was taken to remedy these two main causes of their misfortunes.

"This petition containing complaints of great consequence to your Majesty's Subjects; and we being sensible, that nothing but a strict and impartial enquiry into matters of fact could put them in a due light, and enable us to distinguish between ill-grounded clamours and a just cause of complaint, in order to take the usual method of being rightly and fully informed, did refer the petition to a Committee, and did also refer to the same Committee several papers, which the House had found necessary to call for from the proper Officers, for their better information in divers things relating to the navy.

"The Committee having prepared a report, and presented it to the House, upon a mature consideration it was approved and agreed to; and we think it our duty humbly to lay the same before your Majesty.

"The Lords Committees have heard many of the Petitioners upon their oaths, and have caused them to put their depositions into writing and sign the same.

"The Lords Committees observing, that the complaints of the Petitioners naturally fell under several 1707. "the most useful observations on the several particulars contained and referred to in their address: That it was always her opinion, that the encouragement of trade and seamen, and the good management of the navy, were of the greatest importance to the prosperity of this Kingdom: And that therefore she would use her utmost endeavours to encourage all those, whose duty it was effectually to perform those services." But nothing followed upon this answer; and the Queen seemed to be highly offended at the whole proceeding.

"ra

Scotch Merchants relieved. Pr. H. C. IV. 74.

On the 22d of November, upon a petition of several Merchants of Scotland, complaining, "That goods and merchandizes (particularly French wines) brought by them into England, since the first of May last, had been seized; and that the Petitioners were under a prosecution in the Exchequer for the value thereof, and praying relief touching the same;" the Commons resolved to address the Queen, that she would order the Attorney-General to enter a Noli prosequi, to discharge the several informations relating to the goods imported, custom-free, from Scotland, before the first day of May last. The Queen readily complied with this address, both the Court and Parliament being willing, by this indulgence, to abate the discontents of the Scots against the Union.

The acts of security, and about peace and war, ordered to be repealed.

But, on the other hand, the Commons ordered a bill to be brought in, to repeal the acts passed in Scotland, for the security of that Kingdom, and about peace and war, which had given so great a jealousy to the English Nation, that the rescinding of them was one of the principal views of the Ministry, in the prosecution of the treaty of Union. This done, the Commons considered those parts of the Queen's speech relating to the making the Union more complete, and resolved, on the 11th of December, "1. That there be but one Privy-Council in the Kingdom of Great-Britain. 2. That the militia of that part of Great-Britain called Scotland be regulated, in the same manner as the militia of that part of Great Britain called England is regulated. 3. That the Powers of Justices of Peace for preserving the public peace be the same throughout the whole united Kingdom. 4. That, for the better administration of justice, and preservation of the public peace, the Lords of Justiciary be appointed to go circuits twice in the year. 5. That the writs for electing Members to serve in the House of Commons, for that part of Great-Britain called Scotland, be directed to the Sheriffs of the respective Counties, and that the returns be made of such writs, in like manner as returns are made of such writs in that part of Great Britain called England." And they ordered a bill to be brought in upon these resolutions. Two days after they took into consideration the report from the Committee, to whom the petition of several Merchants trading to Portugal, Italy, and Spain, was referred; which resolutions were agreed to by the House, viz. "First, That the Merchants had fully made out the several allegations of their petitions: Secondly, That the preserving the Portugal trade was of the utmost concern to this Nation, being, at present, the greatest mart for vent of our woollen manufactures, corn, fish, and other British commodities."

and about the trade of Portugal, Italy, and Spain.

"ral heads, for the greater ease of the house, have endeavoured in their report to reduce the evidence, to the following method, always referring, as they proceed, to the depositions themselves.

"One thing complained of was, the insufficiency of convoys appointed for the Merchants, whereby their ships had from time to time become a prey to the superior force of the enemy.

"A second point was, The Merchants suffered great discouragement by their being forced to wait long for convoys, even after the time promised and prefixed for their sailing; whereby the charge of seamen's wages and victuals, demurrage of shipping, damage of goods, and loss of markets made trading insupportable.

"A third ground of complaint was, The untimely and unseasonable sailing of convoys, whereby trade to the West-Indies especially, was in a manner ruined.

"A fourth was, The great want of cruisers in the Channel and Soundings.

"A fifth complaint was, Concerning the arbitrary proceedings of the Captains of the Queen's ships of war, in impressing seamen out of the Merchant-ships in the West-Indies; as also upon their return into the ports of Great-Britain, to the endangering of many, and loss of several ships."

The address concludes in these terms:

"We, having thus performed what we took ourselves to be indispensibly obliged to, cannot doubt but it will be graciously accepted by your Majesty, as coming from most dutiful Subjects, who sincerely wish they may never have occasion hereafter of making addresses to your Majesty, but to congratulate your successes, or to return our humble acknowledgments for the blessings of your Reign.

"We beseech your Majesty to believe, that none of your subjects do exceed us in true respect to his Royal Highness the Lord-High-Admiral. His great personal virtues require it; and his near relation to your Majesty makes it our duty. And as we do not mean any thing in this address should in the least reflect upon him; so we are very well assured, his Royal Highness will never suffer other persons to protect themselves under his name from a just pursuit of such faults and neglects, as immediately tend to the ruin of trade and the destruction of Britain.

"There cannot be a plainer proof, that some persons, employed by the Lord-High-Admiral, have made the worst use imaginable of the trust he honours them with, than in their presuming to lay such an answer before the House of Lords in his name. For, not to take notice of the many things (which in the second report have been already laid before your Majesty) throughout the whole paper, there is not the least hopes given, that for the future any better care shall be taken of the trade. On the contrary, the whole turn of the answer seems to be intended for exposing the complaints of the Merchants, rather than pitying their losses. We are sure nothing can be more remote from the goodness and compassion of the Lord-High-Admiral's temper, and the tender regard he has always shewn for your Majesty's Subjects.

May it please your Majesty,

"It is a most undoubted maxim, that the honour, security, and wealth of this Kingdom does depend upon the protection and encouragement of trade, and the improving and right managing the naval strength. Other Nations, who were formerly great and powerful at sea, have by negligence and mismanagement lost their trade, and seen their maritime time

“ commodities. Thirdly, That there was a considerable collusive trade in French prize-wines carried on before, and more increased since the falling of the fifteen pounds per tun. Fourthly, That except effectual provision were made to prevent the like practices, with relation to the collusive trade of bringing in French wines, as if they were prize-wines, it would not only be a great discouragement to the Portugal trade, and traders, but indanger the intire loss thereof.” And a bill was ordered to be brought in upon the last resolutions. Then, the state, accounts, and lists relating to the forces in Spain and Portugal, having been laid before the House, the consideration of the state of the war in those parts was deferred till the 7th of January; and several other papers relating to those affairs were ordered to be laid before the House (1).

On the 18th of December, the Queen came to the House of Lords, and having passed some money-bills, and the act for repealing the Scotch acts of security, and about peace and war, made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ I Am very well pleased with the occasion of my coming hither at this time, and desirous to take this opportunity of expressing to you the satisfaction I have in seeing so good a progress made in the public business.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

“ I am extremely sensible of the readiness and affection, with which you have provided

“ so considerable a part of the Supplies. As I am fully persuaded it must needs give the greatest satisfaction to all our Allies; so I look upon it as a sure pledge of your being disposed to make good those hearty assurances, which you gave me in the beginning of the Session.

“ I told you, at the opening of this Parliament, that I did hope you would look upon the services relating to Spain, Portugal, and the army under the command of the Duke of Savoy, to be of so much importance in the prosecution of this war, that they might deserve an augmentation; which I cannot but think will be of the greatest use to the common cause (2), both with regard to those particular services, and to the putting ourselves in a condition to improve such favourable opportunities, as may arise in the ensuing year.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

“ I shall only add, that as nothing is more essential to my own quiet, and the happiness of all my good subjects, than the bringing this war to a safe and honourable conclusion; so I must think myself obliged to look upon all those, who are willing and desirous to support me in it for attaining that end, as the most proper objects of my favour and encouragement.

“ I cannot conclude, without once more recommending to you to confirm and improve the advantages of our happy Union, not doubting, but, at the same time, you will have “ a due

“ time strength intirely ruined. Therefore we do in the most earnest manner beseech your Majesty, that the sea-affairs may be your first and most peculiar care. We humbly hope, that it shall be your Majesty's chief and constant instruction to all, who shall have the honour to be employ'd in your Councils, and in the administration of affairs, that they be continually intent and watchful in what concerns the trade and fleet; and that every one of them may be made to know it is his particular charge to take care, that the seamen be encouraged, the trade protected, discipline restored, and a new spirit and vigour put into the whole administration of the navy.”

(1) While these things were depending, the Commons, on the 25th of November, took into consideration the report of the Committee appointed to examine the petition of Mr. John Asgill, a Member of the House, in prison in the fleet for debt, at the suit of Mr. Holland a Staffordshire Gentleman; which report was ordered to be re-committed. On the other hand, the House being informed of a printed book or pamphlet, signed J. Asgill, intitled, An argument, proving, that, according to the Covenant of Eternal Life, revealed in the Scriptures, man may be translated from hence into that Eternal Life, without passing through death, although the Human Nature of Christ himself could not be thus translated, till he had passed through death. Several passages of which treatise being contrary to, and reflecting on the Christian Religion, the book was brought up to the table, and the title, and several paragraphs therein, being read, it was ordered, That it be referred to a Committee to inquire into the Author of the said book. On the 16th of December, the Commons resolved, That Mr. Asgill ought to have the privilege of the House, as a Member thereof, and be delivered out of the custody of the Warden of the Fleet, to attend the service of the House. Pursuant to which resolution he was immediately discharged; but two days after the House proceeded to take into consideration the report from the Committee, to whom it was referred, to examine, who was the Author, Printer, and Publisher of the book abovementioned, ascribed to Mr. Asgill; who having been heard in his place in relation to the report, the Commons resolved, That in the said book are contained many profane and blasphemous expressions, highly reflecting upon the Christian Religion; and ordered the same to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman in the New Palace yard, Westminster; and resolved, that John Asgill Esq; having in his place owned himself to be the Author of the said book, be expelled the House.

Mr. Addison wrote an excellent piece to this purpose, which was printed at London in 4to in 1708, under the title of the present state of the war, and the necessity of an augmentation considered. In this discourse, after having shewn, that the French are the constant and most dangerous enemies to the British Nation, and that the danger from them was then greater than ever, and would still increase till the Union with Spain were broken, he sets forth the several advantages, which this Union had already given France, and taken from Great-Britain, in relation to the West-Indies, the woollen manufactures, the trade of the Levant, and the naval power of the two Nations. He then shews how these advantages would still rise higher after a peace, notwithstanding the present conquests of Great Britain, with new additions, should be confirmed to the Nation, as well because the Monarchy of Spain would not be weakened by such concessions, as because no guarantee could be found sufficient to secure them to us. For which reason he lays it down as a fixed rule, that no peace was to be made without an intire disunion of the French and Spanish Monarchies. That this might be brought about, he endeavours to prove from the progress which had been already made towards

1707. "a due regard to what shall be found necessary for preserving the public peace, throughout the whole Island of Great-Britain."

Debate about the affairs of Spain.
Pr. H. L.
II. 183.

This speech occasioned, the next day, a long debate in the House of Lords, in relation to the affairs of Spain, the Queen being present. The Earl of Rochester spoke first, and having commended the Earl of Peterborough's courage and conduct, and enumerated his services, said, "That it had been a constant custom, that, when a person of his rank, who had been employed abroad in so eminent a post as his Lordship, had returned home, he had either thanks given him, or was called to an account; urging, that the same ought to be done in relation to the Earl of Peterborough." The Lord Halifax, who spoke next, enlarged likewise upon the Earl's successful services, but waved the returning him thanks, till the whole tenour of his conduct had been examined; than which the Earl himself protested, he had nothing more at heart. The Lord Haversham was not silent; but, having highly extolled the Earl of Peterborough's valour, skill, and success, made an oblique reflection on the Earl of Galway, saying, "It was no wonder our affairs in Spain went so ill, since the management of them had been intrusted to a foreigner." Hereupon several Lords shewed the necessity of carrying on the war, till the whole Monarchy of Spain should be recovered, and King Charles settled upon his Throne. And, among the rest, the Earl of Peterborough said, "They ought to give the Queen nine shillings in the pound, rather than make peace upon any other terms;" adding, "That, if it were thought necessary, he was ready to return to Spain, and serve, even under the Earl of Galway." This naturally brought on the consideration of ways and means to retrieve the affairs of Spain, in relation to which, the Earl of Rochester said, "That we seemed to neglect the principal business, and mind only accessories." Adding, "That he remembered the saying of a great General, the old Duke of Schemberg, that the attacking France, in the Netherlands, was like taking a bull by the horns." And therefore his Lordship proposed, "That we should stand on the defensive in Flanders, and send from thence fifteen or twenty thousand men into Catalonia." He was seconded by the Earl of Nottingham, who complained of Spain being, in a manner, abandoned. But the Duke of Marlborough endeavoured, with some warmth, to shew the danger of such a scheme, and the necessity of augmenting, rather than diminishing the forces in Flanders. His chief reasons were, "First, that most of the enemy's strong places there might be kept with one battalion in each; whereas the great towns of Brabant, which he had conquered, required twenty times that number of men for their preservation. Secondly, That if our army in the wards it, and the successes, which the British Nation had purchased in the war, and which were very considerable, if well pursued; but of no effect, if the Nation should acquiesce in them. In order to compleat this disunion, in which we had gone so far, he would not have us rely upon exhausting the French Treasury, attempts upon the Spanish Indies, descents on France, but chiefly on out-numbering them in troops, France being already drained of her best supplies, and the Confederates masters of much greater forces for multitude and strength, both in men and horses, and provided with Generals of great fame and abilities. He then considers the wrong measures, which had been hitherto taken in making too small levies after a successful campaign, in regulating their number by that of the enemy's forces, and hiring them of our Confederates; shewing at the same time the inconveniences suffered from such hired troops, and several advantages, which would arise from employing those of our own Nation. He further recommends this augmentation of our forces, to prevent the keeping up a standing body of them in times of peace, to enable us to make an impression on the enemy in the present posture of the war, and to secure ourselves against the King of Sweden, who was then at the head of a powerful army, and had not yet declared himself. In the last place he answers by several considerations those two popular objections, that we furnished more towards the war than the rest of the Allies; and that we were not able to contribute more than we did already. With regard to the former objection, he observes, that if it were true in fact, that England contributed more than any other of the Allies, he does not see any tolerable colour, that she should not make any addition to her present efforts. "Supposing, says he, among a multitude embarked in the same vessel, there are several, that in the fury of a tempest will rather perish than work for their preservation; would it not be madness in the rest to stand idle, and rather chuse to sink together, than to do more than comes to their share? Since we are engaged in a work so absolutely necessary for our welfare, the remissness of our Allies should be an argument for us to redouble our endeavours rather than slacken them. If we must govern ourselves by example, let us rather imitate the vigilance and activity of the common enemy, than the supineness and negligence of our friends. We have indeed a much greater share in the war than any other part of the Confederacy. The French King makes at us directly, keeps a King by him to set over us, and hath very lately augmented the salary of his court, to let us see, how much he hath that design at heart. Few of the Nations in war with him, should they ever fall into his hands, would lose their Religion or form of Government, or interfere at present with him in matters of commerce. The Dutch, who are likely to be the greatest losers after the Britons, have but little trade to the Levant in comparison with ours, have no considerable plantations or commerce in the West-Indies, or any woollen manufacture, for Spain, not to mention the strong barrier they have already purchased between France and their own Country. But, after all, every Nation in the Confederacy makes the same complaint, and fancies itself the greatest sufferer by the war. Indeed in so common a pressure, let the weight be never so equally distributed, every one will be most sensible of that part, which lies on his own shoulders. We furnish, without dispute, more than any other branch of the Alliance, but the question is, Whether others do not exert themselves in proportion according to their respective strength? The Emperor, the King of Prussia, the Elector of Hanover, as well as the States of Holland, and the Duke of Savoy, seem at least to come up to us. The greatest powers in Germany are borrowing money, where they can get it, in order to maintain their stated quota's, and go thorough their part of the expence: And, if any of the Circles have been negligent, they have paid for it much more in their late contributions, than what would have furnished out their share in the common charges of the war."

"Netherlands were weakened, and the French, by their great superiority, should gain any considerable advantage, the discontented party in Holland, who were not a few, and bore with impatience the great charges of the war, would not fail crying aloud for peace." Here the Earl of Rochester said, "He wondered that a noble Peer, who had ever been conspicuous for his calmness and moderation, should now be out of his natural temper." Adding, "That, there being an absolute necessity to succour Spain, his Grace would oblige their Lordships, if he would let them know where they might get troops to send thither; and the obligation would be the greater, because the Earl of Peterborough had, that very day, assured them, that he had heard Prince Eugene say, That the German soldiers had rather be decimated, than sent into Spain." The Duke of Marlborough answered the reproach of having shewed some warmth, by saying, "The thing was of too great importance to be spoken of without concernment." And as for the question proposed by the Earl of Rochester, he said, "That although it was improper to disclose secret projects in so great an assembly" (to which, that day, many strangers had been admitted, by reason of the Queen's presence) "because the enemy would not fail being informed of them; yet, to gratify their Lordships, he might assure them, that measures had already been concerted with the Emperor, for forming an army of forty thousand men, under the command of the Duke of Savoy, and for sending powerful succours to King Charles." Adding, "That it was to be hoped, that Prince Eugene might be prevailed with to go and command in Spain; in which case the Germans would gladly follow him thither. The only difficulty, which his Grace said might be objected to this scheme, was the usual slowness of the Court of Vienna; to which purpose he took notice, that, if the seven thousand German recruits, which the Emperor had promised for the army in Piedmont, had arrived in time, the enterprize against Toulon would probably have been attended with success: But that it was to be hoped, and he durst engage his word for it, that, for the future, his Imperial Majesty would punctually perform his promises." This put an end to the debate; and a Committee was appointed to draw up an address to the Queen, which was presented the same day; wherein their Lordships returned her Majesty "their most humble thanks for her most gracious speech to her Parliament; adding, that the great spirit and resolution she was pleased to express for the vigorous carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal, and strengthening the army of the Duke of Savoy, who had deserved so well of the whole Confederacy, could not fail to contribute, in the most effectual manner, to bring this war to a speedy and happy conclusion. That such an example ought to excite all her Allies to a noble imitation; and their Lordships were sure, her Majesty would do her utmost, to oblige such of them, as hitherto had failed in their parts, for the future, to act as those, who had a real concern for restoring and securing peace and liberty to Europe. That her Majesty's favour would always be the highest encouragement to her subjects; but the zeal their Lordships had for the preservation of her Majesty's Person and Government, and the duty they owed to their Country, always had, and ever would oblige them to do all that lay in their power, for supporting her Majesty in this just war, till it were brought to a safe and happy conclusion. And as they had shewn the greatest zeal for bringing the Union to pass, and for preventing every thing, that might disturb it; so they unanimously promised her Majesty, to do all that was possible for them, to make it complete and entire."

The same day the Lords resolved, "First, Resolutions
That no peace could be safe or honourable for her Majesty and her Allies, if Spain and the Spanish West-Indies were suffered to continue in the power of the House of Bourbon. Secondly, That an humble address be presented to the Queen, to thank her Majesty for the care she had taken, and the instances she had used with the Emperor, for the sending a considerable force for the relief of the King of Spain, under the command of Prince Eugene; and to desire her Majesty, that she would continue to make the most pressing instances to the Emperor, to send powerful succours to Spain under the command of Prince Eugene, with expedition; and to make good the concert of putting twenty thousand men under the command of the Duke of Savoy; and that the Emperor would also use his utmost power and interest for strengthening the army on the Rhine, which was now happily put under the command of that wise and valiant Prince, the Elector of Hanover." An address, containing these resolutions, was accordingly drawn up; concluding, "They believed no part of this could be refused upon her Majesty's earnest interposition, who had done such great things for the House of Austria: And that, this being complied with, they might reasonably hope, by God's Assistance, the next would prove a happy and glorious campaign." The Commons having, at the Lords desire, concurred in this address, both Houses, in a body, presented the same to her Majesty, who told them, "That she was fully of their opinion, that no peace could be honourable or safe for them, or for their Allies, till the entire Monarchy of Spain be restored to the House of Austria; and very well pleased to find, that the measures, she had concerted for the succour of the King of Spain, were so fully approved by both Houses of Parliament: And that she should continue her most pressing instances with the Emperor, for the hastening of further succours, and that they might be commanded by Prince Eugene: As also, upon all the other particulars mentioned in their address."

Pursuant to these assurances, the Queen presented the Emperor to send Prince Eugene to Spain. The Imperial Court delayed to comply in this particular, but (as will hereafter be seen) sent Count Staremberg thither, who had indeed acquired a very high reputation.

The 19th of December, the Commons came to several resolutions about the Supply, so that,

Upon an address of the Commons, for the Queen to use her endeavours with his Imperial Majesty, to restore to her subjects the liberty of trade they formerly enjoyed in Austria and Stiria; and to prevent, for the future, any prohibitions from being made in any other parts of his hereditary countries, she was pleased to answer, That she had given directions, some time before, to her Minister abroad upon that matter, and would continue her endeavours for the relief of her subjects, as was desired by the Commons address.

Account of the French
Prophecy. Towards the end of the year 1706, three French Cevennois, commonly called Camlars, came over into England, and by their enthusiastic effusions, and pretences to prophecy, and extatic convulsions, raised the curiosity of their countrymen in London, and gained several followers. This gave great offence to the generality of the French Refugees, and the Ministers and Elders of the French Royal Chapel in the Savoy (the head of the French Congregations in Westminster) thought it their duty to inquire into the mission of these new prophets; and, being authorized by the Bishop of London, their Ecclesiastical superior, summoned the three Camlars, Elias Marion, John Cavalier, and Durand Fage, to come before them. Two of them obstinately refused to appear; but the third boldly justified their pretences to inspiration. Whereupon the French Church in the Savoy made an act on the 2d of January, wherein they were declared Impostors and Counterfeits; and this act was confirmed by the Lord Bishop of London. Notwithstanding this anathema, the pretended prophets, acted by Mr. Maximilian Misson, a French Refugee, Mr. Nicholas Facio, the Mathematical Professor at Geneva, and others, and continuing their assemblies in Soho, uttered their predictions with great noise; and being supported by Sir Richard Bulkley and Mr. John Lacy, two English Gentlemen of good estates, branded the Ministers of the Established Church with odious names and characters, and denounced the heaviest judgments against the City of London, and the whole British Nation. They published likewise their predictions under the title of prophetical warnings of Elias Marion, &c.

which was a collection of incoherent and unintelligible jargon, and shewed the authors of them to be men thoroughly infatuated. But it being suspected by some, that there was a mixture of design and artifice in the affair, Marion, John Daudé, and Facio, were indicted and prosecuted at the expence of all the French Churches in London, as disturbers of the public peace, and false prophets; and received their sentences at the Court of Queen's-Bench, to stand twice on a scaffold with a paper denoting their offence; to pay a fine of twenty marks each, and to give security for their good behaviour for one year. According to this sentence they were expoled on a scaffold at Charing-Crois and the Royal-Exchange.

At this time two discoveries were made, very unlucky for Mr. Harley. Marshal Tallard wrote often to Monsieur Chamillard, but he sent his letters open to the Secretary's Office, to be perused and sealed up, and so to be conveyed by the way of Holland. These were opened upon some suspicion in Holland; and it appeared, that one, in the Secretary's Office, put letters in them, in which, as he offered his service to the Courts of France and St. Germans, so he gave an account of all transactions here. In one of these he sent a copy of the letter, which the Queen was to write, in her own hand, to the Emperor; and he marked what parts of the letter were drawn by the Secretary, and what additions were made to it by the Lord-Treasurer. This was the letter, by which the Queen pressed the sending Prince Eugene into Spain; and this, if not intercepted, would have been at Versailles many days before it could reach Vienna. He, who sent this, wrote, that by this they might see what service he could do them, if well encouraged. All this was sent over to the Duke of Marlborough; and upon search it was found to be writ by Mr. William Gregg, whom Mr. Harley had not only entertained as a Clerk in his office, but likewise taken into a particular confidence, without inquiry into the former parts of his life; for he was a vicious and necessitous person. He had been Secretary to Mr. Gregg, when Resident from King William to the Court of Denmark, and afterwards to Mr. Vernon, Envoy to the same Court, by whom he was dismissed, for his ill conduct (2). Mr. Harley had made

(2) The Committee of the Lords, appointed to examine him, observe, that the effect of the papers referred to them was as follows:

I. A copy of Gregg's letter, which was intercepted, dated the 28th of November 1707, O. S. sent to Monsieur Chamillard, inclosed in a packet from Marshal Tallard, directed to Mr. Robineau his steward at Paris.
In

1707-8. made use of him to get intelligence in Scotland in 1705, and came to trust him with the perusal and sealing up of the letters, which the French prisoners, here in England, sent over to France, and by that means he got into the method of sending intelligence. He, when seized on, either upon remorse, or the hopes of pardon, confessed all, and signed his confession; upon which he was tried at the Sessions in the Old Bailey, where an indictment of high-treason was read against him, importing, "That he had sent letters to Monsieur Chamillard, one of the French King's prime Ministers, particularly one, dated the 28th of November last; and others, wherein were inclosed the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament, in relation to the augmentation of our forces; a copy of a letter from the Queen to the Emperor; private business sent the Duke of Savoy, &c." To which indictment, Gregg having pleaded guilty, the Lord Chief Justice Holt, and most of the Judges being present, the Recorder pronounced sentence of death against him, as in cases of high treason.

Gregg is taken up and tried Jun. 19.

At the same time John Bara and Alexander Valiere (alias John Clarke) were also committed to Newgate for corresponding with the enemy; and Mr. Claude Baud, a native of Piedmont, and Secretary to Count Briançon, Envoy Extraordinary from the Duke of Savoy, was apprehended, at the request of that Minister, by warrant from the Earl of Sunderland, for traitorous practices against her Majesty and Government; but the same night, as the two Messengers, who had him in custody, were carrying him to Newgate, he made his escape from them. But being followed by the Queen's proclamation, wherein a reward of two hundred pounds was promised for discovering and securing him, he was, within two hours after, betrayed by a French Taylor, in whose house he had taken sanctuary, and put under the custody of a Messenger. Valiere and Bara, who had been both employed by Mr. Harley as his spies, to go often over to Calais, under pretence of bringing him intelligence, were informed against as spies employed by France to get intelligence from England. They carried over many letters to Calais and Boulogne; and, as was believed, gave such information of our trade and convoys, that, by their means, the nation sustained such great losses at sea. They were often complained of upon suspicion, but were always protected by Mr. Harley; yet the presumptions against them were so violent, that they were at last seized on, and brought up prisoners.

A Committee of seven Lords were appointed to examine Mr. Gregg, but could not find out much by him (1.) He had but newly begun his designs of betraying secrets, and he had no associates

An examination into the correspondence.

In this Gregg sends to Monsieur Chamillard a copy of the Queen's letter, written with her own hand to the Emperor.

In the same letter Gregg takes notice of two letters sent by him to Monsieur Chamillard, the one dated the 24th, and the other the 28th of October last, which he understood Robineau had put into his hands.

That perceiving by Robineau's letter to his Master, that Monsieur Chamillard desired the Marshal's sentiments of Gregg, Gregg had himself written to him.

In expectation of his answer Gregg flattered himself, that the paper, then sent, was of that importance, that there could be no longer doubt of the devotedness of a Scottishman for France; not to speak of his zeal for the service of his Prince, who had found refuge there.

That the lines, under which he had drawn a stroke, were the thoughts of the Lord-Treasurer, which he had added with his own hand to the first draught of the letter.

The same letter contained some other news.

II. There was a copy of a letter, dated the 25th of November, O. S. in the same packet, subscribed William Gregg, in which notice is taken of what Robineau writes to Monsieur Tallard concerning him; and that he himself had written to the Marshal, and desired Robineau to deliver the inclosed according to the address, as being of great consequence.

III. The copy of a letter from Marshal Tallard to Robineau, dated the 10th of September, N. S. in which Monsieur Tallard says, that as to the letters, of which Robineau made mention in his of the 25th and 28th of November, that he had delivered them according to the address. Monsieur Tallard knew nothing of their contents, but by the same post, which brought his letters.

That he was obliged for the offers, but could make no use of them while he was a prisoner. When the peace was made, he would give proof of his acknowledgment to him, who made the offers, and would endeavour to engage the person, to whom the letters were addressed, to do the same. In the interim Robineau was to tell the person, to whom he delivered the letters, for whom the Marshal had the utmost consideration, that he was much obliged to him for desiring to know his thoughts, before he would determine what to do: That the offers made did not suit with the present times, at least as to him, &c.

IV. An original letter, of the 2d of December, 1707, to Mr. Robineau from Gregg, to solicitate him for being delivered from an importunate man, as would appear by Marshal Tallard's letters, unless his last to Monsieur Chamillard had not made him determine otherwise.

V. A Copy of another letter of Gregg to Monsieur Chamillard, dated the 23d of December, O. S. which was also taken in Marshal Tallard's packet, in which he pretends to give Monsieur Chamillard an account of what passed in Parliament, with the Queen's answer to the address of the two Houses, and his excuse for not sending the address itself.

VI. A letter of Robineau to Monsieur Tallard, the 26th of December, N. S. from Paris (transcribed by Gregg in his own hand) in which he says, he was going to Versailles to deliver the answer, with which he was charged; that he received every post letters from the same person, and that he took care to deliver them according to the address.

VII. Another of the 30th of December 1707, N. S. that he had been to deliver, as Monsieur Tallard had charged him, the answer to which was desired of Mr. Tallard.

VIII. Another letter in Gregg's hand, dated the 30th of December 1707, found in Gregg's closet, written to Monsieur Chamillard, giving an account of the intention to send Mr. Palmer to Savoy, and to take several other German Courts in his way.

X. A confession of Gregg delivered to the Lords of the Committee, and signed by him.

(1.) They went to Newgate to him for that purpose, on the 12th of February 1707-8, and acquainted him, "That as the crime, of which he stood attainted, was of the most heinous nature, so there were some circumstances so extraordinary, which attended his case, that the House of Lords thought it might be of service to her Majesty and the Kingdom, to have all the beginning and progress of his treasonable correspondence fully laid open: That her Majesty, upon the application of that House, had ordered all former examinations and papers concerning him

1707-8. associates with him in it. He told them, that all the papers of state lay so carelessly about the office, that every one belonging to it, even the Door-keeper, might have read them all. Mr. Harley's custom was to come to the office late on post nights; and after he had given his orders, and wrote his letters, he usually went away, and left all to be copied out, when he was gone. By that means Mr. Gregg came to see every thing, in particular the Queen's letter to the Emperor. He said, he knew the design on Toulon in May, but did not discover it; for he had not entered on his ill practices till October. This was all he could say. By the examination of Valiere, Bara, and of many others, who lived about Dover, and were employed by them, a discovery was made of a constant intercourse they were in with Calais, under Mr. Harley's protection. They often went over with boats full of wool, and brought back brandy, though both the import and export were severely prohibited. They, and those who belonged to the boats carried over by them, were well treated on the French side at the Governor's house, or at the Commissary's; and were kept there till their letters could be sent to Paris, and till returns could be brought back; and were all the while upon free-cost.

The order, that was constantly given them, was, that, if an English or Dutch ship came up to them, they should cast their letters into the sea; but that they should not do it, when

French ships came up to them; so that they were looked upon by all on that coast as the spies of France. They used to get what information they could, both of merchant-ships, and of the ships of war, that lay in the Downs; and upon that they usually went over; and it happened, that soon after some of the ships were taken. These men were Papists, and behaved themselves very insolently, and boasted much of their power and credit. Complaints had been often made of them, but they were always protected; nor did it appear, that they ever brought any information of importance to Mr. Harley but once, when, according to what they swore, they told him, that Monsieur Fourbin was gone from Dunkirk, to lie in wait for the Russia fleet; which proved to be true; for he both went to watch for them, and took a great part of them. Yet, though this was the single piece of intelligence, that they ever brought, Mr. Harley took so little notice of it, that he gave no advertisement to the Admiralty concerning it. This particular excepted, they only brought over common news, and the Paris Gazettes. These examinations lasted for some weeks; and, when they were ended, a full report was made of them to the House of Lords, who ordered the whole report, with all the examinations, to be laid before the Queen in an address, importing, Mar. 22: "That having been informed, that William Gregg, a Clerk in the office of the late Secretary Mr. Harley, had been indicted for "high-

"him to be laid before them. They told him further, that if he, by a true, ingenious, and full confession, would deserve it, he might have ground to hope, the House of Lords might intercede in his behalf for mercy from her Majesty, which otherwise he had no reason to look for. He was also told, that, being a man of understanding, he was not to expect to be asked questions, but was to give an account of himself, when, and how he became first employed; when, and by what infatigation he was drawn in to correspond with the Queen's enemies; and how far it proceeded."

He said, That one Mr. Gregg, the late King's Resident at Copenhagen, was his kinsman, and sent for him thither; and he continued with him about three years till his death, which happened about two months before the late King died.

That Mr. Vernon was sent Envoy to Denmark, and took him, whom he found there, into his service, in which he continued about two years and an half, and then he was discharged from his service by Mr. Vernon.

Mr. Vernon coming for England about his private affairs, while Gregg was in his service, and staying here some time, in that interval Gregg received some letters from Mr. Secretary Harley, which gave him occasion after to apply to him.

The 9th of December 1704, Gregg came to England, and soon made application to Mr. Secretary Harley for employment, but was not recommended to him by any body.

The 3d of January he saw him first at his office, where he attended often.

The 5th of February 1704-5, Mr. Jones, the Secretary's first Clerk, came to him, and told him, the Secretary would speak with him. He attended on the Secretary the same day, who asked him, If he would be willing to be employed in his own Country? Gregg said, He was willing to be sent upon any good errand. Mr. Secretary told him, It was to give an account of the proceedings of the ensuing Parliament, which was to be held under the Duke of Argyle.

Numb. LVI. VOL. IV.

The 6th of February he went to the office, and Mr. Secretary told him he should be dispatched in a few days.

To make some trial of him (as he supposed) Mr. Secretary asked him, If he could give an account of the Court of Denmark? Gregg said, He was willing to do it as well as he could; and, accordingly, in some time drew up a state of that Court, and it was not disapproved.

He attended daily, and, on the 20th of April, Mr. Secretary Harley gave him a note of twenty pounds, to be paid by his Steward in Scotland yard.

On the 23d of May 1705, he was ordered to go for Scotland, and about a week after set forwards on his journey. When he was dispatched, a note of thirty pounds was given to him.

Mr. Secretary always amused him with telling him, he should have instructions for his directions in Scotland; but, at last, ordered him to draw up some queries himself about the state of affairs in Scotland; which he did, and they were approved.

Some of the queries were, What were the designs of the several parties? What correspondence between the Highlands and St. Germain's? How affected to the House of Hanover, &c. He was also ordered to form a cypher of letters, whereby to design the great men there.

The 2d of June 1705, he arrived at Edinburgh, and wrote to Mr. Secretary the Thursday following, being ordered to direct all his letters to Thomas Bateman in Scotland yard.

Mr. Secretary promised the receipt of his letters should be acknowledged; and he pressed often for it, to know they came to hand, fearing his letters were intercepted, because he was suspected as a spy in that Country. But, though he wrote thrice a week, he never heard one word from Mr. Secretary, or by his order, during his whole stay in that country.

Being asked by the Lords, If he was recommended to any body in Scotland? he answered, No.

The 15th of October he arrived at London, and the next day waited on Mr. Secretary, who thanked him for his letters, and told him, he had named him to the Queen, upon occasion of a paper he had sent; but Mr. Gregg said, he believed the Queen had never heard of his name, till this last unhappy accident.

On the 29th of October, Mr. Secretary ordered twenty-five pounds. He attended daily, and pressed much to be sent abroad, particularly to go with Mr. Methuen, when he was sent to Savoy, but it was declined.

On New-Year's day Mr. Secretary dropped a word, which startled him much: He told him, he would fix him; which Gregg understood was bringing him into his office.

Upon this he presented a petition, that he might not be in the office, because the salary was small; and, being in debt, he could not live on it.

He attended every day. The Secretary inquired of him what he knew of languages. He said, he knew some French and German, but knew Latin better than either.

The 16th of April 1706, he was admitted into the office, and a note was given upon Mr. Jones, as for one of the Clerks; and Mr. Secretary told him, it was only to keep his hand in use, and that he would provide better for him.

The 16th of May, copying a letter sent to Mr. Vernon, that he was to consider of somebody fit to be left behind, Gregg thought it to be intended in his favour, and wrote to Mr. Vernon on that occasion, desiring his countenance.

But the 28th of May, Mr. Secretary writing word to Mr. Vernon, that he had leave to come at his own time, but must leave somebody behind; and this being wrote before any answer could come from thence, Gregg saw nothing was meant for him in the former letter.

Gregg made offers of service to Mr. Pulteney, when he was to go, but he said he was provided.

Then he told Mr. Secretary, his mind was depressed by his debts, and desired to be thrown abroad, and to go with Sir Philip Meadows; but that was refused, and Strahan was sent.

Then Mr. Secretary asked, What would make him easy? And he gave in a list of his debts, amounting to about thirty-five Pounds.

Since that Mr. Secretary has ordered him at several times about twenty or five and twenty pounds in the whole; the last sum was seven pounds in October last, part of a bill of 14 pounds, for which debt he was pressed at that time.

Being asked by the Lords, If his debts only made him so desirous to be gone? He said, At that rate the business was managed in the office, it was a perfect drudgery.

Their business seldom began till about eleven or twelve at night, and they staid till two or three, or later, though sometimes not above two letters to dispatch; and he thought himself happiest, who could get away soonest.

The method was, first, the letters were taken in short hand; afterwards were wrote fair; then sent to Mr. Secretary's house to be signed, and after returned to the office to be entered; so that they were obliged sometimes to stay till four o'clock in the morning.

He said, That in April last, when Hill the Messenger was sent to Turin, the packet was left to him, though the youngest Clerk, to be made up, and delivered to the messenger.

In that packet there was a letter to Sir John Norris, and another to Mr. Chetwynd. Most of the last letter was in cypher. Gregg entered both those letters. There was also another letter to Sir Claude de Shovel, and letters from the Lord-Treasurer. He put them all up in the packet, and after gave them to Hill.

Being asked, If he knew by the letters what the design was? Gregg said, he understood Toulon was to be besieged. He could not read the whole, but knew enough to find out that. He said it was wrote in the cypher of the office by Mr. Harley, the Earl of Sunderland being sick at that time.

The Queen's letters de Cachet are made up before they are brought to the office; but the Clerks are trusted to make up other letters.

The Lords Committees required him to give the whole relation of his correspondence, when it began, and how long it had been carried on.

Gregg

1707-8. "managed by them with the Governors and Commissioners of Calais and Boulogne, could tend only to carry on an intelligence to the advantage of her Majesty's enemies; and that it was highly probable, that thereby the stations of our Cruisers, the strength of our Convoys, and the times of sailing of our Merchant-ships, had been betrayed to the French." Their Lordships added, "That it was her Majesty's glory, and the happiness of Europe, that she was at the head of one of the greatest Confederacies, that ever was known in history; and it was the common concern of the whole Alliance, that her counsels should be kept with the strictest secrecy: But that, in the papers now laid before her, her Majesty would be pleased to observe, that some of her resolutions of the greatest moment, and that required the utmost secrecy, had been sent to her enemies by the same post they were dispatched to the Allies. That all the papers in Mr. Secretary Harley's office, had, for a considerable time, been exposed to the view even of the meanest Clerks in that office; and that the perusal of all the "letters to and from the French prisoners, was chiefly trusted to Gregg, a person of a very suspicious character, and known to be extremely indigent. That it was not easily to be known, what ill consequences might have attended such negligence. But their Lordships depended upon it, that, these matters being thus plainly laid open to her Majesty, they should be well secured against any dangers of this nature for the future. That they were further in duty bound to beseech her Majesty, that all possible methods might be used to put a stop to that dangerous and (which might soon prove) fatal intercourse between her Majesty's subjects and France, which had of late received so great an encouragement by the countenance and protection given to Valiere and Bara; since, unless that were effectually done, her Majesty's enemies would continue to have what intelligence they pleased; her Majesty's Men of War and Merchant-ships would be in danger of being betrayed to the French; and that most destructive trade of sending wool to France, which had been

Gregg said, The first motive of his writing to France was in order to get money, by obtaining a pass; and that his first letter was the 24th of October last.

From his first entering into the Office he had always a great hand in perusing the French prisoners letters. That convenient opportunity, and his poverty, gave him the temptation.

The French prisoners letters came under a general cover, directed to Mr. Lewis. Marshal Tallard's letters are under a flying seal; the rest of them came always sealed, but are opened at the Office.

Generally Mr. Lewis threw them down on the table, and left the perusing them to the Clerks, to Mr. Mann and Gregg; and, since Mr. Mann left the Office, they have been trusted wholly to Gregg.

If Gregg observed any thing, that he thought material, he made an extract of it, and shewed it to the Secretary or Under-Secretary. He mentioned a particular extract he had made out of a letter of Mr. Chamillard to Mr. Tallard.

Letters came from Nottingham every post; sometimes twenty letters came to them in a day from France. These came always sealed. From the time he came into the Office, these letters were never perused, either by the Secretary or Under-Secretary; which he is sure of, because they were sealed when he looked on them. He cannot for that reason say, but Mr. Lewis might sometimes look into Mr. Tallard's letter, because that had a flying seal; but the rest were left sealed as they came by Mr. Lewis to the Clerks perusal.

Gregg said, he had a dispute with Mr. Lewis upon the account of these letters, Gregg declaring, he thought it not to be a business fit for the Under-Clerks to be trusted with.

Mr. Secretary Harley wrote a letter in answer to one from Monsieur Pontchartrain, thanking him for his civility to one Middleton.

In transcribing it, Gregg found it so ill-turned, and the French bad, that he acquainted the Secretary with it at eleven o'clock at night in October last. This letter was stopped; but after Mr. Lewis sent it away as it was wrote at first.

The rough draught of the Queen's letter to the Emperor, as it was ordered by the Lord-Treasurer, was left in the public book of the Office, to be entered the same night it was to be sent away. There Gregg said he found it, and transcribed it, and any other Clerk of the Office might have done it as well as he.

All the books in the Office lie in a press; the key is always in the door; and not only the Clerks, but the Chamber-keepers may have access,

All letters, except those wrote to the Duke of Marlborough, are entered in the books; but those are only copied in loose sheets. Gregg said he had copied many of those.

The draught of the Queen's letter to the Emperor was prepared by Mr. Lewis; it was then written in the hand of Mr. Thomas, Mr. Harley's domestic Clerk; the addition was in the Lord-Treasurer's own hand. Mr. Mann saw it as well as Gregg. Mann said to Gregg, That what was added by the Lord-Treasurer was much the brightest part of the letter.

Gregg said, he sent all his letters to France under the cover to Mr. Robineau. He owned he sent the copy of the Queen's letter to Mr. Chamillard the same night the Queen's letter was dispatched to the Emperor.

Gregg said further, that the letter in the Queen's own hand was given to Gregg by Mr. Secretary himself about one o'clock at night, and he was solely intrusted to put it up in Sir Philip Meadows's packet, after every body had left the Office.

Robineau, in his letter to Mr. Gregg, took notice, that he had delivered his letters to Monsieur Chamillard; and that Monsieur Chamillard sent to advise with Marshal Tallard upon Gregg's proposal.

Upon this Gregg wrote a letter to Marshal Tallard, of which he said he had no copy, but pretended to repeat the words of the letter to the Lords Committees.

The Lords Committees told Gregg, it would be expected by the House, that he should be very clear and particular, in declaring by what advice or encouragement he first began such a correspondence. He said, by none at all: He was tempted to it by the devil, and the hopes of getting money.

He said, that, upon hearing a French periwig-maker was committed to Newgate for high-treason, he had desired to be admitted again to the Lords of the Cabinet-Council. But he would not own, that he knew the man, but said, he had since heard his name was Valiere or Clarke; he was told so by a Gentlewoman, who came to see him since his condemnation.

He said, he held no correspondence in England, but only in sending the common letter of the Office, with other printed news-papers, to some Gentlemen.

Gregg said, he had been long acquainted with one Crookbanks, who promised him, that, if he would procure a French pass, he should have two hundred guineas; and Gregg undertook to procure the pass.

The first time he wrote to Mr. Chamillard was the 24th of October last.

Brown, a Merchant, father-in-law to Crookbanks, and one Bullinger, a Merchant, were acquainted with this

"with much charge and trouble interrupted, and in good measure suppressed, would be revived to a greater degree than ever."

To this address the Queen returned an answer, "That she was sorry, that any, who had been employed by those in her service, should have proved false to their trust, and injurious to the public. That she doubted not, the examples, laid before her by their Lordships, would be a sufficient warning to keep all matters of importance as secret as might be, and to employ such only, as there should be good grounds to believe would be faithful."

Gregg's execution.

After the presenting of this address, Gregg was respited about a month longer, but, still refusing to make any farther discoveries, he was executed at Tyburn on the 28th of April 1708. He left a paper with the Sheriff (1), wherein he entirely cleared Mr. Harley; though some suspected that Gentleman to be the contriver of that paper, and alcribed the compedness, which appeared in Gregg's countenance, till he came to the place of execution, to a firm expectation, which he was made to entertain, of a reprieve: and others gave out, that he complained, That there was no trust in man; while, on the other hand, the seven Lords of the Committee, appointed to examine him, were afterwards reproached this agreement about the pass, and they dined together at Brown's house; and Brown undertook for the money, if the pass could be procured.

Gregg said, he acquainted Bellinger of his having sent a copy of the Queen's letter to Monsieur Chamillard, at the Cross Key Tavern in Covent-Garden, and showed him extracts of Marshall Tallard's and Robillard's letters. He said also, that he read the extracts of their letters at another time in English to Brown and Crashtanks.

The Lords Committees asked him, To what end he told Bellinger of what he had done, in sending the Queen's letter to Monsieur Chamillard? He only said, It was done night madness.

The Lords Committees asked him, If any body came to him? he said, One Mr. Arbuthnot came to him, and no body else; and his business was to bring him charity.

The Lords Committees asked Mr. Gregg, If he had no more to acquaint their Lordships with? he said, No. And being told by them, that it concerned him very much to consider of it; that the Lords had observed he told them nothing but what he knew they knew; and in their hands to be fully informed of, without his saying any thing; and how hard it would be for the House of Lords to believe, that he would venture upon such a correspondence without some support or encouragement; he persisted in it, that he had no more to say.

As the Lords Committees were risen up, and had come to take Mr. Gregg away, he took a brown paper out of his pocket, which was sealed up, and took out of it a paper, which he said he had prepared against the Queen's birth-day, and desired the Lords to read it. It purported to be a petition to the House of Commons. He pretended he could not deliver it, because he concluded all the papers, sent by him, would be delivered to Mr. Secretary Horley.

The Lords, finding the paper to be addressed to the House of Commons, told him, It was not proper for them to receive it, and delivered it immediately back to him.

The Lords Committees, as they went away, told Gregg, that if he would recollect himself, and set down in writing any thing, that he thought might be for his own service, or of use to the Queen and her Government, he might send it to them, and the Keeper should have directions to convey it safely.

The next morning Gregg sent a letter to the Lords Committees, which, as soon as they had perused, they returned to him again by a Gentleman with the following message:

"The Lords of the Committee have ordered me to return this paper to you, they being of opinion, that it is not fit to be brought to the examination, for which they were sent to you by the House."

The Lords Committee, think themselves obliged to acquaint the House, that they did not observe Gregg to be under any disorder or terror from the apprehension of sense of his danger.

The indictment of Gregg for his treasonable correspondence with her Majesty's enemies was brought before the Lords Committees; which indictment he confessed upon his trial, and judgment was thereupon given against him.

The Lords Committees do think it their duty to acquaint the House, that they having been informed by means of the Keeper of Newgate, that one William Gregg had been formerly in Newgate, and indeed for counterfeiting the coin of the Kingdom; and that it was talked amongst the turnkeys in prison, that this was the same man, they sent to search the books in Newgate, and found there, that, in May 1697, William Gregg and Elizabeth Gregg were indicted for counterfeiting the coin. Thereupon they sent for Mr. Tanner, who has the custody of those records: He brought the indictment before them; and it appeared, that Elizabeth Gregg was found guilty and executed; but that William Gregg was acquitted; and Thomas Hallway and Simon Newport were the witnesses at the trial, who, as was said, are both dead since that time.

But one Thomas Kniferley and James Biddle declaring that they both knew that Gregg, who was then indicted, very well, and believed they should know him again, if they saw him; the Lords Committees sent them severally to see William Gregg now in Newgate, and they both of them did declare, that they believed and were confident, that the same person, now in Newgate, was the same William Gregg, who was then indicted, and whose supposed wife was then found guilty, and burnt, and they did both of them voluntarily make oath to this effect; and James Biddle swore, that, after the trial, the discourse in the neighbourhood was, that Elizabeth Gregg took the whole matter upon herself at the trial.

Their two affidavits are laid before your Lordships.

After one of these persons had been to see William Gregg, William Gregg wrote a letter, directed to the Lords of the Committee, in which he did very positively deny, that he was the person, who had been tried for coming in May 1697.

(1) It was in these terms:

"The crime, I am now justly to suffer for, having made a great noise in the world, a paper of more than ordinary length will be expected from the criminal, who therefore takes this last opportunity to profess his utter abhorrence and sincere repentance of all his sins against God, and of all the heinous crimes committed against the Queen, whose forgiveness I most heartily implore, as I shall heartily pray for her Majesty's long Life and happy Reign over her united people, and success against her enemies, with my parting breath.

"This is all the satisfaction I can possibly make injured Majesty. I declare, in the next place, the reparation I would make, were it in my power, to those of her Majesty's subjects I have wronged in any kind, and particularly the right Honourable Robert Harley, Esq; whose pardon I heartily beg for basely betraying my trust; which declaration, though, of itself, sufficient to clear the said Gentleman, yet, for the sake of those, whom it was my misfortune not to be able to satisfy in my lifetime

affairs of Spain.
Barnet.
Pr. H. C.

During these proceedings, an enquiry into the affairs of Spain was begun in both Houses. The Earl of Peterborough had received such positive orders for recalling him, that, though he delayed as long as he could, yet at last he came home in August 1707; but the Queen, before she would admit him into her presence, required of him an account of some particulars in his conduct, in military matters, in his negotiations, and in the disposal of the money remitted to him; to which he made such general answers, as gave little satisfaction; but seemed to reserve the matter to a Parliamentary examination, which was now entered upon by both Houses. All the Tories magnified his conduct, and studied to detract from the Earl of Galway; but it was thought, that the Ministry were under some restraints with relation to the Earl, though he did not spare them; which gave occasion to many to say, they were afraid of him, and durst not provoke him. The Whigs, on the other hand, made severe remarks on his conduct. The complaints, which King Charles of Spain made of him, were read; upon which he brought such a number of papers, and so many witnesses to the bar, to justify his conduct, that after ten or twelve days, spent wholly in reading papers, and in hearing witnesses, both Houses grew equally weary of the matter; so that, without coming to any conclusion, or to any vote, they let all, that related to him, fall. But that gave them a handle to consider the present state of affairs in Spain; in which it was found, that of the twenty-nine thousand three hundred and ninety-five English forces, provided by Parliament, for the service of Spain and Portugal, in the year 1707, there was but eight thousand six hundred and sixty men in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza (2), and that not above half the Officers, who belonged to those bodies, served there. This gave the House of Commons a high distaste; and it was hoped by the Tories, that they should have carried the House to severe votes and warm addresses on that head; which was much laboured by them, in order to load the Ministry. In this Mr. Harley and his party were very cold and passive; and it was generally believed, that the matter was privately set on by them. The Commons, on the 5th of February, addressed the Queen, desiring that she would

"I do sacredly protest, that, as I shall answer it before the judgment-seat of Christ, the Gentleman aforesaid was not privy to my writing to France directly nor indirectly; neither I, his unworthy Clerk, any ways accessory to the miscarriage before Toulon, nor the losses by sea; all which happened before the first of my letters, which was writ the 24th of October 1707. As for my Creditors, as I am in no condition to satisfy them, so I earnestly beg, they would forgive me; and I pray God to make up their losses eleven-fold.

"For my part, I do freely forgive all men, and die in perfect charity with them, not without humble hopes of finding forgiveness, through the merits of Jesus Christ, with God, who in mercy touched my conscience so powerfully from the beginning, as to prevent my prostituting the same to save my life; for which instance of his love, to be preferred before life itself, I bless and magnify his holy name with unspeakable joy and comfort at my death, nothing near so ignominious as would have been such a life.

"After this occasion, the duty of a dying man leads me to profess the Religion, in which I was brought up, and do now die, which is the Protestant. The scandal given thereunto by my enormous practices cannot be better taken away, than by my publishing to the world my hearty sorrow for those sensual pleasures, which have proved my bane. Therefore let all, who shall read this poor paper, take warning by me to shun the like youthful lusts; to which whoever gives up himself, cannot tell how far they may, when indulged, carry him, even to the committing such crimes, as he thought himself incapable of some time a day; of which truth I, to my woeful experience, am a melancholy instance. But, at the same time, I appeal to the Great God, before whom I am going to appear, that, notwithstanding all the pains taken to make me out an old Offender, by fastening on me the crime of counterfeiting the coin, this is the first fault, that ever I ventured upon; which was not out of any zeal for the Pretender, whom I not only disown at my death, but solemnly declare, that, in all my life, I never thought he had a right to these Realms, how foolishly soever I may have rendered myself obnoxious in this particular; but the only motive of my mad undertaking was money (of which I never received any) on account of the ship-pais, though No. 56. "I have met with the more just reward of such secret services intended by

WILLIAM GREGG."

(1) Dr. Swift, in his Examiners, has several passages to this purpose.

In No. XXXII. for March 15, 1710-11, he writes thus: "And here it may be worth observing, how unanimous a concurrence there is between some persons, once great in power, and a French Papist [Guiscard] both agreeing in the great end of taking away Mr. Harley's life, though differing in their methods; the first proceeding by Subornation, the other by violence; wherein Guiscard seems to have the advantage, as aiming no further than his life, while the others designed to destroy, at once, both that and his reputation. The malice of both against this Gentleman seems to have risen from the same cause, his discovering designs against the Government. It was Mr. Harley, who detected the treasonable correspondence of Gregg, and secured him betimes, when a certain Great Man, who shall be nameless, had, out of the depth of his politics, sent him a caution to make his escape, which would certainly have fixed the appearance of guilt upon Mr. Harley; but, when that was prevented, they would have inticed the condemned criminal with the promise of a pardon, to write and sign an accusation against the Secretary. But, to use Gregg's own expression, his death was nothing near so ignominious, as would have been such a life, that must have been saved by prostituting his conscience." Dr. Swift repeats the same charge in the Examiner, No. XXXIII. and was answered in the Medley, No. XXVI. and in a pamphlet, printed in 1711 in 8vo, intitled, A letter to the seven Lords of the Committee appointed to examine Gregg.

The

1707 8. would order an account to be laid before them, how it came to pass, that there were no more English forces in Spain and Portugal at the time of the battle of Almanza, and that she would use her utmost endeavours that the war in Spain might be vigorously and effectually prosecuted.

Feb. 13. To this address the Queen sent an answer, by which it appeared, that, though by death and desertion the number of the troops in Spain was much diminished, yet the whole number provided, or at least very near it, was sent out of England. Notwithstanding this answer, the Commons renewed the addresses they had presented before, about the forces maintained by the Kings of Spain and Portugal, to which the Queen gave the following answer: "That in relation to that part of the address, which concerned the forces of the King of Spain, her Majesty has ordered to be laid before the House a list of the troops provided by the King of Spain, for the service of the year 1707: And, in relation to the troops of Portugal, her Majesty had, ever since the treaty with that Crown, given directions to her Ministers there, to use all possible means, that his Majesty should furnish the whole number of men agreed for by the treaty: And she hoped, that those instances had, in a great measure, had their desired effect." At the same time she observed, "That the methods of discipline there made it impossible to know the number of those troops with the same exactness, as is practised in other parts. And considering with what cheerfulness and success they marched through Spain to Madrid, and the losses they sustained; and being very well assured, that the King of Portugal had lately raised, and was still raising a considerable number of forces; her Majesty had not thought it advisable to make too nice an inquiry into the state of those troops; especially, since she was very sensible how diligent the enemy was in making continual applications, to break an Alliance of so great importance to the common cause."

The next day the Commons took into consideration the Queen's answer to their address of the 5th of February, and the question being put, "That the deficiency of the British troops in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza, had been chiefly occasioned by the want of timely and effectual recruits being sent thither;" It passed in the negative; and, on the contrary, an address was voted and presented to the Queen by the whole House, returning her the thanks of the House, for her taking measures to restore the affairs in Spain, and for providing foreign troops for that service." To which the Queen replied, "That she had always looked upon the war of Spain to be of so great importance to us, that she could never fail of continuing her utmost application to support it in the most effectual manner; and that the satisfaction they had expressed, in their address for her endeavours in this matter, was extremely acceptable to her." The service in Spain was much derided, and there was good reason for it: Things there could not be furnished but at expensive rates, and the soldiers were generally ill used in their quarters, and were treated very unkindly, not by King Charles, but by those about him, and by the bigotted Spaniards.

The same day the address about the forces in Spain was presented to the Queen, there was a great debate in the Grand Committee of the House of Lords, occasioned by a bill passed by the Commons, for rendering the Union of the two Kingdoms more intimate and compleat; whereby, in the first place it was enacted, "That, from the first of May 1708, there should be but one Privy-Council in the Kingdom of Great-Britain." All the Court was against this bill. Those, who governed Scotland, desired to keep up their authority there, with the advantage they made by it; and they gave the Ministers of England great assurances, that by their influence elections might be so managed, as to serve all the ends of the Court; but they said, that without due care these might be carried so,

So there only remains, out of the twenty-nine thousand, three hundred, and ninety-five men provided for by

1707-8. as to run all the contrary way. This was the secret motive; yet this could not be owned in a public assembly; and therefore that, which was pretended, was, that many great families in Scotland, with the greatest part of the Highlanders, were so ill-affected, that without a watchful eye, ever intent upon them, they could not be kept quiet. It lay at too great a distance from London to be governed by orders sent from thence. To this it was answered, that by the circuits of the Justiciary Courts, and by Justices of Peace, that Country might be well-governed, notwithstanding its distance, as Wales and Conwall were. The bill had been carried in the House of Commons by a great majority, that there should be only one Privy-Council for the whole Island. But, in the House of Lords, it met with a considerable opposition. The Court stood alone; all the Tories, and the much greater part of the Whigs, were for the bill. The Court, seeing the party for the bill so strong, were willing to compound the matter; and whereas, by the bill, the Council of Scotland was not to sit after the first of May, the Court moved to have it continued to the first of October. It was visible, that this was proposed only in order to the managing elections for the next Parliament; for which reason the Lords adhered to the day prefixed in the bill. But a new debate arose about the power given by the bill to Justices of Peace, which seemed to be an encroachment on the jurisdiction of the Lords Regalities, and of the Hereditary Sheriffs and Stewards, who had the right of trying criminals, in the first instance; for fourteen days time; yet it was ordinary, in the cases of great crimes and riots, for the Privy-Council to take immediate cognizance of them, without any regard to the fourteen days: So that by this act the Justices of Peace were only impowered to do that, which the Privy-Council usually did; and, except the occasion was so great, as to demand a quick dispatch, it was not to be doubted, but that the Justices of Peace would have great regard to all private rights. Yet, since this had the appearance of breaking in upon private rights, this was much insisted on by those, who hoped, by laying aside these powers given to the Justices of Peace, to have gained the main point of keeping up a Privy-Council in Scotland. For all the Scots Ministers said, that the Country would be in great danger, if there were not a supreme Government still kept up in it. But it seemed an absurd thing, that there should be a different Administration, where there was but one Legislature. While Scotland had an intire Legislature within itself, the Nation assembled in Parliament could procure the correction of errors in the Administration; whereas now, that it was not a tenth part of the Legislative body, if it was still to be kept under a different Administration, that Nation could not have strength enough to procure a redress of its grievances in Parliament; by which means they might come to be subdued and governed as a Province. And the arbitrary way, in which the Council of Scotland had proceeded ever since King James the First's time, but more particularly since the Restoration, was fresh in memory, and had been no small motive to induce the best men of that Nation to promote the Union, that they might be delivered from the tyranny of the Council; and their hopes would be still disappointed, if they were still kept under that yoke. This point was in conclusion yielded, and the bill passed by a majority of fifty Lords against forty-five, though to the great discontent of the Court. There was a new Court of Exchequer created in Scotland, according to the frame of that Court in England. Special acts were made for the elections and returns of the Representatives in both Houses of Parliament; and such was the disposition of the English to oblige them, and the behaviour of the Scots was so discreet, that every thing, that was proposed for the good of their Country, was agreed to: Both Whigs and Tories vied with one another, who should shew most care and concern for the welfare of that part of Great-Britain.

On the 11th of February there happened an important change in the Administration in England, for Mr. Henry Boyle, uncle to the Earl of Burlington, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, was made Secretary of State, in the room of Mr. Harley. Probably the affair of Gregg, Valiere, and Bara, which in some measure affected Mr. Harley's credit, made him more earnest to bring about a change in the conduct of affairs, in which he relied on the credit of the new favourite, Mrs. Masham. The Duke of Marlborough, and the Lord-Treasurer, having discovered many of his practices, laid them before the Queen, who would believe nothing, that was suggested to his prejudice. Her Majesty denied, that she had given any authority for carrying messages to the Tories; but would not believe, that he or his friends had done it, nor would she enter into any examination of his ill-conduct, and was uneasy, when she heard it spoke of. These Lords wrote therefore to the Queen, that they could serve her no longer, if he was continued in that post; and, on the Sunday following, when they were summoned to a Cabinet Council, they both went to the Queen, and told her, that they must quit her service, since they saw, she was resolved not to part with Mr. Harley. Her Majesty seemed not much concerned at Lord Godolbin's offering to lay down; and it was believed to be a part of Mr. Harley's new scheme to remove him; but she was much touched with the Duke of Marlborough's offering to quit, and studied, with some soft expressions, to divert him from that resolution: But he was firm, and did not yield to them. Upon this they both went away, to the wonder of the whole Court. Immediately after, the Queen went to the Cabinet Council; and Mr. Harley opened some matters relating to foreign by Parliament, six thousand, seven hundred and three, either Officers or Soldiers to be accounted for by loss in transportation, by death, desertion, and by absence on account of sickness, or recruiting; to supply which defects, one battalion of guards, three of marines, and a detachment of dragoons were sent to Spain, and four regiments of foot to Portugal, which were not a part of the establishment for Spain or Portugal, but were effectually four thousand, seven hundred and ninety-two men.

(1) The

1707-8. reign affairs. The whole Board was very uneasy; the Duke of Somerſet ſaid, That he did not ſee how they could deliberate on ſuch matters, ſince the General was not with them. He repeated this with ſome vehemence, while all the reſt looked on ſo cold and fullen, that the Cabinet Council was ſoon at an end; and the Queen ſaw, that the reſt of her Miniſters, and the chief Officers, were reſolved to withdraw from her ſervice, if ſhe did not recal the two, who had left it. It was ſaid, that ſhe would have put all to the hazard, if Mr. Harley himſelf had not apprehended his danger, and reſolved to lay down. The Queen ſent the next day for the Duke of Marlborough, and, after ſome expoſtulations, ſhe told him, that Mr. Harley ſhould immediately leave his poſt, which he did within two days. But the Queen ſeemed to carry a deep reſentment of his and the Lord Godolphin's behaviour on this occaſion; and, though they went on with her buſineſs, they found they had not her confidence. The Duchefs of Marlborough, for ſome weeks, abſtained from going to Court; but afterwards, that breach was made up in appearance, though it was little more than an appearance. Both Houſes of Parliament expreſſed a great concern at this rupture in the Court, and apprehended the ill effects, which it might have. The Commons let the bill of Supply lie on the table, though it was ordered for that day. Upon Mr. Harley's removal, Sir Simon Harcourt, the Attorney-General, Sir Thomas Manſell, Comptroller of the Houſhold, and Mr. St. John, Secretary at war, laid down likewiſe their poſts (1).

A few days after this breach at Court, the Nation was ſuddenly alarmed with the news of an invaſion. The French King, to retaliate the late attempt upon Toulon, reſolved to carry the war into Great-Britain, by ſending the pretended Prince of Wales to Scotland with a fleet and army, to poſſeſs himſelf of that Kingdom, being induced thereto by the hope given him, 1707-8. that the Scots were ſo highly diſcontented on account of the Union, as to be ripe for a revolt, and ready to join him on his arrival amongſt them. The neceſſary preparations for the expedition were carried on at Dunkirk with all imaginable diligence, and with ſuch ſecrecy, that the deſign was rather gueſſed at than known, March 7. till the Pretender himſelf ſet out from St. Ger- N. S. mains, when it was no longer a myſtery, that he intended to make a deſcent upon Scotland. The day before his departure, the French King went to St. *Germain*s to take his leave of him, and with him ſuccesſ; preſented him with a ſword enriched with diamonds of a conſiderable value, and deſired him always to remember, that it was a French ſword. The Chevalier de St. George (for this was the name the Pretender aſſumed in this adventure) answered the compliment with aſſuring him, "That, if it was his good fortune to get poſſeſſion of the Throne of his Anceſtors, he would not content himſelf with returning him thanks by Letters and Ambaſſadors, but would ſhew his gratitude by deeds: Nay, he would come in perſon to acknowledge his Majeſty's protection and aſſiſtance." To which the French King replied, He hoped never to ſee him again. Upon his arrival at Dunkirk, the Pretender was furniſhed with very fine tents, a large ſet of gold and ſilver plate of curious workmanſhip, cloaths for his future life-guards, liveries for his houſhold, and other neceſſaries; towards the charge of which, and of this armament, the Pope was ſaid to have contributed a conſiderable ſum of money (2). The Pretender's motto upon the colours and ſtandards were, Dieu & mon Droit, "God and my Right." Nil deſperandum Chriſto duce & aſſipice Chriſto, "I ought not to deſpair, ſince Chriſt is my guide and helper." And Cui ventu & mare obediant, impera, Domine, &c.

(1) The Duchefs of Marlborough, in the account of her Conduct, p. 252, &c. ſpeaks of this affair in the following terms: The Duke of Marlborough and Lord Godolphin had often told the Queen in the moſt reſpectful manner, that it was impoſſible for them to do her any ſervice, while Mr. Harley was in her confidence. Her Majeſty nevertheleſs ſeemed determined not to part with him, till at length thoſe two Lords, being urged by neceſſity to it, declared their reſolution to ſerve no longer with him; and they abſented themſelves from the Council. Mr. Harley would have proceeded to buſineſs without them, when the Council met; but the Duke of Somerſet ſaid, he did not ſee how it could be to any purpoſe, when neither the General nor the Treafurer was preſent; whereupon the Council immediately broke up. This had ſuch an effect upon the Queen, that, very ſoon after, Mr. Harley was diſmiſſed from his poſt. Such a compliance with the Miniſters ſeemed to the eye of the world a very great conceſſion, but was in truth nothing. For it was evident by what followed, that this appearance of giving up Mr. Harley was with his own conſent, and by his own advice, who, as long as Mrs. Molham continued in favour, would, under pretence of viſiting her, who was his Couſin, have all the opportunities he could wiſh for, of practiſing upon the paſſions and credulity of the Queen; and the method of correſponding with him had been ſettled ſome time before. — I was fully apprized of all this, continues the Duchefs; yet I reſolved to try, if by being eaſy and quiet I could regain any influence with her Majeſty. She had given me ſome encouragement to hope it. For when, a little before Mr. Harley's diſmiſſion, Lord Marlborough reſolved to quit the ſervice; and when, on that occaſion, I had with tears (which a tender concern at the thought of parting from her Majeſty made me ſhed) repreſented to her, that, if the Duke retired, it would be improper, and even impoſſible for me to ſtay at Court after him; ſhe declared, that ſhe could not bear the thought of my leaving her; and that it muſt never be. And at that time ſhe made me a promiſe, that if ever I ſhould leave her (which, ſhe again ſaid, muſt never be) ſhe would beſtow my offices among my children. Nay, the Whigs had ſome reaſon to flatter themſelves about this time, that her Majeſty would become better diſpoſed to them, than ſhe had hitherto been. The Pretender's attempt to land in Scotland, which happened about this time, gave her an alarm, that ſeemed to bring a conviction along with it, that the Whigs were the moſt to be depended upon for the ſupport of her Government; at leaſt what ſhe ſaid, in answer to the Lords addreſs upon the occaſion, had this appearance. But as the danger preſently blew over, and as her fears ceaſed with the cauſe of them, ſo all the hope, which the Whigs had raiſed in themſelves from thoſe fears, preſently vaniſhed.

(2) The French King wrote the following letter to the Pope, upon occaſion of the Pretender's expedition:

Holy Father,

"The great zeal, which I have always had to re-eſtabliſh on the Throne of England King James Stuart III, is well known to you; though there was "not

1707-8. fac tranquillitatem; "Thou, Lord, whom the winds and sea obey, command, that it be calm."

The preparations of the French at Dunkirk gave great uneasiness to the States-General, who concerted with the British Ministers the necessary measures for dispelling the storm, which seemed to threaten her Britannic Majesty's Dominions, of which they gave timely information to the Queen; as did likewise her Envoy, Major-General Cadogan, who had early intelligence of the design from a Jew residing at Dunkirk.

The Commons acquainted with it. March 4.

Upon this Mr. Secretary Boyle acquainted the Commons, "That her Majesty had commanded him to lay before the House several advices received the night before, and that morning, of great preparations at Dunkirk, for an immediate invasion upon England by the French, and of the pretended Prince of Wales's being come to Dunkirk for that purpose." The letters and extracts relating thereto being read, it was unanimously resolved to present the following address to her Majesty, in which the House of Lords readily concurred,

The address of both Houses upon it. March 5.

"We your Majesty's most faithful and obedient Subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons of Great-Britain in Parliament assembled, do beg leave to return our most hearty thanks to your Majesty for being graciously pleased to communicate to your Parliament the intelligence you have received of an intended invasion of this Kingdom by the pretended Prince of Wales, supported by a French power.

"We are so sensible of the happiness we enjoy under your Majesty, and are so affected with the dangerous consequences of such an attempt, both to your Person and Government, that, with hearts full of concern for your Majesty's safety, we beseech your Majesty, that you will be pleased to take particular care of your Royal Person: And we, on our part, are fully and unanimously resolved to stand by and assist your Majesty with our lives and fortunes, in maintenance of your undoubted right and title to the Crown of these Realms, against the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other your enemies both at home and abroad.

"The care your Majesty has taken for the defence of your Dominions, and particularly in fitting out so great a fleet in so short a time, gives satisfaction and encouragement to all your good subjects, who are likewise very sensible of the zeal the States-General have shewn upon this occasion.

"As a farther instance of our duty, we humbly desire, that you will be pleased to order, that the laws against Papists and Non-jurors be put in execution; and that directions be given to seize and secure such persons, with their horses and arms, as your Majesty shall have cause to suspect are disaffected to your Person and Government.

"And as we doubt not, but, by the blessing of God upon the continuance of your Majesty's care, your enemies will be put to confusion, so we readily embrace this opportunity, to shew to your Majesty and the whole world, that no attempts of this kind shall deter us from supporting your Majesty in a vigorous prosecution of the present war against France, till the Monarchy of Spain be restored to the House of Austria, and your Majesty have the glory to complete the recovery of the liberties of Europe."

To this address her Majesty was pleased to answer in the following terms:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have such intire dependance on the providence of God, and so much trust in the faithful services of my good Subjects, that I hope this attempt will prove dangerous only to those, who undertake it.

"I am extremely sensible of your concern and affection for Me and my Government, and shall have a very particular regard to the advice you give me upon this occasion.

"I am also very well pleased with the justice, which you have done the States-General, in taking notice of their timely care for our safety, and their readiness to give us all possible assistance.

"The firm resolution, which you express upon all occasions, of supporting me in bringing this war to a safe and happy conclusion, as it is most essentially obliging to me; so I assure myself, it will mightily dishearten our common enemies, and give the greatest encouragement and advantage to all our Allies."

The Parliament passed two bills; the one, that the abjuration might be tendered to all persons, and that such as refused should be in the condition of convict recusants. By the other, the Habeas Corpus act was suspended till October, with relation to persons taken up by the Government on suspicion. The Pretender and his Adherents were proclaimed Traitors and Rebels.

Upon the first notice of the French armament Preparations abroad against the invasion in Dunkirk, Major-General Cadogan repaired to Brussels, and concerted with Monsieur d'Avvers the march of the British forces to be shipped off for Great-Britain, and how to supply

"not hitherto a time proper for it, as well by reason of the conjunctures, as by the unity of my enemies, which did not give me leave to act in so righteous a cause for our holy faith, the chief object of all our actions. We have now thought good to let him depart from our Royal seat, on the 7th of March, in order to embark himself on board a fleet, where every thing has been prepared for him, with sufficient forces to establish him on the Throne, after he shall have been received on his arrival by the faithful people of Scotland, and proclaimed as their No. 56. VOL. IV.

"true and lawful King. I have thought it fit not to omit sending you this important news, that by your ardour the Union of our Holy Mother the Church may increase in that Kingdom, and that God may prosper him, whilst the time is favourable. It is now, Holy Father, your business to accompany him by your zeal with your holy benedictions, which I also ask for myself, and I remain, Holy Father, your most loving Son.

(1) He

1707-8. ply their room in their several garrisons. From Brussels he went to Ghent; and having conferred with General Lumley, the Governor of that place, and Commander in chief of the British troops, orders were given to ten battalions, one of the guards, two of Orkney's, one of Argyle's, one of Primrose's, one of Lalo's, one of Howe's, one of Ingoldesby's, one of North and Grey's, and one of Godfrey's, to hold themselves in readiness to march at an hour's warning. This done, Cadogan repaired to Osford, to forward the preparations, which, by his early directions, were making there for the embarking of those regiments, as soon as there should be certain advice, that the twelve French battalions, that were to attend the Pretender in his expedition, were actually on board. On the other hand, the Admiralty of Great-Britain fitted out a fleet with such incredible diligence, that (without diminishing the convoy provided for the Lisbon fleet, which consisted of twelve British, and five Dutch men of war, under the command of Sir John Leake,) Sir George Byng and the Lord Dursley sailed from Deal towards the coast of Dunkirk, on the 27th of February, O. S. in the morning, with twenty three British and three Dutch men of war, and one British fire-ship. The same day, about noon, Sir George Byng came to an anchor in Gravelin Pits; and, immediately after, went into a small frigate, and sailed within two miles of Flemish Road, from whence he had a prospect of the ships that lay there; and, the next day, learned from a fisherman, taken off the shore, the number and strength of the enemy's ships; that about ten thousand men were in and about Dunkirk, ready to embark; that they expected every day several ships from Brest; and that the Pretender was come to Gravelin in his way to Dunkirk; where he arrived on the 9th of March, N. S. in the morning.

The French, who imagined that Admiral Leake might by this time have sailed for Lisbon, and consequently, that Great-Britain was unprovided of shipping, were so confident of the measures they had taken, that they publicly boasted, That God alone could disappoint their designs. But so great was their surprize, upon the British fleet's appearing off Mardyke, that a stop was put to the embarkation of their troops, and frequent expresses were dispatched to Paris for new orders. The Count de Fourbin, who commanded the enemy's squadron, having represented to the French King, that he might indeed get out of Dunkirk harbour, and perhaps land the troops; but that he could not answer for his Majesty's ships (1); that Monarch, who was fully determined on this expedition, sent him positive orders to re-embark his troops, and to put to sea with the first fair wind. In the mean time, the enemy gave out, that their disembarking of the troops at Dunkirk was upon account of the Pretender's being indisposed with the measles, attended with an ague; but, as soon as the French King's last orders came, that pretence vanished; the Prince was said to be perfectly recovered; and Count Fourbin having, on the 14th of March, N. S. received advice from Boulogne, that the British fleet, being forced from their station by high winds, was seen off that place, steering, on the 12th, for the Downs, they began, at two in the afternoon, to re-embark their forces. The wind turning fair for them on the 17th of March, N. S. they took that opportunity, and sailed at four in the afternoon from the road of Dunkirk; but, the wind changing about ten at night, they were obliged to come to an anchor in Newport-Pits; where they continued till the 19th, at ten in the evening, when, the wind changing, they set sail again, steering their course for Scotland. On the other hand, the fleet under the command of Sir George Byng, which came back into the Downs the 21st of March, and was since reinforced to the number of above forty men of war of the line of battle, besides frigates and fireships, set sail again the 24th on a signal given by one of the scouts, who observed six ships to the westward, supposed to be the Brest squadron. On the 26th, at ten in the morning, Sir George Byng, who was then between Dunkirk and Calais, received intelligence by an Osford ship, sent out by Major-General Cadogan, of the sailing of the Dunkirk squadron from Newport-Pits: Upon which he called a Council of war, and according to the resolution taken in it, sailed immediately in pursuit of the enemy; having first made a detachment of a strong squadron, under the command of Admiral Baker, with instructions to convoy the troops, that were embarked at Osford, and to look after the ships still remaining in Dunkirk road.

In the mean time, the Parliament proceeded with great unanimity and vigour in their resolutions, for the support of the Government against the Pretender and his Adherents. They passed a bill to discharge the Clans of Scotland from their vassalage to their heads, who should take up arms against the Queen. This bill was chiefly owing to Major-General Stanhope, and Sir David Dalrymple; but, the enemy not landing

(1) He observes in his Memoirs, that he had no opinion of this enterprize. "All the time I staid at Court, says he, I made several attempts to persuade the Ministers to drop an enterprize, which I saw would be so unprofitable: I quite tired myself with representing the inconveniencies of it; I told the Prime Minister again and again, that the best we could make of it would be an unprofitable and dishonourable cruize; that I was thoroughly mortified at his Majesty's having made choice of me for an expedition, which had all the evidence of being attended with ill success: That, if a descent was made, the six thousand men would surely be lost, and the forces of the Kingdom diminished in proportion, besides the scandal of giving into a chimerical enterprize, which ought to be looked upon as a mere dream. The answer to all this was, The loss of the six thousand men gives us no trouble; the King of England, I perceive, so they mis-called the Pretender, must be satisfied. I never could get any thing else out of the Ministry. The night before I set out for Dunkirk, I went to Court to take my leave of the King: Monsieur Le Count, said his Majesty, You are sensible of the importance of your Commission, I hope you will discharge it like yourself. Sir, replied I, Your Majesty does me a very great honour, but, if you will vouchsafe me a moment's audience, I have several things to represent to you concerning this Commission. The King, who had been informed by the Minister of the objections I had made to it all along, only said, Monsieur Fourbin, I wish you a good voyage, I have affairs upon my hands, and cannot hear you now."

1707-8. ing in Scotland, the bill had no effect. On the 10th of March, the Queen came to the House of Peers, and made a speech to both Houses, importing, "That she had received advices that morning from Ostend, that the French fleet failed from Dunkirk on Tuesday, at three in the morning, northward, with the Pretender on board: That Sir George Byng had notice of it the same day at ten, and he being very much superior to the enemy, both in number and strength, her Majesty made no question, but, by God's Blessing, he would soon be able to give a good account of them. That she had also advice, that ten battalions of her troops were embarked at Ostend ready to fail with their convoy, as there should be occasion; And that she should continue to take all proper measures for disappointing the enemy's designs." Hereupon the House of Commons unanimously voted the following remarkable address, which was presented to the Queen by the whole House:

Most gracious Sovereign,

The Commons address.
March 13. "WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Great-Britain in Parliament assembled, humbly wait on your Majesty, to express the great sense we have of your grace and favour, in communicating to us from the Throne the account of the French King's persisting to invade your Dominions, and to impose a Pretender upon these Realms, over which your Majesty is rightful and lawful Sovereign.

"The small number of ships and troops, with which this project is prosecuted, notwithstanding the great naval force your Majesty has fitted out with so much expedition, as it ought to be regarded with contempt on the one side, so on the other it gives us just cause to believe, that their chief dependance is upon some of your subjects, whose restless passions and arbitrary principles have, for some years, engaged them in forming designs to undermine and destroy the most happy Establishment that the Government of this Island was ever founded upon.

"The defence of your Majesty's Person and Government, and the support of the Protestant Succession, are things so sacred to us and your people, that, as a demonstration of our unfeigned zeal to assist and support your Majesty to the utmost of our power, we do, in the name of the Commons of Great-Britain, give this assurance, that whatever charge you shall be at by augmenting your troops at home, and replacing those you have recalled from abroad, or for such other services, as your Majesty shall judge necessary upon this extraordinary occasion, shall be effectually made good. And as we humbly recommend it to your Majesty, that the severest punishments may be inflicted upon such as shall assist in so unnatural a design, as that of betraying your Majesty and their Country; so we doubt not but you will give suitable encouragement to all those, who shall shew their fidelity, by opposing the Invader and his Accomplices in Scotland, or wherever the descent shall be.

"Your Majesty wants no incitement to a ready prosecution of the war, in which you are engaged for the common cause; yet permit us to take this opportunity to intreat your Majesty, that this enterprize may no ways divert your constant vigour, that all the world may see, that both your Majesty and your people are determined to support your Allies in all parts, whatever attempts are made at home.

May it please your Majesty,

"There can be nothing so dangerous or fatal to the safety of your Royal Person, and the security of the present happy establishment, as those persons, who endeavour to create divisions and animosities among your faithful Subjects, or by any artful methods lessen the just esteem your Majesty has for those, who have so eminently, and in so distinguishing a manner, commanded your armies, and managed your treasure, to the honour and glory of your Majesty abroad, and the intire satisfaction of your people at home. We therefore humbly beg leave to beseech your Majesty to discountenance all such persons and designs in the most remarkable manner."

The Queen's answer to this address was:

Gentlemen,

"I Give you my hearty thanks for this repeated assurance and certain proof of your zeal for me, and for the Protestant Succession.

"I am glad your thoughts of the war abroad so perfectly agree with my firm resolution upon that subject.

"You may depend, that no apprehensions (further than are reasonable) shall have any influence on my measures, while the cause of Religion and Liberty, with the good affections of my people, are on my side.

"I think all who endeavour to make divisions among my faithful subjects, must be mine and the Kingdom's enemies; and I shall never countenance any persons, who would go about to lessen the just esteem, which I have for those, who have done, and continue to do me, the most eminent services."

The Lords address was as hearty as that of the Commons, and, among other expressions of equal truth and affection, they said,

"We hope your Majesty will always have a just detestation of those persons, who, at any time, when this hellish attempt was a-foot, and so near breaking out, were using their endeavours to misrepresent the actions of your best Subjects, and create jealousies in your Majesty of those who had always served you most eminently and faithfully. And we beseech your Majesty not to give so just a cause of uneasiness to your people, as to suffer any such hereafter to have access to your Royal Person.

"We hope for this good effect from so unhappy an occasion, that the universal zeal, which will appear for the preservation of your Majesty's Government and the Protestant Succession, will unite us to one another, and cure our mistakes and misapprehensions, which have been so industriously and maliciously im-

1707-8. "proved. But nevertheless we most humbly offer it to your Majesty as our opinion, that your Majesty should principally depend upon and encourage those, who have been ever since the Revolution most steady and firm to the interest of the late King, and of your Majesty during your happy Reign."

Her Majesty's answer to this address was in these terms:

My Lords,

"I Am extremely sensible of your zeal and concern for the safety of my Person and Government, and very well pleased to find your thoughts agree so exactly with mine, that no attempt of our enemies against us at home should divert us from prosecuting the war abroad with the greatest vigour, the hopes of which has probably been one of their principal motives to so presumptuous an undertaking."

"As I cannot but wish there were not the least occasion of distinction among my Subjects; so I must always place my chief dependence upon those who have given such repeated proofs of the greatest warmth and concern for the support of the Revolution, security of my Person, and of the Protestant Succession."

Remark on the variation of the Queen's policy in her speeches.

The Queen, being much alarmed with the danger of this invasion, saw with what falsehoods she had been abused by those, who pretended to assure her there was not now a Jacobite in the Nation. For this reason she was observed to make a remarkable variation in her stile. She had never in any speech mentioned the Revolution, or those who had been concerned in it. And many of those, who made a considerable figure about her, studied, though against all sense and reason, to distinguish her title from the Revolution, on which it was plainly founded, and on nothing else. But in this answer and another speech she named the Revolution twice, and said, she would look on those concerned in it as the surest to her interests. She also fixed a new designation on the pretended Prince of Wales, and called him the Pretender (particularly in her speech at the close of this Session) and he was so called in a new set of addresses, which, upon this occasion, were made to the Queen.

7. F. 7. 13th Feb. 1707. March to Scotland.

Besides the ten English battalions, which Cadogan had embarked at Ostend, and which, sailing from thence the 28th of March, N. S. under the convoy of Admiral Baker, arrived three days after at Tinnmouth, the first and second troop of life-guards, a squadron of horse grenadiers, the Duke of Northumberland's regiment of horse-guards, the dragoons of Essex and Carpenter, a detachment of sixteen men out of each company of the first and second regiments of foot guards, making a complete battalion, and several regiments of foot, were ordered to march towards Scotland, whither the Earl of Leven, Commander in chief of the forces in that part of Great-Britain, and Governor of Edinburgh Castle, went post betimes, to provide for the security of that important fortress, and to make all the necessary dispositions to baffle any attempts, which the enemy could make on that side. Several regiments, in the South parts of Ireland, were at the same time commanded towards the North of that Kingdom, from whence, if occasion had required, they might, with ease, have been transported into Scotland. But all the precautions by land proved wholly unnecessary, by the disappointment of the enemy's design at sea, of which Sir George Byng gives an account in two letters of the 13th and 15th of March, from on board the Medway; the first whereof is as follows: "According to the opinion we had framed, when we left the station off Dunkirk, it has proved, that the enemy was designed for Edinburgh. This morning we saw the French fleet in the mouth of the Firth, off of which place we anchored the last night, and sent a boat a-shore to the Isle of May, from whence we had an account, that the French came to an anchor yesterday in the afternoon. They sent one ship up into Leith Road, which had a flag at the main-top-mast head. They report it, a blue one; but we are rather of opinion, that it is the standard. The people of the Island say, that, by the time that ship could get up before the town, they heard several guns fire, which were in the manner of a salute. The ship, that went up yesterday, came down this morning, and is now within two leagues of us. She appears to be a ship of sixty guns, but has now no flag on board. We saw this morning, when they weighed, a flag at the main top mast head, on board of one of their ships. They stand from us, and we after them, with all the sail we can."

The second letter, dated from Leith-Road, was as follows: "We chased the enemy to Northward of Buccaness, sometimes with reasonable hopes of coming up with them. The Dover and Ludlow-Castle, being the only clean-sailing ships we had, they were the first, which came up with part of the enemy's squadron, passing by some of the smaller, to engage some of the larger ships, and stop them till they could be relieved. They attacked two or three of their ships, among which was the Salisbury: They did not part with them, till more of our ships arrived, but worked their ships in a handsome manner, to cut them off from the rest of the fleet; but in the darkness of the night they all got out of sight, except the Salisbury, who falling in amongst our head-moat ships, the Leopard entered men on board her. We are informed by the Officers, who were taken, that there were twelve battalions on board their squadron, commanded by Count de Gacé, a Marshal of France. The pretended Prince of Wales, Lord Middleton, Lord Perth, the Mac-Donalds, Trevanion, and several other Officers and Gentlemen, were on board the Mars, in which also was Monsieur Fourbin, who commanded the squadron. The number and strength of their ships are very near the account we lately received from Dunkirk; nor were they joined by the Brest men of war. And they further assure us, that the ships, our out-looks saw off Calais, were privateers, and their prizes, going into Dunkirk. The morning after this chase we saw but eighteen of the enemy's ships, as far as we could perceive them from the mast-head, in the East North-east of us. Having no prospect of coming up with them, we lay off and on Buccaness all day yesterday, to gather our ships together;

1707-8. "ther; and this day, it blowing hard at North-East with a great sea, judging the enemy could not seize the shore to make any attempt, we bore up for this place; which was thought most reasonable; not only to secure, but to give countenance and spirit to her Majesty's faithful subjects, and discourage those, that could have thoughts of being our enemies (1)."

Sir George Byng having lost sight of the French, and considering, that the Frith was the station of the greatest importance, as well as safety, and was the place where they designed to land, put in there, till he could hear what course the French steered, who were not heard of in England till a fortnight after. Three of their ships landed near the mouth of Spey, only to refresh themselves; for, the ships being so filled with landmen, there was a great want of water. At last all their ships got safe into Dunkirk. The landmen either died at sea, or were so ill, that all the hospitals in Dunkirk were filled with them. It was reckoned, that they lost above four thousand men in this unaccountable expedition; for they were above a month tossed in a very tempestuous sea. If they had landed, it might have had an ill effect on our affairs, chiefly with relation to all paper-credit; and if by this the remittances had been stopped, in so critical a season, that might have had fatal consequences abroad; for, if the nation had been put into such disorder at home, that foreign Princes could no more reckon on its assistance, they might have been disposed to hearken to the propositions, which the King of France would then probably have made to them.

The Lord High Admiral thanked by the Commons.
Pr. H. C.
March 24.

The House of Commons, upon a suggestion, that Sir George Byng might have destroyed the whole Dunkirk Squadron, if his ships had been clean, resolved to present an address to her Majesty, "That she would be pleased to give directions, that an account might be laid before the House of the number of ships, which went in the expedition with Sir George Byng, and when the same were cleaned:" Which account having been laid before the House, and examined, it was resolved, "That the thanks of this House be given to his Royal Highness, the Lord High-Admiral, for his great "care in so expeditiously setting forth so great a number of ships, whereby the fleet, under the conduct of Sir George Byng, was enabled so happily to prevent the intended invasion." Which was accordingly done.

Some days before, the Commons came to an unanimous resolution, "That whoever design-

"edly endeavoured to destroy or lessen the public credit, especially at a time, when the Kingdom was threatened with an invasion, Pr. H. C.
"was guilty of an high crime and misdemean"or, and was an enemy to her Majesty, and the "Kingdom." And indeed, the most dangerous effect of the enemy's intended invasion, was the occasioning great demands upon the Bank of England; which visibly tending to the ruin of its credit, with which that of the Exchequer was closely connected, the Ministry thought proper to apply a speedy remedy to that evil. In order to that, the Lord-Treasurer signified to the Directors of the Bank, that her Majesty would allow, for six months, an interest of six per Cent. upon their bills, which before were only three per Cent. And, at the same time, his Lordship offered them a considerable sum of money; as did also several other Peers, particularly the Dukes of Marlborough, Newcastle, and Somerset. On the other hand, the Mar. 23.
Directors of the Bank having resolved to call in twenty per Cent. upon their capital stock, they were in a condition to answer the demands of the most importunate, among whom were reckoned, first, the disaffected, who improved that conjuncture to distress the Government with impunity; secondly, the timorous usurers, who were unreasonably alarmed at the intended invasion; and lastly, the goldsmiths, who having, in great measure lost the advantageous trade, which they carried on with the money, that private persons lodged in their hands, before the establishment of the Bank of England, had ever since endeavoured to ruin its credit. One of these, Sir Richard Hoare, was so concerned at his being reflected on, as having contributed towards the run upon the Bank, that he was very sollicitous to vindicate himself as to that particular. But it was observed, to the honour of the French, Dutch and Jewish Merchants, that they were

(1) Mr. de Gacé (who commanded the land forces, and was for this unsuccessful service made a Marshal of France by the title of Marshal de Matignon) gave also an account of the invasion to Mr. de Chamillard in a letter dated at Dunkirk in April: "I had the honour to acquaint you with our embarkation at Dunkirk the 17th past; and you shall see by the following journal what has happened since till our return."

The 17th, at four in the afternoon, the Chevalier de Fourbin set sail with the fleet; but, about ten in the evening, the wind proving contrary, we were obliged to cast anchor in the Downs off Newport, where we were detained the 18th and 19th. The Proteus, on board of which were four hundred landmen; the Guerrier and the Barentine, with two hundred men each, were obliged, by the high winds, to put back into Dunkirk. The same day, the 19th, at ten in the evening, the wind having chopped about, we set sail again; and, having pursued our course the 20th, 21st, and 22d with a strong gale, we made the Frith of Edinburgh the 23d in the morning, and in the evening cast anchor at the mouth of it. The 24th in the morning, as we made ready to enter the Frith, we discovered a great number of ships, which we soon found to be the enemy's squadron to the number of No. 56. Vol. IV.

twenty-eight sail, whom we judged to be the same, that had appeared off Dunkirk; whereupon Monsieur de Fourbin resolved to bear off by the favour of a land-breeze, which very luckily carried us from the enemy. They pursued us pretty close all that day, the 24th, and, four of the best sailors being come up with our sternmost ships, the enemy's foremost ship attacked, at four in the afternoon, the August, with whom they exchanged some guns for some time; after which the English bore down upon the Salisbury, which was more a-stern, and endeavoured to put her between themselves, and another English ship, that was coming up to her. The fight between these two ships, and some others on both sides, lasted till night; during which time the Salisbury made a great fire with their small arms.

Our fleet being dispersed, and the enemy near us, Monsieur de Fourbin steered false during the night, which had a good effect; for the next day, the 25th, we found ourselves with twenty sail at a considerable distance from the enemy; whereupon I discoursed with Monsieur de Fourbin, to know of him, Whether, having missed our landing in the Frith of Edinburgh, we might not attempt it in another place? He proposed to me Inverness, which is a very remote part

Thus the intended invasion was totally defeated, without its having the least ill effect on the affairs of Great-Britain, tho' the Court of France had been so secure of success, that their King wrote a circular letter to his Ministers in Rome, Switzerland, Geneva, and other neutral places, directing them to declare in his name, "That he had been long of opinion, that the assisting the King of England to possess the Throne of his ancestors would be for the general good of all Europe." That he believed, that a peace would be the consequence of its success: And that this Prince's subjects would esteem themselves equally happy, in contributing to re-establish him in the place of his predecessors, and in being themselves delivered from those continual impositions, wherewith they were overwhelmed, to maintain a war altogether foreign to them. That, as the Scots had yet more reason than the English to be dissatisfied with the present Government of England, it appeared to him a convenient opportunity to restore to that Nation their lawful Sovereign, and to enable the Prince to deliver it from the oppression it had suffered since the Revolution, which happened under the late King of England, James the Second. That these were the reasons, which had determined him to equip a squadron of his ships at Dunkirk, and to furnish the King of England with a considerable number of his troops, to accompany him to Scotland, to support those his faithful subjects, who should declare for him. That he [the pretended King of England] left Versailles the 7th of March, N. S. to go to Dunkirk, in order to embark, and get, with all expedition, to Scotland. That his intention was not to enter the Kingdom by right of conquest, but to oblige them to receive him as legal possessor of it. That he would behave himself in like manner with respect to all his other Dominions, that should pay the obedience they owed him; and his subjects would only be distinguished according to the zeal and affection they shewed for him, without examining what Religion they professed, in which he left them to their intire liberty." The French King concluded, "That he had no thoughts of enlarging his power, by assisting to re-establish this Prince: That it was sufficient, that he did an act of justice, in vindicating the honour of crowned heads, highly affronted in the person of the late King, his Father; and his wishes would be intirely accomplished, if (by God's blessing on his endeavours) the success became the means of procuring a lasting peace, so necessary to all Europe."

When these Ministers received this circular letter, they had likewise advice sent them, which they published both at Rome, Venice, and in Switzerland, that the French had, before this expedition was undertaken, sent over some ships with arms and ammunition to Scotland: And that there was already an army on foot there, that had proclaimed this pretended Prince, King. It was somewhat extraordinary to see such eminent falsehoods published all Europe over: They also affirmed, that hostages were sent from Scotland to Paris, to secure the observing the engagements, they had entered into; though all this was fiction and contrivance (1).

The

in the North of Scotland; and we went immediately to speak of it to the King of England, who entertained the motion with joy, and told us, We ought to concert together the measures, that were to be taken, and he would pursue our resolutions.

The business was now to get pilots to conduct us thither, and give us the necessary notices. But there being none in our squadron, that was acquainted with that port, Monsieur de Fourbin detached a frigate with the Sieurs Caron and Bouyn, to fetch some from the Cape of Bucares. All that day, the 25th, we steered with a pretty favourable wind towards the North of Scotland; but, about eleven at night, there arose a strong contrary wind, which having continued the next day with violence, Monsieur de Fourbin told me, it was high time to acquaint the King with the inconveniencies of pursuing our course, which were the inevitable dispersion of our fleet; the danger, which the ships, that should be separated, would be in, either of falling into the enemy's hands, or of perishing on the coast, if they were driven thither; and even the want of provisions.

The impossibility the Sieurs Caron and Bouyn found of approaching the shore, by reason of the stormy weather, and consequently of bringing pilots to guide us; the uneasiness and dangers of landing in a port we were strangers to, and where the enemy might come up again with us, together with other hazards and difficulties, having been represented to the King by Monsieur de Fourbin in the presence of the Duke of Perth, my Lord Middleton, Mr. Hamilton, my Lord Galmy, and Messieurs de Beauvernis and d'Andrezel, the King of England, with the unanimous advice of all those Gentlemen, resolved to return to Dunkirk, where we could not arrive before this day, by reason of the calms and contrary winds.

(1) Lockhart, in his Memoirs (p. 342, &c.) has given us a large account of the grounds, on which the success of this undertaking was founded. As soon as the Union took place, two Commissions were appointed for managing the Customs and Excise of Scotland, being partly English, and partly Scotsmen; but, at the same time, vast numbers of Surveyors, Collectors, and other Officers, being sent down from England, and executing the new laws with all rigour, were so grievous to the people, that men of all ranks and persuasions resented the loss of the Sovereignty, and were easily persuaded by the Pretender's friends, "That nothing but the Restoration of the Royal Family by the means of Scotsmen could restore them to their rights." Nor were many of the Nobility and Gentry less desirous to see the Pretender amongst them; and therefore had, for some time past, pressed his coming over, as the luckiest opportunity for restoring him, and advancing the interest of France, by giving a diversion to the English. Upon the repeated instances of the Court of St. Germain's, and the ill success of the French arms in 1706, the French King began to relish the proposal, and seemed in earnest to do something for the Pretender; but, before he proceeded any farther, he sent over Colonel Hookes to get intelligence, and treat with the Scots. It was the opinion of many, that Hookes was pitched upon by the Court of France, as one, who would follow their directions, and asserted, That he shewed more concern to raise a civil war (which was what the French King chiefly wanted) than to promote the Pretender's service and interest. However that was, it is certain, he rather widened than made up the division he found among the Scots Jacobites, which was occasioned, by a misunderstanding between the Dukes of Hamilton and Arbol. Hamilton claimed merit upon account of his past actions.

The Parliament dissolved.

The Session of Parliament was closed the 1st of April, soon after defeating the design of the invasion. The Queen made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Cannot conclude this Session, without acknowledging the wise and speedy provisions, which you have made for the public security.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I am also to thank you in particular, for the large and timely Supplies, which you have provided for the effectual prosecution of the war. I assure you, they shall be carefully and punctually applied to the uses for which they are appointed.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I take these (especially at this juncture) to be such undeniable proofs of your zeal and affection to my service, as must convince every body of your doing me the justice to believe, that all which is dear to you, is perfectly safe under my Government; and must be irrecoverably lost, if ever the designs of a Popish Pretender, bred up in the principles of the most arbitrary Government, should take place.

"I am satisfied, that very false representations of the true inclinations and interests of my people must have been made by some of my subjects, who have given encouragement to this desperate attempt; since, without something of that nature, it seems very little consistent with the usual precaution of our enemies, to hazard the expence of so vain and ill-grounded an undertaking. However, it is certain, we must be all inexcusable, if we do not take warning from this attempt, to comply with what may be necessary for our security at home, and the discouraging the like for the future; to which, by God's blessing, nothing shall be wanting on my part.

"And to the same end I must recommend to you, at your return into your Counties, to use

tions, his interest, and qualifications; and Atbol valued himself on the interest he had got of late with the North-country Gentry, and the great numbers of men he could raise. Many, being disgusted with the Duke of Hamilton for his equivocal behaviour in the last Scots Parliament, inclined to think, that the Duke of Atbol would venture further for the Pretender; which, as it piqued the one, so it elevated the other; and this jarring went so far, that some of the Duke of Atbol's Partizans railed openly at the Duke of Hamilton, and pretended to do all themselves. Others, again, reflecting on the Duke of Atbol's conduct on several occasions, were afraid he was not firm, but acted rather from a desire of revenging himself of the Courtiers, who had slighted him, than a true principle of loyalty to the Pretender; and, considering that he was by no means qualified to be the head of a party, thought he was not to be humoured so far, as to disgust the Duke of Hamilton. For, though the latter's cautious behaviour in concerning measures was not approved, yet the Jacobites being persuaded of his intire affection to their cause, and convinced, at the same time, that he was absolutely necessary to be with the Pretender, by reason of his interest, courage, and conduct, and particularly his dexterity in managing the different parties; upon all these considerations they thought he was to be respected, and advised with; and therefore recommended him to the Earl of Middleton, who, agreeing with them, represented him to the Pretender, as the fittest person to serve him in Scotland. But the Duke of Perth, who intirely differed from the Earl of Middleton, soon closed with the Duke of Atbol; and, having more interest with the Priests and Roman Catholics than the Earl of Middleton, prevailed so far with the Court of France, or at least with Hooker, that Hooker, upon his arrival in Scotland, in the beginning of March 1707, made his chief application to, and concerted measures with his correspondent, the Duke of Atbol. Besides his credentials from the Pretender and French King, empowering him to treat with the people of Scotland, in order to bring about the King's restoration, and to recover the Nation's sovereignty, and ancient privileges; Colonel Hooker produced a paper, containing several queries drawn by the Marquis de Torcy, relating to the number of men, that could be raised in Scotland; the conveniencies for subsisting and quartering troops, and carrying on a war; and the number of forces, sums of money, and quantities of arms and ammunition, necessary to be sent from France. A distinct answer being made to each query, containing a full account of the state of affairs, particularly the inclination of the people to venture all for the Pretender's service, and earnestly intreating him to come over as soon as possible; that paper was signed by the

Duke of Atbol ,	Lord Nairn ,
Lord Drummond ,	Fatheringhane of Pouries ,
Earl of Errol ,	Lyon of Auchterhouse ,
Earl of Strathmore ,	Graham of Finree ,
Vicount of Stermount ,	Drummond of Logie ,
Lord John Drummond ,	Ogilvy of Boyne ,

and others, and it was then delivered to Colonel Hooker, who carried it to France in May 1707. It is to be observed, that he had brought over letters from the Pretender to the Duke of Hamilton, and the Earl Marischal; but, before he transmitted those letters to them, he had so closely attached himself to the Duke of Atbol, and made such advances in the treaty, that the Duke of Hamilton and Earl Marischal highly resented their being thus disregarded, and did not think fit to send their answers by Hooker, but chose another hand to communicate their thoughts to the Earl of Middleton. Hereupon Hooker sent them impertinent threatening letters; and when he arrived in France, flushed with the success of his embassy, he triumphed over the Earl of Middleton, whom, and his friends in Scotland, he accused of backwardness to serve the Pretender. Before he embarked for France, he had assured the Jacobites, that their King would be with them by the month of August following; but, before that time came, notice was sent to Scotland, that the attempt could not be made so soon. There being afterwards little appearance of its being executed, people began to suspect, that, the French King's affairs being somewhat retrieved by the battle of Almanza, he reserved the design in favour of the Pretender to another occasion; which surmise proceeded from a well-grounded jealousy, that the Court of France regarded him no farther, than they thought him subservient to their own interest and private views. Of this opinion was the Duke of Hamilton, who having waited till the end of January 1707-8, without seeing any effect of the French King's promises, and his affairs requiring his presence in England, he set out from Kenriel with his Duchess and family towards Lancaster. The third day he was on his journey, an express from Captain Straton informed him, that he had certain advice, that the Pretender would proceed on his expedition before the middle of March; whereupon the Duke seemed extremely perplexed what to do; but, after some consideration,

"use your utmost care and diligence in putting the laws in execution against Papists, and all others disaffected to my Government, and in making them pay towards the public taxes, to the full of what the law requires from them; nothing being more reasonable, than that they, who, by their principles and practices, encourage (if not actually foment) such disturbances, should doubly contribute to the charge of quieting them, and securing the Kingdom's peace; and should know themselves, on all such occasions, to be responsible for the many inconveniences that may ensue"

Then the Parliament was prorogued to the 13th of April; and, two days after, was dissolved by proclamation, and writs were issued out for the elections of a new Parliament. On the 26th of April, a proclamation was published, commanding all the Peers of North-Britain to assemble at Holy-rood House in Edinburgh, the 17th of June, to nominate and chuse, by open election, the sixteen Peers, who were to sit and vote in the House of Peers in the ensuing Parliament of Great-Britain, pursuant to the twenty-second article of the treaty of Union; and accordingly the Dukes of Hamilton, Montrose, and Roxburgh; the Marquis of Leithian; and the Earls of Orkney, Crawford, Rothes, Leven, Mar, Loudoun, Wemyss, Rossberry, Glasgow, Northesk, Seafield, and Illy; some of whom were justly suspected of disaffection to the present Settlement. But in England, the just fears and visible dangers, to which the attempt of the invasion had exposed the Nation, had so good an effect, that the elections, for the most part, fell on men well affected to the Government, and zealously set against the Pretender.

Four days after the dissolution of the Parliament, Edward Griffin, late Lord Griffin, John Lord Clermont, and Charles Middleton, two sons of the Earl of Middleton, and Colonel Francis the Wauchope, who had been taken on board the Salisbury, were brought up to London; and, having been examined by a Committee of the Privy-Council, were committed prisoners to the Tower for high-treason, by warrant of the Earl of Sunderland, Secretary of State; and, two days after, the following Irish Officers, taken ration, he resolved to proceed on his journey, as a mask to cover his real design; and, in the mean time, directed Mr. Lockhart of Carnwath, who had accompanied him so far, instantly to repair to the Shire of Lanark to raise their friends, and lead them to Dunsfries, where he promised to meet him, and where he was sure to be joined with a great number of horse and foot. Besides the good dispositions and solemn assurances of the Pretender's friends, the Court of France had reason to expect success in Scotland; for the regular troops there did not exceed two thousand five hundred men, most of whom were disaffected, and ready to join the Pretender: The garrisons, being unprovided with warlike stores, must have yielded at the first summons: A good part of the Equivalent money, being in the Castle of Edinburgh, would have helped to carry on the war: And a fleet of Dutch ships had some time before run a-ground on the coast of Angus, in which was a vast quantity of ammunition, besides cannon and small arms, and a great sum of money, which the Jacobites of that country would have secured. So that all things seemed to concur to give success to the attempt upon Scotland. As soon as the French fleet was ready to sail, the Pretender dispatched Mr. Charles Fleming, brother to the Earl of Higon, to acquaint his party how they were to behave, particularly desiring them not to stir till they were sure he was landed; and that then they should secure all the money, horses, arms, and provisions, that were in the hands of such as were not well affected to him, and even their persons, if possible; and Mr. Fleming was to provide pilots to meet him at the mouth of the Frith of Forth, and guide his fleet up the firth, being resolved to land on the South-side thereof, at or about Dunbar.

Mr. Fleming arriving at Slains, the Earl of Errol immediately sent him to Perthshire, where he communicated his instructions to such as he thought proper. The Earl of Errol likewise sent Mr. George, a skipper in Aberdeen, to be ready to go from Fifeness with Mr. Malcolm of Grange, to pilot the Pretender up the Frith; and farther desired him to go over the water to Edinburgh, to advertise Captain Straten and Mr. Lockhart of Carnwath of Mr. Fleming's arrival and instructions. The appearance of the French fleet in the Frith, so it struck no small terror into the well-affected. However, the Magistrates and Corporation of the City of Edinburgh shewed such zeal and readiness to assist the Government, and such care and diligence were used in observing and securing suspected persons, that, by this means, together with the speedy march of some English forces northwards, and Sir George Byng's continuing in Leith-Reach, till certain news came of the Pretender's return to Dunkirk, the peace of Scotland was happily preserved.

Mr. Lockhart, from whom this account is extracted, observes, p. 375, that the reasons alledged by the Marchal de Matignon, in his letter to Monsieur Camillard, for not landing in the North or West of Scotland, were frivolous. "And yet, says he, consider the want of resolution and firmness, that has of late appeared in the French councils; and it is not improbable, that, having missed of the first aim of landing in the Frith, and being afraid of the English fleet's falling upon them, they might be at a stand, and despair of succeeding. But is it not strange they should have undertaken such an expedition, and not reflected upon, and been provided with orders for all accidents, that might happen? And was it so extraordinary a thing, that they could not foresee, that the English fleet, which was then at sea, might have endeavoured to prevent the landing in the Frith; and yet on such an emergency leave all to the Admiral's own disposal? But since, as I mentioned before, the King was so pressing to have landed in the North, I am apt to believe Fourbin had secret orders from his Master, which he did not communicate to the King. And therefore I cannot altogether condemn those, who are of opinion, that the French King did never design the King should land; for being fully persuaded and satisfied, that the Scots were zealously bent to rise in arms, he might think, that, upon his fleet's arrival on the coast, they would have appeared; and having once set the Island by the ears together, and kindled a civil war, he might spare his men and money, and reserve the King in his power, to serve him on another occasion. Else, say they, why did he not send such a number of forces, as was capitulated? For the Treators demanded six or seven thousand, and others ten thousand; which was promised, and yet they were but betwixt four and five thousand, and, those none of the best; neither was the sum of money, nor quantity of arms, and other warlike stores, near so great as was demanded and agreed to. And since he had been at so much charge in equipping this expedition, and made such a noise of it all the world over, Why did they not land in the North or West, where they could meet with no opposition? It is true, indeed, the South-side of the Frith was the place advised, and most proper (though other places, both in the North and West, had been

Several persons were likewise seized in Scotland, and sent up to London (1).

Before Sir George Byng sailed from Leith—Road to the Downs, he was visited by Sir Patrick Johnson, Representative in the late Parliament for the City of Edinburgh, in the name of the Magistracy of that City; and presented with an instrument, whereby he was made a citizen of Edinburgh, inclosed in a gold box, and accompanied with a letter from Sir Samuel Meldrum, Lord Provost of that City, wherein he “desired the Admiral to accept of it, as a mark of their high respect to him, who had been the happy instrument of so seasonable a deliverance to this island, for which his memory would be honoured in future ages.” Not many days after Sir George Byng arrived at Court, and was received, both by the Queen, and her Royal Consort, with those marks of favour, which his late eminent services had deserved. All this while, the Ministers of several foreign Princes and States had audiences of the Queen and Prince, to congratulate the disappointment of the Pretender’s design on North-Britain; but, on the 7th of April, Signior Cornaro, Ambassador from the Republic of Venice, was forbid the Court, upon account of some disrespect shewn by the Custom-House Officers of Venice to the Gondola, and two boatmen of the Earl of Manchester, spoke of too) because the North-Country were secure against any attempts, and well inclined to serve the King, and the landing on the South-side of the Firth gained them Edinburgh, and opened a communication betwixt the North and the South, and the West of Scotland and North of England. But sure the difference betwixt West, South, and North, was not so great, as, if any one failed, the whole design was frustrated. But not to insist further on the French King’s secret designs (which are all mysteries to us) this is certain, that, had the French managed their affairs right, they might have landed even in the Firth; for, had they failed their course directly from Newport-Pitt, they might have reached it a day sooner than they did; but, in place thereof, though they knew the English fleet was in quest of them, and that England and all the world knew of their design, they stood out so far to the North-seas, for fear, as they since alledged, of alarming England, that the first fight they had of Scotland was near thirty miles to the North of Aberdeen; and so, though they had the start by near a day of Sir George Byng, yet he arriv’d in the Firth in a few hours after them; and one of their ships, which proved leaky, and was obliged to return to Dunkirk, and remained there two days after they failed, reached the Firth several hours before them. And if it was true, as I have been informed, that the French King’s orders to Fourbin were, that, provided he could land on any place on the South of the Firth, rather than lose the opportunity, he allowed him to destroy his ships, and join his seamen to the land-forces; Why did they drop their anchors at the mouth of the Firth, and lose half a day and a whole night? For, had he failed on, he might have reached the windings in the head of the Firth, before the English fleet could have come up to the Firth, and lain some time concealed from them, who, he saw, knew not where the French were, but dropped their anchors. But, supposing the English had discovered them, next day they would at least have got so many hours sailing of them, that, before they could have come up, their great ships might have unloaded, and the lesser ones run into creeks and shallow places (which abound there) where the English big ships could not have come at them. Lastly, it was unaccountable in them to come from Dunkirk, where were abundance of Scots seamen, who would have been glad of the occasion, and not bring a pilot, who knew the coast, with them; the loss of which they found, when they arrived there, and were obliged to take in some fishermen for that purpose off of Montrose. I know some have attributed their landing to the Duke of Perth, whose heart, they say, failed him when it came to the push. But, for my part, I cannot conceive how his opinion or instruction could have that weight in the managing a matter of such importance. Again, it has been said, that the Earl Marischal omitted to answer the signal of a ship, which was sent by agreement to the coast near his house, to learn intelligence from him of the state of affairs. It is true indeed, his Lordship failed on his part; but can it be thought, that the vigorous execution of the project could stop on so slight a disappointment? Besides, Mr. Makom of Grange did actually go aboard that ship, which, I told you, came after the French out of Dunkirk, and arrived in the Firth before the fleet, and informed them of all that was needful. But to leave these speculations with this animadversion, that the French might have landed, if they had pleased, or managed their affairs right; and that time must discover the true reason of their not landing, of which, by the bye, none of the Court of St. Germain, though often wrote to on this subject, will give any return, which makes it the more mysterious.

(1) Towards the end of April 1708, the chief State-prisoners in the castle of Edinburgh, viz. the Marquis of Huntley, the Earls of Errol, Seaforth, and Nithsdale; the Lords Viscounts Stormount and Kilsyth, the Lord Drummond, the Lord Nairn, and James Murray (the two last named brothers to the Duke of Athol) Sir George Maxwell, and others, set out from thence, in order to be brought up to London, guarded by a party of dragoons. As for the Duke of Hamilton, who, on the 10th of April, arrived at Westminster with his Duchess, attended only by one of her Majesty’s Messengers, his Grace made such large professions of his loyalty and affection to her Majesty’s Person and Government, that he was soon after discharged; as was also the Earl of Aberdeen, the Lord Balmerino, the Bishop of Edinburgh, Sir Walter Bruce, Lieutenant-Colonel Balfour, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, Dugal Stewart, brother to the Lord Bute, and some others. On the 7th of June, the Lord Drummond, Sir George Maxwell, and Robert Murray of Palmy were committed prisoners to the Tower of London; and the Laids of Cardeen and Keir to Newgate, by warrants from the Lords of her Majesty’s Privy-Council. The next day the following prisoners were brought up to London from Edinburgh, the Duke of Gordon, Viscount Kennmare, Fotheringham of Powrie, Lyon of Auchterhousey, Lord James Murray, Robinson of Strewan, Seaton of Tauch, Stuart of Starathis, Macdonald of Keppock, Edmiston of Newton, Laird of Keppendarvie, Gordon of Gallachy, and Stuart of Boyce; as were, on the 14th of that month, the Earl Marischal, the Earl of Murray, the Earl of Traquair, the Lord Belhaven, the Lord Sinclair, Sir John Maclean, the Laird of Lochiel, the Laird of Appin, Major-General Buchan, and Mr. Cambel of Glenderowick. These prisoners having severally been examined by the Lords of the Privy-Council, such, against whom there was no particular information, were admitted to bail; which favour extended to most of them, but the Lord Belhaven did not long enjoy it, for, on the 21st of June he died of an inflammation or mortification in his brain, and in him expired the warmest Opposer of the Union of the two Kingdoms.

During the Session of Parliament, on the 18th of February, died a very eminent Member of it, Sir Edward Seymour, at his seat at Maiden-Bradley in Wiltshire. Nobility of descent, eminency of parts, great popularity, and a leading influence in the House of Commons, were the distinguishing circumstances of his life. Whether they were attended with real virtue and merit, cannot be deemed an improper inquiry; since without these, outward appearances are insignificant and offensive. In the Reign of King Charles II, he laboured with uncommon diligence to promote the measures of the Court, for the destruction of civil and religious liberty; and was neither afraid nor ashamed of any sort of management. His contemptuous and brutal behaviour towards the House of Commons, while he was in the Chair, was astonishing and scarce credible. He acted there as the Marshal of the Court, and agreeably to his instructions from thence, allowed the House a long or short day for business. He seemed to affect to be remembered by a series of words and actions, full of indignity and insolence; nor did he escape the public reproaches of many Members for the licentiousness of his morals, which they declared to be a disgrace to the station, which he bore in their House. In order to bring him under proper discipline and correction, the next House of Commons chose him their Speaker; but his Royal Master, to preserve him from disgrace and vexation, refused his approbation in an unusual manner. His concurrence in the Revolution, and directing the Association, are to be ascribed to a resentment of what he esteemed ill usage under King James. To the establishment, ease, and success of King William's Government, no one ever gave stronger proofs of an utter aversion. When that King had full evidence of his treasonable practices, such was his Majesty's generous regard to his first appearances, that he gave him his choice of taking a place or his trial. Though he had often professed a contempt for the Master and the Service, prudence and guilt disposed him to a place. His conduct in this situation was a very ungrateful return for the favour, which he had received.

his Memoirs, p. 382, says upon this subject. 'The castles of Stirling and Edinburgh, says he, and all the prisons in Edinburgh, were crammed full of Nobility and Gentry. At first, no doubt, the Government expected to have had proof enough to have brought several of them to punishment; but, failing, blessed be God, in that, the next use they made of them was to advance their politics; for no sooner did any person, who was not of their party, pretend to stand a Candidate to be chosen a Parliament-man at the elections, which were to be next summer, but he was clapped up in prison, or threatened with it, if he did not desist; and by these means they carried, generally speaking, whom they pleased. But to return to the prisoners, after they had been in custody for some weeks, orders came from London to send them up thither, which was accordingly done, being divided in three classes, and sent up three several times, led in triumph under a strong guard, and exposed to the raillery and impertinence of the English mob. And now it appeared to what a fine market Scotland had brought her hogs, her Nobility and Gentry being led in chains from one end of the island to the other, merely on account of suspicion, and without any accusation or proof against them. Whilst this was a doing, the Duke of Hamilton, being likewise brought up prisoner to London, and taking the advantage of the discords between the Treasurer and the Whigs, struck up with the latter, and prevailed with them to obtain, not only his, but all the other prisoners liberation (excepting the Stirlingshire Gentlemen, who were sent home again to undergo their trial, upon their finding bail to appear against a certain day (which was likewise soon remitted) and engaged to join with them (the Whigs) and their friends in Scotland, viz. the Squadrons, in the election of the Peers for the Parliament of Great-Britain, which having accordingly done, several of the Court-party were thrown out. This certainly was one of the nicest steps the Duke of Hamilton ever made; and, had he not hit upon this favourable juncture, and managed it with great address, I am afraid some heads had paid for it; at best, they had undergone a long confinement; so that to his Grace alone the thanks for that deliverance was owing.'

(1) That Earl gives the following account of this affair, in a letter to the Earl of Sunderland from Venice, March 30, 1708, printed in Mr. Cole's memoirs of affairs of state, p. 519, which letter begins thus: 'I write under all the concern imaginable, being sensible, that the affront they have done me here is of the highest nature, as you will see by my memorial; and, unless it is repaired in the most public manner, it will reflect extremely on the honour of the Queen and the whole Nation. This has been occasioned by the roguery and villany of one B—— a Merchant, son to Mr. B—— in the City, who inveigled and persuaded two of my boatmen to go on board a ship, and load from it some cloth, which is prohibited here. It is well known, that the boat of an Ambassador is so sacred, that it is not to be visited or stopped on any account whatsoever, though there was a prisoner of State in it. This made B—— conclude, that his cloth was secure, though my honour and reputation must have suffered; for it could not but be known here, though this had not happened.' The circumstances of the affront are thus related in the Earl of Manchester's Memorial, presented on the 29th of March 1708: 'On Monday last my Gondola, with two of my boatmen, dressed in my ordinary and well-known livery, was attacked in coming from Malamocco by the Officers of this most serene Republic, armed with fire-arms and steel-weapons. These Officers entered the boat by main force; and, after having done what they thought fit, they suffered the Gondola to row away.'

(2) The Earl of Manchester, in a letter to the Earl of Sunderland from Venice, July 6, 1708, printed in Cole's Memoirs, p. 540, observes, 'that the Senate of Venice had consented to restore the cloth in the manner the Earl had desired; to condemn the men into the galleys; and, in lieu of the pillory, to bring them at the hour of justice from the prison through the place of St. Mark into the galley, and the chief of them to have a paper prefixed to him, denoting their crime and punishment, &c.' The conclusion of this affair will appear from the following passage of the Earl of Manchester's letter to the Earl of Sunderland from Venice, September 7, 1708: 'I can now acquaint your Lordship, that yesterday the men were brought through the place of St. Mark to the galley. The chief of them had a paper on his breast and back with the inscription, as it was agreed on. There were great numbers of people. This day they delivered the cloth to my boat, in the place, where they took it. I sent it immediately to the four hospitals, so all is passed to our intire satisfaction, and much to the honour of the Queen; and I have the good fortune to have the approbation of all people here in this affair. As soon as the men have made their submission, I intend to go to the College to get them released. One of the men being lame of the gout, he was carried in a chair, which made it more remarkable. They were eleven in all.'

Thus the coin was reduced to a ruinous state, which proved the occasion of infinite mischief to affairs both at home and abroad. Whilst he de-claimed against and profecuted real or imaginary corruptions in others, he was a constant and most able practitioner this way. Rival Companies and rival Projectors successfully employed the sure method of procuring his protection. Foreign powers were very sensible of the certain way of assuring to themselves so significant and daring an advocate. Much of this kind was suspected, and many things well known; yet with an amazing sufficiency he continued to support his authority and influence. The regards of his party were secured by his unwearied sincere hatred of King William. In this Reign, he, who in a former had betrayed and trampled on the privileges of a House of Commons, commenced the patron and enlarger of its rights.

His highest pretensions to public spirit and public virtue were owing to opposite motives. His zeal in the impeachment of the Earl of Clarendon, was not the effect of offences suggested in the articles, but flowed from a desire of recommending himself to a corrupt Court. Malevolence had been long working there, on the account of that Earl's having joined with the Earl of Southampton, in preventing profuse and destructive settlements of Parliament. The prosecution of Lord Sommes arose from that Lord's ability and fidelity in the service of his Prince and the Public; for neither Sir Edward's obligation nor inclination would have urged him to pursue a real enemy of France. After he had been the terror of his enemies; and lived amongst his friends with a haughty superiority, a mean wretch hurried him out of the world, its most imperious disturber. When infirmities had confined him to his chair, his house was deserted for the servants on the account of some new diversions; and, in the mean time an old female beggar of the maddish tribe happened to wander into the apartments. Finding the great man thus alone, she reproached him for all his cruelty and oppressions, threatened, terrified, and handled him in a manner, the effects of which soon put an end to a life, through the whole course of which he seemed equally insensible of crimes and 1708. punishments.

The removal of Mr. Secretary Harley having occasioned some other Vacancies, Robert Walpole, a Gentleman of quick parts and masterly eloquence, was, in Mr. St. John's room, made Secretary of War; and the place of Secretary to the Marines, which had been likewise held by Mr. St. John, was given to Mr. Josiah Burchet. Some time after, the Queen delivered to the Earl of Cholmondeley the Staff of Comptroller of her Household; and, about the middle of April, her Majesty made a promotion of general Officers, by which the Earl Rivers was advanced to the post of General of the horse (1).

Some time before, Orders and Commissions were delivered for new raising the regiments of Montjoy, Gorges, Alnut, Mordaunt, Wade, Macartney, and Lord Mark Kerr, which suffered most at the battle of Almanza; and their Officers, who were prisoners in France, were supplied by others. About the same time, the Earl of Wemyss and Sir John Leake were added to the Lord High Admiral's Council. On the 22d of April, her Majesty nominated Dr. William Fleetwood to the Bishoprick of St. Asaph, vacant by the death of Dr. Beveridge, and Sir William Giffard was appointed Governor of Greenwich Hospital; and Hugh Boscowen Warden of the Stannaries.

The Scotch Privy-Council being dissolved by the first Privy-Council of Great-Britain. The late act, entitled, An act for re-considering the Union of the two Kingdoms more intire and compleat, the Queen, on the 10th of May, appointed the first privy Council of Great-Britain (2).

On the 15th of May, the Lord Griffin, one of the prisoners taken on board the Salisbury, being attainted by outlawry for high-treason, committed in the Reign of King William, was brought to the bar of the Queen's-Bench, and, after reading of the outlawry, being asked, What he had to say, why execution should not be awarded against him? He said, in his defence, "That he was neither in arms, nor in Council with the enemy; but was forced by the French Court upon the expedition intirely against his judgment and inclination, notwithstanding he had expressed his dislike of it, as a rash and foolish attempt;" adding, That he threw himself at the Queen's feet for mercy, and "hoped 1708. "hoped the favour of the Court." His defence being judged intirely foreign to the outlawry, upon which he was brought to the bar, the Court made a rule for his execution, as is usual in such cases: But though the Queen was prevailed with to sign the warrant for sentence to pass upon him, a reprieve, however, for a fortnight, was sent the night before to the Tower; and that, expiring the last day of June, was then renewed, and afterwards continued from month to month, till he died a natural death in the Tower, about two years after.

He is reprieved till he dies in the Tower.

On the 20th of May, Meinbard, Duke of Schomberg, and John Smith, late Speaker of the House of Commons, who, about this time, was constituted Under-Treasurer, and Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of Mr. Secretary Boyle, were sworn of the Privy-Council, as was the Duke of Somerset the week after; and, towards the latter end of the same month, the Duke of Queensberry was made a Peer of Great-Britain by the title of Baron of Rippon, and Marquis of Beverley in the County of York, and Duke of Dover in the County of Kent.

Proclamation for the distribution of prizes.

An Act had passed the last Session for the better security to our trade by Cruizers and Convoys, and for the encouraging Privateers, particularly in the West-Indies and South-Sea. They were to have all they could take, intirely to themselves; the same encouragement was also given to the Captains of the Queen's ships, with this difference, that the Captains of the Privateers were to divide their captures, according to agreements made among themselves, but the distribution of prizes taken by men of war was left to the Queen. A proclamation was therefore published at this time in May, ordering the prizes to be divided into eight shares. The Captain was to have three eighths, unless he had a superior Officer, in which case the Admiral or Commodore was to have one of the three. The Commission-Officers and Master were to have one eighth, the Warrant-Officers one, and the Petty-Officers another, and the Sailors the other two.

The Duke of Marlborough goes to Holland.

The storm, which threatened Great-Britain, being dispelled, and the necessary measures for the security of the Government taken, the Duke of Marlborough set out from London the 29th of March, and, having reached Margate that evening, embarked there, and the next day, at two in the afternoon, came in sight of the coast of Holland, and arrived late the same night at the Hague, where Prince Eugene of Savoy was come, two days before, to meet him.

The-Princes of France sent to the armies in Flanders.

The advantages gained by the French, the last year, prompted them to entertain several projects, and to make still greater efforts to recover their former superiority. And indeed their forces this year seemed to be more numerous than ever, especially in the Netherlands, where it was believed the Elector of Bavaria and the Duke de Vendôme would have again commanded. But an unexpected alteration was suddenly made, and the French King declared the Duke of Burgundy Generalissimo of his forces, appointing the Duke de Vendôme to serve under him; and he was to be accompanied by the Duke of Berry. The Pretender (who was returned from his unsuccessful expedition to Scotland) went with them, without any other character than that of the Chevalier de St. George. The Elector of Bavaria was to command on the Rhine, with the Duke of Berwick under him, the Marshal de Villeroi being recalled, and appointed to command in Dauphiné. These Proceedings of the French King surprized every one; but he conceived great hopes from these alterations of his Generals. The credit with relation to money was still very low in France. For, after many methods taken for raising the credit of the Mint-bills, they were still at a discount of forty per cent. No fleets came this year from the West-Indies, and therefore they could not be supplied from thence.

On the 12th of April, N. S. in the evening, there was a great Conference between Prince Eugene, the Duke of Marlborough, the Deputies of the States for private affairs, and Pensionary Heinsius, in the Chamber of Triers, the usual Place of Conferences in the States apartment; which was pitched upon to avoid the trouble of the ceremonial; for otherwise it must have been at the Duke of Marlborough's, as Ambassador Extraordinary; whereas Prince Eugene had no character, his credentials importing only, "that his Imperial Majesty had sent him" first Counsellor, President of the Council of War, and General-Lieutenant, Prince Eugene, "to concert the operations of the campaign, in whom the States were desired to put an intire confidence." As soon as they were entered the room, the Duke of Marlborough took Prince Eugene by the hand, and led him to a seat above his own; after which the States Deputies placed themselves, without observing any precedence among them. Prince Eugene opened the Conference with a speech, wherein he gave a particular account of the Emperor's forces in Naples, Lombardy, and Piedmont, and of those designed for Spain and having mentioned the troops which his Imperial Majesty intended to employ in Germany, he gave, in very modest terms, his own opinion of the operations of the next campaign, both on the Upper Rhine and the Low-Countries; concluding, that he had instructions from his Imperial Majesty to use his endeavours to engage the Queen of Great Britain and the States-General to approve the Scheme he had proposed, and to second, on their parts, his Imperial Majesty's efforts, both to reduce the exorbitant power of France, and to restore his Brother King Charles III. to the whole Monarchy of Spain.

After Prince Eugene had ended his speech, the Duke of Marlborough acquainted the Assembly with the instructions he had received from the Queen his Mistress, in relation to the business before them; and at last mention was made of a separate army to be commanded by Prince Eugene. This Conference, which lasted above an hour, was but a kind of preliminary; for the Deputies of the States were not empowered to make any answer, either to Prince Eugene's, or the Duke of Marlborough's proposals, but only (according to the usual methods observed by that Republic) to receive them, and to report the same to their High Mightinesses; which they did on the 16th.

Several other Conferences were held, though more privately, between the Duke of Marlborough, Prince Eugene, and the Deputies of the States; the result of which was (as it afterwards appeared) "That most of the Imperialists employed the year before on the Upper Rhine, with the 1708. the Saxons and Hessians in the pay of Great-Britain and Holland, and the troops, which the Elector Palatine was to furnish, in consideration of his Imperial Majesty's restoring him to the possession of the Upper Palatinate, with the prerogatives enjoyed by his Ancestors, should march into the Netherlands, to act there, under Prince Eugene, in concert with the British and Dutch forces, commanded in chief by the Duke of Marlborough, and under him, by Veldt-Marshal Auverquerque.* Whether Prince Eugene, who took Hanover in his way to the Hague, then communicated this scheme to the Elector of that name, and found him averse to it, or proposed other measures to his Electoral Highness, is not known; but it was thought fit, that Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough should now both wait on that Prince, in order to obtain his concurrence to the resolutions taken at the Hague, and engage him to return to command the army on the Upper Rhine.

The Duke of Marlborough intended to have gone back to England, before the opening of the campaign; but Prince Eugene was very earnest with him to meet him at Hanover; and the States having represented to the Queen of Great-Britain the necessity of his presence on that side, and how uncertain the winds might make his timely return, the season being so far advanced, he resolved upon the journey to the Court of Hanover. Prince Eugene, having finished his negotiations at the Hague, set out the 20th of April N. S. arrived the 22d at Dusseldorp, and, having ended his business, the next day, with the Elector Palatine, and sent an express to Vienna, pursued his journey towards Hanover. The Duke of Marlborough met him the 26th two German miles from that place, and, arriving there the same evening together, they alighted at the British Envoy's. The Duke went first to Court, and was followed thither soon after by Prince Eugene, where the several audiences of ceremony, which they had of the Electoral family, being over, they had together a long Conference with the Elector, who gave orders for their being accommodated at his own palace. Their Conferences were continued the three following days, the Count de Rechteren assisting on the part of the States-General. They met with some difficulties at first, which were removed by the dextrous and prudent management of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough; and his Electoral Highness, though he was sensible, that, by this scheme for making vigorous efforts in Flanders, the army, which he was to command himself on the Upper Rhine, must be extremely weakened, and he should be obliged to stand on the defensive; yet, at length, he consented to part with several regiments, and, being 1708. satisfied with the laurels he had already gained, cheerfully sacrificed to the common cause the glory he might have reaped by acting offensively. But though it was agreed, that Prince Eugene should come into the Netherlands, yet it was industriously given out, that he was to act with a separate body on the Moselle, which obliged the enemy to send a considerable number of forces that way under the command of the Duke of Berwick.

On the 29th of April, N. S. Prince Eugene set out for Leipzig, to confer with King Augustus, who was come thither on Purpose, two days before, from Dresden. On the Prince's arrival he finished his negotiations in a few hours, and pursued his journey the next day to Vienna. The Duke of Marlborough made no long stay after Prince Eugene at Hanover; for he set out from thence the day after, and arrived the 3d of May at the Hague, where he communicated to the States General the result of the Conferences held at Hanover; and, having concerted with their High Mightinesses further measures for opening the campaign, he went to Ghent, where having reviewed the British forces, he proceeded to Brussels (1). The Duke having conferred with Veldt-Marshal d'Auverquerque, who, notwithstanding his infirm state of health, preserved a vigorous mind, and seemed resolved to die, like a hero, in the field, gave orders to the troops to march to Andernach near Brussels, where the Dutch, Prussians, and Hanoverians, began to form the army the 23d of May, N. S. The 26th they marched to Billingen, where the Duke of Marlborough took up his quarters in the Abbey of that name; and the Veldt-Marshal fixed his at Hall, a little town, which lay in the front of the first line. The British forces repaired to this camp likewise with all possible expedition, as did also a considerable body of troops in the service of the States-General from their respective garrisons in Flanders. And, last of all, the Field-Deputies of their High Mightinesses arrived there, who behaved themselves this campaign with so much prudence and resolution, that they contributed very much to the success of it.

Upon notice of these motions, the Duke de Vendosme assembled his army, on the 25th of May, between Mons and St. Ghislain, and took up his head-quarters at St. Simpronien, from whence he marched the next day to Soignies, posting his right at Naiss, and his left at Canchie Notre Dame, within three leagues of the Confederate camp. He was joined the same day by the Duke of Burgundy, who had the chief (at least titular) command of the army, together with the Duke of Berry, his brother, and the Pretender.

On

(1) Here the Duke was honoured with a letter from the Queen, dated May 6, by the manner of which, as the Duchess of Marlborough observes in the Account of her Conduct, p. 255, her Majesty seemed still to have retained a great degree of regard for Mr. Harley. After complaining to the Duke of being so tired that day with importunities from the Whigs, that she had not spirits left to open her afflicted heart so freely and fully as she intended, she goes on to say, that she was entirely of his opinion, thinking it neither for her honour nor interest to make steps (meaning the first steps) towards a peace, as the Duke had been pressed to do N^o 57. Vol. IV.

abroad; and assures him, that, whatever insinuations her enemies might make to the contrary, she would never give her consent to a peace, but upon safe and honourable terms. She begs the Duke to be so just to her, as not to let the misrepresentations made of her have any weight with him; adding, that it would be a greater trouble to her than could be expressed; and concludes with these words; 'I cannot end without begging you to be very careful of yourself, there being nobody, I am sure, that prays more heartily than her, who will live and die most sincerely yours, &c.'

On the 29th of May, the Confederate army, which consisted of a hundred and eighty squadrons of horse, and a hundred and twelve battalions, made a motion from Bellinghen, advancing the right to Herfelingen, the left to Lembey, and fixing the head-quarters at St. Renelle, in hopes of bringing the enemy to an engagement, which, by their bold march to Soignes, they seemed rather to seek than decline, being superior, at least, in number, to the Allies; for their army consisted of a hundred and ninety-seven squadrons, and a hundred and twenty-four battalions. The same day the enemy received their heavy baggage from Mons, but sent it back thither on the 31st, which still gave the Confederates hopes they should come to an engagement; and thereupon, the Duke of Marlborough ordered the troops to be in a readiness to march at an hour's warning. The same evening the Duke received intelligence, that the enemy's heavy baggage, having received a counter-order, was returned to the camp, and that they had foraged for two days; whence it was reasonably concluded, that they would not march the next day, as the deserters had reported. The Duke of Marlborough, having advised with the other Generals, resolved to send the horse to forage the next morning; and they went out, before break of day; but they had not been out an hour, before advice came, that the enemy had begun the night before, at ten, to send their heavy baggage to Mons, and decamped without any noise at eleven, marching towards Nivelle. The foragers were immediately recalled, and, to avoid all loss of time, the infantry marched first of all about noon from St. Renelle, and were followed by the cavalry. About four they formed four columns, intending to incamp the right towards Anderlecht, and the left to Lake; but upon farther notice, that the enemy had not incamped at Nivelle, but had continued their march by Bois Signieur Isaac to Braine la Leu, the Duke judged, that they could not have any other design, than to post themselves on the bank of the Deule, to hinder the Allies from passing that river, and to seize Louvain; being the very same project, which the Duke de Vendosme had formed the last year, but miscarried in it. To prevent the enemy, there was no other remedy, but to continue marching all night; so that, on the 3d of June in the afternoon, the army of the Allies arrived at the camp of Terbank, very much fatigued, as well by this long march as by the continual rains, which had fallen for four and twenty hours together. The French, having received intelligence of this expeditious march of the Confederates, did not venture to advance farther than Genap, but incamp'd their right to that place, and their left to Braine la Leu. Upon which the Duke of Marlborough took up his quarters in the Abbey of Terbank, and Monsieur d'Averquerque his in the Suburbs of Louvain. On the 4th, several bridges were laid on the Deule, between Havre and Louvain; and, on the 5th, almost the whole Confederate army foraged in the neighbourhood of their camp. The 6th being appointed by the Duke as a day of thanksgiving for the past successes of the arms of the Allies, and to implore a blessing upon the present campaign, it was religiously observed throughout the whole army.

The enemy continuing quiet in their camp, the Duke of Marlborough took that opportunity of reviewing his troops, which he began to do the seventh, and continued for eight or nine days following, when he had the satisfaction to find, that the respective bodies were all very compleat, the men in the most excellent order, animated with their former victories; and eager to engage an enemy, that was despicable in their eyes. In this camp it was, that the Electoral Prince of Hanover (his present Majesty King George II.) came to the army, and was received with the greatest marks of respect and distinction by all the general Officers.

It was now plain, that the enemy had no inclination to engage the Confederates. They had indeed in view the recovery of the places they had lost in the year 1706; but it was by their usual method of surprize and treachery. Nor were their hopes altogether vain, for the Elector of Bavaria, who had gained some interest in the Provinces of the Netherlands, among people of all ranks, by his profuse and popular behaviour, with the assistance of Count de Bergeyck, a person of great credit, and no less activity, and other friends of the House of Bourbon, easily found means to practise upon the levity and restless spirits of the chief inhabitants of the Cities of Ghent (1), Bruges (2), and Antwerp, who promised to open their gates to the troops of France and Spain, as soon as they could find a fair opportunity (3). The truth was, the

(1) Ghent is a vast large City and Castle, one of the principal of the Low-Countries, the Marquisate of the Earldom of Flanders, and territory of Ghent, a Bishoprick under the Archbishop of Mechlin. It was surprized by, or rather betrayed to the French the beginning of this campaign; but besieged and recovered by the Duke of Marlborough towards the end of the year. It stands on the river Scheld and Lys (which divide it into twenty-six islands) twenty-seven miles almost South-west of Antwerp, thirty North-west of Brussels, ninety-four almost South of Amsterdam, and an hundred and fifty-four North-East of Paris.

(2) Bruges is a fair, strong, and noble City of the Low-Countries, in the Earldom of Flanders, the head of the territory of Bruges, a Bishoprick under the Archbishop of Mechlin. This town made its submission to the Duke of Marlborough after the famous battle of Ramilles; the French surprized it, or rather had it betrayed to them the beginning of this campaign, but abandoned it upon the approach of the Confederates, towards the end of December, the same year. It stands twenty-four miles North-west of Ghent, eleven East of Ostend, thirty-four North-east of Dunkirk, and forty West of Antwerp.

(3) Dr. Hare, in his Thanksgiving-sermon before the House of Commons, on Thursday February 17, 1708-9, tells us, p. 11. 'That there was a Conspiracy to have all the Netherlands betrayed to the enemy by the interest of that unhappy Prince, who has suffered so much in their cause. When we saw the sons of France come into the field, we could not but suspect there was something more than ordinary in agitation. It was not enough to think they came to learn the art of war in an army, that aims at nothing but inaction, or to give courage to their troops, which their greatest General had not been able to do, though fetched from Italy on purpose, at a time when he least could have been spared; for the event has shewn, he brought no more courage with him than he left behind him; nor could it be expected, that their bare presence should make 1708. Dutch were severe Masters, and the Flandrians could not bear it. Though the French had laid heavier taxes on them, yet they used them better in all other respects. Their bigotry, being wrought on by their Priests, disposed them to change their Masters. The Duke of Marlborough resolved not to weaken his army by many garrisons; and therefore put none at all into Bruges, and a very weak one in the citadel of Ghent, reckoning, that there was no danger, as long as he lay between those places and the French army. The two armies had lain about a month looking on one another, shifting their camps a little, but keeping still in safe ground; the Confederates, for their parts, being in expectation of Prince Eugene's taking the field, with an army composed of Prussian and Hessian troops, ten thousand Palatines and some Imperialists. The motion of this body was retarded by several difficulties about the march of the Palatine forces; of which the French getting intelligence, they concluded, that the Confederates would hardly venture to force them in the passes and defiles they were possessed of, and therefore commanded a detachment to march towards Ghent and Bruges, to surprize those towns; which was effected in this manner:

Bruges and Ghent taken by the French.

On the 5th of July, N. S. a party of the enemy's troops, commanded by the Brigadiers la Faille and Paisteur, advanced before break of day towards Ghent, and, at the opening of the gates between five and six in the morning, half a dozen foot-soldiers, with two or three troopers, who were sent before, pretending to be deserters, were admitted into the town by the watch of Burgbers, who were no more in number than themselves. When they were going to be carried to the main-guard, some of them pretended a weariness, and setting themselves down on the ground, desired some brandy, to delay time; which being brought, they drank with the Burgbers, and, amused them with a story of the march of the French army, and their own desertion. Soon after another small party of pretended deserters came, and entertained the watch with the like frivolous stories, till Brigadier la Faille, who not long before had been High-Bailiff of that City, and had still a considerable interest there, coming in person, commanded the Burgbers, who guarded the gates, to lay down their arms, and admit the French troops. They began at first to make a shew of resistance; but the pretended deserters, rising up at once, presented their bayonets, and stopped them. Resistance would now have been to little purpose; so the Brigadier's commands being immediately obeyed, he left some of his men there, and with the rest marched directly into the town. It being early, they only met with a few labourers in the streets, some of whom took them for deserters, and others they quieted with gold. In this manner they advanced to the gate of Bruges, which they seized with little or no resistance, as they did likewise the bridge of Meusefede. In the mean time, Monsieur Grimaldi, who followed Monsieur de la Faille at a distance, entered the town likewise, and marched with the rest of the detachment to the market-place. All the gates being soon after seized, about ten, Monsieur de la Faille marched to the Town-house, and, having assembled the Magistrates and chief Burgbers, he caused a pardon to be read to them, signed by the Elector of Bavaria, and underneath by the Count de Bergeyck; upon which they readily submitted.

The enemy, being thus become masters of the town, summoned the Governor of the castle to surrender; but Monsieur de Labene, Major of Sir Richard Temple's regiment of foot, who commanded in that fortress with about three hundred men, expecting either to be reinforced by Major-General Murray, or relieved by the approach of the Confederate army, answered, "That he would defend it to the last extremity." The French began to prepare for attacking the castle; and Major-General Murray, who was posted at Marienkirch with two English regiments of foot, and one of Spanish dragoons, in vain attempted to throw a reinforcement into the place. Major Labene, having been summoned a second time, and being wholly unprovided for defence against so powerful an army, obtained an honourable capitulation.

Some hours after the enemy had surprized Ghent, Count de la Motte appeared with a strong detachment before Bruges, which surrendered the next day, without making the least resistance, or putting the enemy to the trouble of firing more than three pieces of cannon. There was indeed a sort of capitulation agreed upon, in which the Sieur Briel, Receiver of the contributions, and Mr. Volmar, his Comptroller, were included; but it appeared by every circumstance, that this was a thing of form only, and that the articles had been long before settled by other persons than they that pretended to grant and accept them.

This done, Count de la Motte marched immediately to Damme, hoping to meet with the same success there; but as this place was fortified and garrisoned, the Governor opened the sluices, and put the whole country under water, which obliged the Count to retire. From thence he marched to Plassendabl, a little fort on the canal, which leads from Bruges to Ostend, and is a security to the communication of those two places.

make a starved and naked army act with as much vigour, as if they had been warmly clothed and well paid. No, we were sure it must be something else they came for, not to gain any honour in the field, but to reap the mean glory of some successful treachery, and so it proved. A design, we found, had been formed some time to surprize Antwerp; all was agreed, and every thing within a day or two ripe for execution, when the Princes joined the army; but the plot, which was more than they knew, was then actually discovered; and this was a design of such importance, we were inclined to think it was the whole they aimed at. But the sequel shewed the treachery was deeper laid; and, while we were waiting the forces from the Rhine, another part of it succeeded better. Had both taken effect, what condition had our affairs been in? We had then, it is likely, without a blow lost all the fruits of the Ramilles campaign; and the consequence of that had been, not only putting the war two or three years back; it is more than probable the confederation it would every where have raised, would have soon frightened the Allies into an ill peace; or the success of the Italian league, which then could not have miscarried, might in another year have forced them to it.

1708. places. The Officer, who commanded in it, refused to surrender; upon which the Count attacked and took it in two days.

Major-General Murray, having found it impossible to reinforce the castle of Ghent, retired to Sas van Ghent, where he found the Deputies of the States-General for the affairs of Flanders, and concerted with them the necessary measures for putting the frontiers in a posture of defence, and securing those posts, which were most exposed.

The Confederate army marched from Terbank.

The Duke of Mariborough, who was yet in camp at Terbank, received advice, that a considerable detachment was marched towards Tubize, and, in the night, that their whole army had followed at nine in the evening. The Duke gave immediate orders for the Confederate army to be in readiness to march. Accordingly, about three in the morning, the 5th of July, they marched from the camp at Terbank, passed the canal in four columns, and incamped with the left at Anderlecht, and the right at the mill of Tomberg. Here the Duke got intelligence of the enemy's design on Ghent, and that the detachment they had made for that end was advanced as far as Alst, and had broken down the bridge over the Dender: He thereupon ordered Major-General Butmar, with four regiments of horse and dragoons, to pass over at Dendermond, in order to observe the enemy, and to prevent their design upon Ghent; but he came too late.

The French pass the Dender and break a great

The same day the French passed the Senne at Hall and Tubize, and were passing at the mill of Goicke till night, within a league of the right wing of the Allies; which coming very late into the camp, and the army having made a very long march through difficult ways, it was not thought practicable to attack the enemy that night. However, the greatest part of the horse and foot having been brought to the right during the night, in order to engage the enemy, the whole army was formed the next morning early in order of battle; but their design was frustrated by the French, who were employed the whole night, with all possible expedition, in passing the Dender through the town of Ninove, and over several bridges built near that place for the same purpose; so that the detachment, sent to attack their rear-guard, came too late to find any thing but their small baggage, which was attended by a strong guard. These Major-General Schulenberg and Sir Richard Temple, with ten squadrons and five battalions, supported by Major-General de Veyne, with ten squadrons more, soon defeated, put them to flight, and took a great deal of baggage.

Prince Eugene comes to the army.

The Confederate army incamped the same night at Albe, where Prince Eugene of Savoy, having made a quick march from the Moselle, and left his cavalry at Maesricht, resolving to be present as soon as possible, at whatever action might happen, though his troops should not come up in time, arrived that evening with Major-General Cadogan, whom the Duke of Mariborough had sent to attend him. The arrival of Prince Eugene, and the approach of his troops, not only revived the spirits of the soldiers, but was very acceptable to the Generals themselves, after the ungrateful news they had received that very day of the French having surprized Ghent. The Duke of Mariborough and Prince Eugene, from the very moment they met, acted with the most perfect unanimity. The next day a council of war was held, in which it was resolved to regulate the march of the army according to the motions of the enemy; and the Pioneers were sent on every side to make ways; the resolution, which the Duke had before taken of bringing the enemy, if possible, to an engagement, being again confirmed. And so eager were the Generals for it, that it was determined, if a fair opportunity offered, not to wait the arrival of the Imperial troops. In the afternoon Prince Eugene went to Brussels to pay a visit to his mother, the Countess of Soissons; and the day following the Duke of Mariborough being much indisposed and feverish, the orders were given at Monsieur Anverquerque's quarters; and, according to these orders, four battalions marched to reinforce the garrison of Brussels, and eight battalions were ordered, with Major-General Cadogan, and the Quarter-masters, to make the ways.

The small advantage, which the enemy had in surprizing Ghent, proved the occasion of their own much greater loss; and the Governor of that castle not delivering it, till the 8th of July, had this good effect, that it amused the enemy two or three days in their camp from above Alst to Scillebille on the Scheld. This delay proved fatal to them; for the French Generals receiving intelligence, that Prince Eugene was bringing a reinforcement of about thirty thousand men, with all expedition, from Germany into Brabant, bethought themselves of retiring towards their lines and strong towns, before the conjunction of the Confederate troops, in hopes, that being reinforced with a good body of troops, which were coming to join them from Alsace (though not with such speed as the Germans, who were remarkably expeditious on this occasion beyond their usual custom) under the command of the Duke of Berwick, they might afterwards be a match for the Confederates, or, at least, might preserve their late easy conquests. They likewise imagined, that they might surprize or reduce Oudenard, the only pass the Allies had on the Scheld, since the taking of Ghent, before the Allies could be in any readiness to prevent it; and to this end, Count de Cheme-rault having broke down all the bridges on the Scheld, and intimidated all the lesser places in those parts, they caused Oudenard (1) to be invested on the 9th of July early, and intended to have taken possession of the advantageous camp of Lessines.

Monsieur de Sigierman, who commanded in Oudenard,

(1) Oudenard is a rich and very strong town of the Low-Countries, in the Earldom of Flanders, the Marquisate of the territory of Oudenard: It surrendered to the Duke of Mariborough in 1706. The French laid siege to it in the beginning of this campaign; but the approach of the Confederate army made them abandon the place, and engaged them in a battle near it, which proved a fatal overthrow to them. It stands on the river Scheld, thirteen miles South of Ghent, thirteen North-west of Albe, thirty-six West of Brussels, and thirty-seven almost North of Mons.

Oudenard invested by the French.

1708. Oudenard, fearing that the inhabitants might be treacherous, as it was suspected it had been in other places, immediately called a Council of war, to consider of means how to keep them within the limits of their duty, if they should be otherwise inclined. It was resolved to defend the place to the last extremity, and to declare to the townsmen, that it was hoped they would contribute all that lay in their power to that end; but that, if they offered to make the least attempt towards surrendering the place, they would set fire to it in every part, and reduce it to a heap of ashes. The inhabitants made all possible protestations of their fidelity, and assisted the Governor in putting the town in the best posture of defence.

The Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, having either information or suspicion of the enemy's design, ordered Brigadier Chanclos to throw himself into Oudenard, with seven hundred men, detached from Aeth, Courtray, and Mening, and Walef's dragoons, which was performed accordingly. This proved a great disappointment to the enemy; for, if they could have secured this place, they would have cut off the communication of the Allies with Mening and Courtray.

The same day Oudenard was invested, the Confederate army (which was encamped at Aische) marched in four columns, the Earl of Albemarle being left, with all the grenadiers of the army, and thirty squadrons, to make the rear-guard, in case the enemy should have made any motion towards Brussels. The ways being in good repair, the army marched with the greatest expedition, and advanced as far as Hersfelingen, above five leagues from Aische, before eleven in the morning. Here the Duke of Marlborough gave orders for the army to pitch their tents, fronting towards the enemy; who being far from expecting, that the Confederate army could possibly make so swift a march, did not beat the General till three in the afternoon, thinking themselves sure of the camp of Lessines, in order to cover the siege of Oudenard, for which they had their artillery ready at Tournay. Prince Eugene having rejoined the army at Hersfelingen, the Duke of Marlborough detached Major-General Cadogan about four in the afternoon, with eight squadrons, and as many battalions, to take possession of the camp of Lessines. Accordingly, eight hundred men of this detachment entered the town of that name, about midnight; and the rest having passed through, at four in the morning, posted themselves on this side the river Dender. On the other hand, the Retreat, which was the signal for striking the tents, being beat at seven, the evening before, in the camp at Hersfelingen, the whole army marched immediately, and, moving on all night, began, the 10th, about eleven in the morning, to pass the Dender over the bridges laid by Major-General Cadogan, and continued their March to the camp of Lessines, on the other side; the chief strength whereof consists in the rivulet, which falls below it into the Dender. The enemy, perceiving themselves disappointed of this camp, altered their march towards Gavre, in order to pass the Scheld there.

The 11th in the morning, upon intelligence, that the enemy had quitted Oudenard, and were pursued by Brigadier Chanclos with Walef's dragoons, Cadogan was sent with sixteen battalions and eight squadrons to make the ways and bridges at Oudenard. The army began to march at eight o' clock by the left, still in four columns, as they had incamped; and after the news came, that the enemy were still passing at Gavre, the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene resolved to endeavour to bring them to an engagement. In order to this, the army continued their march with such speed and diligence, that, at two in the afternoon, the front was at the bridges, over which Cadogan's sixteen battalions were then passing. Eight squadrons, and part of the former detachment, with the Quarter-masters, and Major-General Rantzau at the head of them, were posted behind a rivulet that runs into the Scheld, where they observed, that the French army were partly marching, and partly drawn up in order of battle. They took notice likewise that the enemy had thrown seven battalions into the village of Heynem (which is situated on the banks of the Scheld) and the neighbouring plains, which confronted that small village, were filled with the troops of the household, who were drawn up exactly opposite to the eight squadrons under Major-General Rantzau, no obstacle but a small Rivulet dividing them. Behind the village were morasses, woods, and defiles; so that an army had no other way to march, but through the high-road. This disposition of the French made it uncertain, whether their real design was to hinder the Duke of Marlborough's passing the Scheld, or to gain their own lines between Lisse and Tournay, which they thought they might easily have done, not imagining, that so considerable a body, as that of the Confederates, could march five leagues in a close country abounding in passes and defiles, have their roads levelled, cross a great river, and make an attack upon them the same day.

The design of the Duke of Vendosme in placing the seven battalions in the village of Heynem, and the squadrons, which the Confederates had discovered on the plain, which were to the number of twelve, was to have advanced towards the bridge, over which the Allies were passing, to a certain distance, in order to have waited there till half their troops were passed, and then to have attacked them with all the advantage which his superiority of number could have given him, not doubting but he should easily have defeated them, before the other half of their army could come to their assistance. It was with this intent, these troops were advanced, and the Duke would soon have followed with the whole army; but the Duke of Burgundy did not approve of this project. He had all along shewed an inclination to retire towards Ghent; and this propensity appeared now stronger than ever; he ordered the troops to stop short in their march at Gavre in the greatest perplexity, not knowing which way to move. He even recalled the squadrons, which were in the plain, and prepared to retire; and to this the French attribute their misfortune, which ensued.

It would have been easy for the French, either to have cut off the detachment of the Allies, which had advanced and laid bridges over the Scheld, or, at least, to have destroyed those bridges, before the whole confederate army could come up; and if then they had supported their left at Heynem, posted their horse behind the castle of Beveren, towards the mill of Oycke, and placed their center on the height between Wertigen and Heurne, they would undoubtedly have had all the advantage, which the most difficult ground could give; and perhaps the choice would have been on their side, whether to engage in a general action, or not. But the Dukes of Burgundy and Vendosme, who had been at variance for some days before, what course they should take, still differed in their opinions, and were both yet strangely at a loss, what measures they should resolve upon, and what dispositions to make. This irresolution lasted till three in the afternoon, when most of the young Commanders in the French army, to make their Court to the Duke of Burgundy, contradicted all that was advised by the Duke of Vendosme, and declared loudly for an engagement, which in a great measure determined the Duke of Burgundy; and the Duke of Vendosme was obliged to submit.

The battle of Oudenhard
N. S.

Major-General Grimaldi was therefore ordered by the Duke of Burgundy, with the horse of the King's Household, to begin the attack on the right, and dislodge Major-General Rantzau from the eminence, on which he was posted; but when they came to the rivulet, and found it marshy, they were discouraged from attempting the passage, and retired towards their own right, though their army had twelve thousand men more in number than the Confederates, and several other advantages. This attack the Duke of Vendosme disapproved of; and therefore sent Monsieur Jennet, his Aid de Camp to the left, to attack the Allies on that side. But the Duke of Burgundy countermanded it, upon information, as it was said, that there was an unpassable morass on that side; which, however, the Duke of Vendosme had passed over but an hour before. Upon this Cadogan, who had passed the river with twelve of his sixteen battalions between three and four o'clock, attacked the village of Heynem, with such resolution (Brigadier Sabine, with his Brigade, being at the head) that they soon made themselves masters of it, and took three of the seven battalions intire, making many of the officers and private men prisoners that belonged to the other four. Immediately after, Major-General Rantzau, with the eight squadrons, and the Quarter-Masters, passed the rivulet, and advanced into the plain, where the French horse had been drawn up, between the villages of Singhem and Mullen. Several of the squadrons of their rear-guard being still passing through the plain, the eight squadrons, with the Quarter-Masters attacked them with great vigour, and drove them into the close ground and the high-way, which led into the march of their own army.

The Elector of Hanover distinguishing
by his valour.

Here it was, the Electoral Prince of Hanover, his present Majesty of Great-Britain, gave distinguishing proofs of his early valour. He charged, sword in hand, at the head of a squadron of his Father's dragoons*: His horse was shot under him, and Colonel Lusky, who commanded the squadron, was kill'd fighting bravely by him. Lieutenant-General Schulemberg, and several other Volunteers, behaved with great resolution, and led up the squadrons. The French regiment of la Breche, and several other regiments, were intirely broken; and the Colonel himself, being dangerously wounded, was taken, together with a great many other Officers, and twelve standards and kettle-drums.

The Confederate army continued, in the mean time, to pass the bridges with all imaginable diligence. The Prussian horse formed themselves upon the right in the same plain, where the advanced guard was; and the rest of the horse, as they passed, followed the Prussian through the village of Heurne, into the plain; but the foot, because of the length of the march, came later to the bridges; so that none but the sixteen battalions were there till five o'clock.

The Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene being at the head of the horse, which were forming in the plain, and observing the great want there was of infantry, sent orders to the foot, which had been employed in attacking the village, to leave their post, and throw themselves into the hedges on the other side of the plain, whither the enemy seemed to be marching with great diligence. On that side of the plain were no more than two battalions of Major-General Collier's and Brigadier Grunkau's; which were attacked with great fury; but they maintained their post with equal bravery, till more foot came up to their assistance. The Duke of Marlborough sent repeated orders to the foot, to press their march, the enemy being then forming, and ready to attack the infantry, which was already there, with very unequal numbers. In the interim, the Duke of Argyle arrived with twenty battalions, which were scarce posted, when the French attacked them very briskly, and drove some Prussian battalions from their posts; but notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, about six in the evening, they retook it sword in hand. By this time Count Lotum was coming up, to sustain this attack, with the remainder of the foot of the right; and the Duke perceiving, that the great stress of the battle would lie on the right, sent to the left for twenty battalions. The left wing arrived something later than the right, and having passed their horse through Oudenard, and their foot on bridges below the town, had formed themselves in two lines, with the village of Moreghem behind them.

The success, which the Confederates had already obtained in the several engagements near the villages of Heynem, Mullen, and Heurne, made the French Generals sensible, they should soon be attacked on all sides. They therefore found themselves under a necessity of making a stand; to which end, they posted their foot very advantageously before the villages of Wanigen, Lede, and Huyze, having in their front several defiles, fenced with inclosures of hedges, ditches, or thickets, and placed most of their cavalry on their right, near the villages of Oyke and Wiriigen.

As soon as the Confederate foot arrived, they formed themselves in two lines before the horse, and then attacked, in very good order, the inclosures and villages in their front, where the French were posted; so that about seven o'clock the fire grew general, both on the right and on the left; and, though the enemy gave way in most places, yet, being sustained with fresh troops, the action was maintained very obstinately a good while after.

There was before the left of the left wing a kind of opening, through which run a road, that led into the plain, on the top of the hill, and which the Prince of Orange-Nassau, at the head of the Dutch foot, cleared with great vigour.

1708. gour and resolution. At the same time the Duke of Marlborough dispatched orders to the Veldt-Marshal d'Avoverquerque and the Count de Tilly, who were on the top of the hill near Oycke, to press the enemy as much as possible on that side. These orders were punctually obeyed; and Avoverquerque ordered Major-General Weeck to march with the brigades of Wassenaer and Oudenbergh; which being supported by Count Tilly with the Danish cavalry under his command, passed through a narrow defile into a field where all the French household were drawn up.

The Confederate troops no sooner approached, than the French, who did not in the least apprehend being attacked on that side, retired, and endeavoured to shelter themselves under the hedges between Wirtigem and the castle of Beveren towards the main body of their army, where the fire was very hot; but the Prince of Orange-Nassau, with Count Oxenstiern, coming up with four brigades of infantry, led them on with great gallantry, passed some defiles, attacked the enemy in flank, and obliged them to give way. Those, who were thus retiring, were forced back into the inclosures in great disorder; and in growing dark, many battalions and more squadrons being in the utmost confusion, some were cut in pieces, and others desired to capitulate for their whole regiments.

While this happened on the left, the Duke of Marlborough, who till then had been the whole time in company with Prince Eugene, visiting the field of battle, leading on, posting, and ranging the respective bodies of troops; but thinking now it would be more advantageous to separate, and direct in different places, arrived there, having left the care of the right to Prince Eugene, who shewed great satisfaction in leading on the English troops, whom he saw perform wonders; so that at last the enemy finding themselves charged and borne down on all sides by the Confederate forces, retired in the utmost confusion, leaving great numbers of prisoners behind them. Their dragoons favoured their retreat, and, to save the troops of the household, received several discharges from the Confederate infantry, and were most of them either killed or taken.

Night coming on, and the fire being directed so many ways at once, that it was impossible to distinguish friends from enemies, the Confederate Generals gave positive orders to their troops to give over firing, and to let the routed enemy escape, rather than to venture putting themselves into disorder. This put an end to the slaughter, and saved the remainder of the enemy's army; for, had there been but two hours more of day-light, in all probability their whole body of foot, and their right wing of horse, would have been entirely cut off, they being surrounded almost on every side.

During this memorable action, the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene gave their orders with so much composedness of mind and clearness of judgment, as seemed peculiar to those two great men. They exposed their persons to the greatest dangers, when necessity required it; and yet had both the good fortune to escape unhurt. The Electoral Prince of Hanover had also a great share in the glory of the day. At the head of his father's cavalry, he charged the celebrated troops of the French King's household, bearing down all that opposed his career. The young Prince of Orange-Nassau, Stadtholder of Friseland, and Father of the present Prince of Orange, distinguished himself likewise by his martial ardour, bravery, and conduct. The brave Veldt-Marshal d'Avoverquerque, tho' worn out with the fatigues of above thirty campaigns, and in a languishing condition, exerted his expiring vigour, and was on horse-back at the head of his troops in the hottest of the fire. Count Tilly, the Prince of Wurtemberg, Lieutenant-Generals Rantzau and Nutzmer, Major-Generals Webb and Cadogan, Brigadier Sabine, and, in short, all the Generals and Officers animated the soldiers every where by their own example.

The different troops, of which the Confederate army consisted, fought with such emulation of each other, that it was difficult to determine, which deserved the greatest applause; yet it was observed, that the Prussian Gens d'Armes signalized themselves in several vigorous charges, which they made and sustained against the French cavalry, in which they lost near half of their number.

If we may believe some of the French Writers, the Dukes of Burgundy and Berry and the Pretender had a great share in this battle; but, if the Dutch accounts are to be credited, they, or at least the two latter, only beheld the engagement from the steeple of an adjacent village, and consulted their safety by a timely retreat. As for the other Generals of the enemy's army, they committed several gross errors, as well before as during the action, either for want of unanimity or judgment: But, for their troops, it must be acknowledged, that, in general, they fought better at this time than they had done upon any other occasion.

The French endeavoured by their partial relations to palliate their defeat, and make a drawn battle of it (1); for which they had the only pretence of having saved their baggage. Now that could not be otherwise, since they left it behind them, as they did likewise their artillery, having only made use of four or five pieces of cannon

The victory indisputable on the side of the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene.

(1) All that Father Daniel says of it is in these words: 'Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough being arrived at Oudenard by long marches, they passed the Scheld with their army, which they drew up in order. The French army arriving there at the same time, in order of battle, gave the charge. The onset was furious, and lasted from four in the evening till night came on, which put an end to the fight. The army of France retired towards Ghent: The left, which made the rear-guard, remained upon the field of battle till it was broad day, and then marched off in good order, under the conduct of the Chevalier du Rozel,

Lieutenant-General, the enemy, who attacked them, not being able to do them any mischief.' The Marquis de Féguieres, in his memoirs, observes thus: 'Since we made no dispositions for the encounter, our loss of men, though very great, is not to be considered as a decisive event: And indeed the confusion, as well as our extraordinary loss, happened in the retreat we made in the night, when the troops were neither sensible where they fled, nor by whom they were conducted. In a word, the dispositions for their engagements, and the motives which induced us to undertake it, ought never to be repeated in any future conjuncture.

cannon during the whole action. But the field, where the battle was fought, of which the Confederates remained masters, with six or seven hundred of the enemy's Officers, and about seven thousand private foldiers, who were made prisoners, together with ten kettle-drums, and above one hundred standards and colours taken, were all evidences of an indisputable victory on the side of the Confederates.

retreat.

The enemy retired in the night, by the road which leads through the village of Huyse from Oudenard to Ghent. The Duke of Vendosme proposed to the Duke of Burgundy, that they should halt, in order to form their troops, and give their march, at least, the air of a retreat; but his advice was unregarded; for, of all the general Officers present, only the Count d' Eureux was of his sentiment. Observing therefore, that nothing was to be done with men terrified out of their senses, he gave the word for a retreat, which was no sooner done, than the Generals, as well as private Men, threw themselves into the road of Ghent with the utmost precipitation. The Duke of Vendosme looked with grief and shame on this scandalous behaviour: Finding, however, twenty-five squadrons of his best troops, and about the same number of battalions unbroken, he formed with these a rear-guard, and so preserved the army from a second defeat, which would certainly have proved more fatal than the first.

The Confederates, in the mean time, continued under arms, hoping to renew the engagement again the next morning, and impatient, in the mean time, for day, that they might have a true information how far this victory had extended, of which the darkness of the night left them in ignorance. To this end, as soon as it was light, the Duke of Mariborough ordered forty squadrons from the right, commanded by the Lieutenant-Generals Bulau and Lamley, with a considerable body of foot, to follow and attack the enemy's rear guard, which they did with great vigour. But several Companies of French grenadiers, being advantageously posted along the highway leading to Ghent, killed and wounded several of the officers and private men of the Confederates, and obliged them to leave off the pursuit, there being but one road, secured by hedges and ditches, lined with the enemy's grenadiers; but no place for the Confederate cavalry to form themselves in. On this occasion several officers of the Grenadiers, commanded by Major Erwin, were killed or wounded; and General Meredith received a shot in the cheek; but the enemy, on their side, were much greater sufferers. The regiment of Rifburg, which closed their rear, was intirely ruined, and two whole Companies taken prisoners; as was likewise Brigadier Pourienne, who commanded the hindermost Brigade, with several other Officers.

As to the killed and wounded on either side, the Allies reckoned among the slain Major-General Berensdorf; the Colonels Adercäse and Bolzen, Count Rantzau, and Sir John Matthews, with Captain Dean of the British guards, and about eight hundred private men; and, among the wounded, Lieutenant-General Natzmer, Major-Generals Gaudecker and Berner; the Colonels Greves, Pennycuik, and four others; a hundred and sixty other officers, and about two thousand private soldiers; which loss was abundantly repaired by deserters and prisoners, Germans, Swiss, and Savoyards, who lifted themselves voluntarily in the service of the Allies. The French endeavoured to conceal their loss with all possible industry; but that it was much greater than that of the Allies, is evident from several very authentick accounts (1); from which it appears, that the number of prisoners taken

(1) A letter from the Field-Deputies of the States-General to the States-General:

High and mighty Lords,

By reason of the shortness of time, we could only let your High-Mightinesses know yesterday, that we engaged the enemy about four in the afternoon. Wherefore we give ourselves the honour of sending your High-Mightinesses farther advice, that our army, having marched on Sunday night from Afche, took the route of Leffines, in order to pass the Dender at that place, without opposition from the enemy, whom we had prevented by a sudden march; and, arriving there on Tuesday evening, we understood, that the enemy were marched from Alost towards Gavre, where they caused bridges be made, in order to pass the Scheld; which made us believe they designed to post themselves upon the height of Oudenard, and hinder us from passing the Scheld. And, though our Army was very much fatigued by the foregoing march, yet we resolved to proceed on our march yesterday, and, if possible, to prevent the enemy. We detached therefore sixteen battalions in the night, to take post on the other side of the Scheld near Oudenard, and to lay the bridges necessary for our passage. Yesterday morning about nine we received advice, that the enemy had passed the Scheld, and were marching towards Oudenard, which made us hasten our march as much as possible, for fear our detachment, that was sent over, should be defeated, and ourselves prevented in our design of passing the Scheld. But, by that time the enemy were come near Oudenard, they saw we had already taken post over the Scheld, which made them resolve to strike off to the right; but, to cover their march against ours, they thought fit to throw troops into the hedges and into a village upon the Scheld below Oudenard. About three in the afternoon, as soon as our foot began to come up, it was judged advisable to attack the village, and thereby oblige the enemy to go no farther, but stop their march. This attack was made with so much vigour and success, that the enemy were immediately driven out of the village, our men falling upon them with their bayonets on the muzzels of their muskets, and not firing a piece; so that they presently threw down their arms, and a whole Brigade, together with a Brigadier, surrendered prisoners. The few horse, that had passed with the detachment, attacked likewise the French squadrons posted behind the village with so much success, that they were put into disorder and pushed, our men taking from them eight or ten standards, and some horses. Hereupon the enemy were forced to face about to us, and form themselves about four o'clock, when, most of our foot being over, and formed, the general engagement began, first on the right, and afterwards on the left wing. The fight was properly between the foot, and was obstinate; but our men got ground, and drove the enemy from one hedge to another, till night put an end to the combat. The horse, who, by reason of the broken ground, could not act, were detached to the right and the left wing, and advanced so far, that they attacked the enemy in flank and rear; which, when they perceived, they fell in the night into the utmost confusion; and part of them retired, with their baggage and artillery, towards Ghent and Dynje; another part to-

The largest list, on the side of the Allies, make the loss of the enemy to be nine thousand eight hundred prisoners, officers included; four thousand two hundred killed and wounded; two thousand four hundred deserted; in all nineteen thousand four hundred: Taken besides, ten pieces of cannon, fifty-six pair of colours, fifty-two standards, eight pair of kettle-drums, four thousand five hundred horses. On the other hand, the lowest computation amounts together to fourteen thousand seven hundred killed, wounded, and taken prisoners, without mentioning deserters; and the lowest calculation, given by the French themselves, allows their loss to have been above ten thousand men.

The

wards the road of Courtray; and, according to computation, six or seven thousand surrendered themselves prisoners, with three or four hundred Officers at their head; among whom are several Dukes and General Officers. Had not the night come to their assistance, we believe they would have saved very little of their army. We therefore congratulate your High-Mightiness upon this complete victory, which God Almighty has so graciously vouchsafed, and which gives us an opportunity, with this victorious army, and that of Prince Eugene, who was present at this action, to extend the frontiers further, and bring the enemy to reason. Each General made so good a disposition, and every regiment attacked the enemy so well, and with so much intrepidity, that it was impossible for any one to distinguish themselves in a particular manner. Our loss, God be thanked, is so small, that there is not, as we know of, one regiment out of a condition to make the rest of the campaign. Among the horse our loss is nothing at all. Nor do we yet know, that we have lost any Head-Officer of the State. With which, High and Mighty Lords, &c.

Signed,

Adm. Van Borjelle tot Geldermalsen.

P. S. We thought, considering the importance of this affair, we should not do amiss, in sending this to your High-Mightiness by the Head-Officer Cock, who may have the honour of informing your High-Mightiness of more particulars.

Velt-Marshal d'Auverquerque's letter to the Greffier Fagel.

On Monday last, at seven o'clock, we broke up (as I have already had the honour to acquaint your Lordship) with the army from Herfelingen near Enguien. We marched the whole night, and the next day passed the Dender at and above Lessines. Yesterday morning we marched again from Lessines towards Oudenard, where we arrived about noon. We had received intelligence, that the army broke up on Tuesday from the neighbourhood of Alost, and were incamped at Gavre, and that they also passed the Scheld yesterday at that place; which indeed we found to be true, perceiving, upon our arrival at Oudenard, the enemy upon a full march towards Tournay. We laid the bridges over the Scheld in their night, and our troops passed the river with an unpeakable speed and courage. About two o'clock the greatest part of our army had passed, with which the Duke of Marborough and Prince Eugene formed the right wing near Braun-Castle, about half a league from the town, and began to engage the enemy in a battle. In the mean time I marched likewise with the troops of the States, which composed the left wing, in order to attack the enemy, which I did about five o'clock, having been obliged to make a great round to come at them: And God has been pleased so to bless the arms of the High Allies, that we have entirely beaten the enemy, and forced them to retire in great confusion, some towards Courtray, and others towards Ghent.

I give myself the honour to congratulate their High-Mightiness upon this important victory. We shall endeavour all we can to make our advantage of it. The enemy will have much ado to bring their army into the field again this year in a good condition. The loss of the slain on their side is very considerable, besides a good number of Officers (some of them of distinction) and common soldiers, prisoners. We have also taken several standards and colours, of which I will send their High-Mightiness a list by the next courier.

The bravery and wise conduct of the Duke of Marborough and Prince Eugene cannot be enough commended, nor the zeal and courage of the other Generals of the States, who did all which their duty and regard for the service required of them. All the Officers and Troops, without distinction, did all that could be expected from brave men and good soldiers. We sent out a body of horse and foot this morning to pursue the run-away enemy, and scatter them yet more, but they were got too far off by the favour of the night. I remain

Humble and obedient Servant,

AUVERQUERQUE.

Mr. Cardonnel's letter to Mr. Cole at Venice:

Sir,

Camp at Oudenard, July 12, 1708.

As soon as the enemy had an account, that our army had passed the Dender at Lessines, they recalled their troops that were come to invest Oudenard, and marched with their whole army to Gavre, where they began to pass the Scheld yesterday morning, and continued passing till about four in the afternoon. And as my Lord Duke was resolved to pursue them, in order to engage them to a battle, Major-General Cadogan was sent away very early with a strong detachment, to pass the same river through this town, and to make bridges for the whole army, which followed with all possible diligence, to prevent the enemy's passing the Lys, or their retreat towards the lines. Accordingly, about three in the afternoon, the detachment, with the head of our army, began to attack the enemy in their march; and, in a little time, Brigadier Sabine, at the head of his Brigade, beat seven of the enemy's battalions, of whom he killed a great number, and took most of the rest prisoners. The enemy then formed their line, and the battle began about five, and lasted with great firmness till near ten at night, it being chiefly the foot that were engaged, the enemy still retreating; so that, besides a great slaughter, the enemy still retreating; so that, besides a great slaughter, we made a great number of prisoners. We cannot yet give the particulars of this great victory; but some thousands of prisoners, and, among them, some general Officers are already brought into town. Forty squadrons of horse, with twenty battalions of foot, are in pursuit of the rest of their army, which is retreating towards Ghent. My Lord Duke, with the Prince of Savoy, and Monsieur d'Auverquerque, continued on horse-back

The Dukes of Burgundy and Berry, with the Pretender, reached Ghent the morning after the battle, by five o'clock; and about nine, the Duke of Vendosme, who brought up the rear, arrived there also. As they were apprehensive of being pursued by the whole Confederate army, the Duke immediately commanded his troops to march through Ghent to Lovendegen, on the canal, not far from that City; where, for their greater security, they cast up intrenchments, and planted upon them their artillery, which they had left at Gavre with their heavy baggage. In this camp they recovered themselves out of their first consternation; but the former misunderstandings revived among their Generals, especially between the Dukes of Burgundy the whole night, to animate our troops, and to give the necessary orders for the pursuit.

I am, &c.

H. CARDONNEL.

P. S. Since the writing of this, we have an account of about six thousand prisoners brought into the town, besides near five hundred Officers, of which several are of note. I heartily congratulate with you on this great and glorious victory, &c.

Letter from the Duke of Marlborough to the Earl of Manchester.

My Lord,

Camp at Werwick, July 15, 1708.

I return your Lordship many thanks for the favour of your letter of the 22d of last month, and am glad to see your Lordship was like soon to have just satisfaction from the Republic of Venice. You need not doubt then, but the Queen will readily grant your desire of returning home. We are in great expectation of Sir John Leake's being sailed for Catalonia, where the succours from Italy will have been very much wanting. We hear the Duke of Orleans persisted in the siege of Tortosa, notwithstanding the loss of his provision-ships taken by our fleet. Your Lordship will have heard with concern the enemy's taking the City of Ghent, by the treachery of some of the inhabitants. But the good news that will soon have followed of our defeating, on Wednesday last, part of their army near Oudenard, and obliging them to retire behind the canal between Ghent and Bruges, will have made some amends. We took between six and seven thousand prisoners, besides about seven hundred Officers, of which several are of note, and a great number of standards and colours. Our army lay on their arms that night, and on Thursday incamped on the field of battle: On Friday we rested, the troops having need of some ease, after their great fatigue; and about midnight we detached forty squadrons and thirty battalions towards the enemy's lines, between Warneton and Ypres. The whole army followed by break of day, and incamped at Helkin, whence we pursued our march to-day to this camp close to the lines, which we found our detachments had forced, and taken five hundred prisoners, the only guard the enemy had left for their security. We do not think, that their army is marched from behind the canal, which, with their possessing of Ghent, will be a great obstruction to our bringing up our heavy cannon and other artillery; so that I fear we shall be obliged to retake that place, before we can make any further progress.

Extract of an intercepted letter from a French Officer, who was in the battle.

I can only send you an unwelcome relation of the particulars of the battle, which happened yesterday about two in the afternoon near Oudenard. It will prove a great blow to France; for, without exaggerating the matter, we had above ten thousand men killed, wounded, or taken. The action was very ill managed on our side; for, instead of attacking the enemy when they began to pass the Scheld near Oudenard at eleven in the morning, we let them come over the river quietly, which they never would have adventured to do, had we, in any tolerable manner offered to dispute their passage; but seeing us stand still, they were encouraged to prosecute their first design, and began to pass over two bridges, which they had laid. As fast as their horse and foot came over, they ranged themselves in order of battle against us; and while our Generals were in suspense what resolution to take, whether to venture an engagement or not, the enemy's army continued coming over the river, and soon possessed themselves of some villages and hedges; so that, at last, our Generals were compelled to endeavour to dislodge them. Accordingly, our infantry advanced, and the ground was disputed two or three hours, with a terrible fire and great obstinacy on both sides; but our foot being tired with charging the enemy five or six times, and being disheartened to see themselves not supported by our horse (who could not act, because the ground was full of inclosures) and pressed hard by the enemy, were, at length, forced to retire, and quit the ground to them. We dragoons were obliged to endure the continual fire of the enemy's foot and cannon, without daring to stir, because we were on the right of the King's household, who suffered as much as we. Towards the evening we were fallen upon by a great number of the enemy's horse, to hinder us from succouring the rest, who were put to the route, and of seven regiments of dragoons we lost above half. At last, we had no other expedient left, than to force our way through the enemy; but first we sent to see whether we could be assisted in that design by any of our forces. In the mean time night came on apace, and we were informed, that the King's household (whose retreat was covered in some measure by us) were at too great a distance. Things standing thus, our resolution of breaking through the enemy sunk, and, some of the enemy's adjutants summoning us to yield ourselves prisoners of war, we submitted to it, seeing no other way to save our lives. At least forty of our regiments are reduced to a wretched condition, the greatest part of them being killed or taken; so that it will be long before they can be re-established. Of four regiments of the King's household, at least half are taken prisoners, and among them are several persons of note. The Chevalier de Langueville and fifteen other Officers were mortally wounded, and two of them are dead since the battle. The regiments of Pfiffer and Villars are quite ruined, and almost all their Officers are taken, with all their baggage, &c. Amongst the prisoners were above seven hundred Officers, viz. a Lieutenant-General, four Major-Generals, five Brigadiers, fourteen Colonels, eight Lieutenant-Colonels, nine Majors, two hundred and six Captains, one hundred and forty seven Lieutenants, ninety-six Cornets, one hundred and eighty-six Gens d'Armes, Chevaux Legers, or Lifeguards, and forty-seven Quarter-Masters. The Marquis de Ximenes, Colonel of the regiment of Royal Roussillon, and the Sieur de la Betrache, Colonel of horse, with a great number of other Officers, were killed.

A letter written by one of the Duke of Vendosme's confidants, supposed to be Monsieur Capitron, the Duke's Secretary.

Away with your consternation, Sir, and do not betray in yourself the weakness common to your Nation, who never light of a misfortune, but presently all is lost. I tell you, in the first place, that the reports you hinted to me are false, and the Duke of Vendosme laughs at them. As for the three marches which he suffered to be stolen from him, and his not guarding 1708. gundy and Vendosme, who, notwithstanding the interposition of the Court, could never be brought to a reconciliation (1).

While the French were intrenching themselves behind the canal between Ghent and Bruges, the Confederate troops being returned to their camp (which was the field of battle) they rested two days. Mean time the Duke of Marlborough, Prince Eugene, Monsieur Auverquerque, and the States Deputies, debated in a Council of war, how they might best improve their late success. The result was, That the Duke of Marlborough's army should immediately march to Menin, pass the Lys, level the French lines between Ypres and Warneton, and hinder any detachment from getting into Ypres, or the French army from retreating that way; and that Prince Eugene, with a detachment of the grand army, should march, at the same time, towards Brussels, to assemble his forces, observe the motions of the Duke of Berwick, and hinder likewise the enemy's army near Ghent, from retreating through Brabant the same way they came. According to these resolutions, Count Lothum, General of the Prussians, marched, the 13th of July, at night, with thirty battalions, and forty squadrons, the next day advanced towards the French lines, and took several small places. The same day the army took their route towards Menin, passed the Lys near that place, and encamped at a small distance from the town. Whilst a detachment from the Confederate army demolished the French lines between Ypres and the Lys, another was sent to raise contributions as far as Arras, which struck such a terror every where that it reached the very City of Paris.

Whilst these affairs were in agitation, the Confederate troops expected their heavy cannon, in order to undertake an important siege; and the French continued in their posts along the canal of Bruges, without giving the Allies any disturbance. The only method they pitched upon, as most proper to be put in execution, was to harraß the Dutch Flanders with small parties. This they did, and, whilst the Confederate army raised great contributions in Picardy and elsewhere, the French plundered a few Boors under the Government of the States. Their next attempt was against the forts of the Red-House, and fort Plasfendale, which they made themselves masters of sword in hand. But, whilst they were endeavouring to amuse the Confederates by these proceedings, several detachments of the Allies plundered the countries of Picardy and Artois. Count Tilly, the Lieutenant-Generals Orkney, Rantzau, and Hompesch, the Major-Generals Webb, Rantzau, and Count d'Arbach, with forty squadrons, twelve battalions, and a thousand grenadiers, advanced into Picardy, to lay the same under contribution, or to put that province under military execution. This detachment fell in with eight hundred horse near la Bassée and Lens (part of the cavalry belonging to the Duke of Berwick's army) of which a considerable number were killed, and a Colonel, a Major, a Captain, and two hundred Troopers taken prisoners. The Confederate troops pursued the enemy to the gates of Lens, wherein they

the Dender, every body knows, the Duke of Vendosme was for disputing the passage of that river; and that, after three days contest, he was forced to submit to the sentiments of those, who, to avoid an engagement, voted for passing the Scheld. However it was then, that they were obliged to own, what that Duke had foretold them, viz. That, whenever Prince Eugene understood they had a mind to avoid fighting, he would force them to do it, whether they would or no.

As to what they say, that the Duke of Vendosme ought to have attacked the van of the enemy's army, in their passing the Scheld, he knew better things. For as soon as he received advice from the Marquis of Biron, that part of the enemy's army was over, he was for attacking it, while he saw the dust made by the columns of that army on the other side of the river, about half a league from Oudenard; but he was single in his opinion, and consequently not hearkened to. This was at ten in the morning. At four in the afternoon Major-General Grimalkin was ordered, without the Duke of Vendosme's knowledge, to begin the attack; which, however, when he saw, he was for continuing it. Accordingly he sent Monsieur Jenet, his Aid de Camp, to the left, with orders for them to engage, but he was killed in his return. These orders were not executed, some Officers insinuating mal à propos to the Duke of Burgundy, that there was a quagmire and an impracticable morass; whereas the Duke of Vendosme's and the Count d'Evreux had passed an hour before.

As to the retreat, the Duke of Vendosme was not for it; but, as he was backed in his opinion by the Count d'Evreux only, he was again obliged to submit. No sooner therefore had he given the word for the army to retreat, but all got on horseback, and with astonishing precipitation fled to Ghent; and there were not wanting those, who advised the Princes to set out post from thence for Ypres.

The Duke of Vendosme, who was obliged, for a good part of the time, to make the rear-guard with his Aid de Camp, did not reach Ghent till almost nine in the morning, when he made a firm resolution to post the army behind the canal, which goes from that place to Bruges, though against the advice of all the General Officers, who threatened for three days together to abandon him; and said, they ought to endeavour to join the Duke of Berwick. That firmness saved the King's army, and France itself, for the fright the army was in would have caused a greater disgrace than that of Ramilles. Whereas the Duke of Vendosme, by posting himself behind the canal, has covered Ghent and Bruges, which is the essential point, and thereby revived and put courage into the troops, and given the Officers time to recollect themselves, and to know the Country. In a word, he has thrown the enemy out of action; and if they attack any of our strong places, as Ypres, Lisle, Mons or Tournay, the Duke of Vendosme will take Oudenard, make himself master of the Scheld, and so puzzle them. This, Sir, is the very truth, and the same the Duke of Vendosme has sent to the King, &c.

(1) Burnet observes, Vendosme took so much upon him, that the other Officers complained of his neglecting them; so they made their Court to the Duke of Burgundy, and laid the blame of all his miscarriages on Vendosme. He kept close to the orders he had from Versailler, where the accounts he gave, and the advices he offered, were more considered, than those that were sent by the Duke of Burgundy: This was very uneasy to him, who was impatient of contradiction, and longed to be in action, though he did not shew the forwardness, in expelling his own person, that was expected: He seemed very devout, even to bigotry; but by the accounts we had from France, it did appear, that his conduct, during the campaign, gave no great hopes or prospect from him, when all things should come into his hands: Chamillard was often sent from Court to soften him, and to reconcile him to the Duke of Vendosme, but with no effect. Vol. II. 509.

1708. they had posted fourteen hundred foot, which abandoned the place upon the approach of the Confederate infantry. After this the Generals raised considerable sums in the province of Picardy, burnt the suburbs of Dourlens, and returned with hostages for the contributions they had agreed on to be paid to the Allies, without any manner of opposition.

Some time after, a detachment from the French army at Lovendegen, under the command of the Chevalier de Rozen, made an irruption into the Dutch Flanders; but they performed little more than the other part of the army commanded by the Duke of Burgundy. They fell in upon the Dutch lines of Bervliet, which they took, having no manner of guard to defend them, Lieutenant-General Fagel and Major-General Murray retiring before them, for want of a sufficient force to make a stand; their troops not amounting to more than three battalions, and a regiment of dragoons. Afterwards the French advanced, and fell into the Island of Casandt, where they plundered and burnt above a hundred houses belonging to the country Farmers and Boors, and besides, obliged the inhabitants of the Island to pay contributions. Thus they finished their expedition, without putting any thing farther material in execution, and retired back to rejoin their main body.

This invasion of Dutch Flanders did not occasion any alteration in the measures that had been concerted for a considerable siege; in order to which a great train of artillery, and a vast number of waggons laden with warlike stores, had, with all possible expedition, been provided at Brussels. Prince Eugene's army from Germany had now joined the Confederates; and the French foreseeing the storm, and rightly conjecturing, that Lisle was the place, which the Allies intended to bend their main force against, had made provisions suitable to the greatness of the danger they apprehended. For, besides the presence of the Marshal de Boufflers, Governor of all French Flanders, and of the Lieutenants-General de Surville, Lee, and other Officers of distinction, they threw into the place twenty-one battalions of the best troops of France. But notwithstanding the difficulties, that must naturally attend the siege of so strong and so well-provided a place, besides others occasioned by the Confederates being cut off from their magazines in Antwerp and Sas van Ghent; all which made the Duke of Vendosme say, "That he did not think so wise a Captain as Prince Eugene would venture upon so rash an enterprise;" yet nothing was able to deter the Confederate Generals from their resolutions. So that, having brought a great convoy of provisions, ammunition, and other warlike stores from Brussels to Menin, Lisle (1) was invested on the 13th of August, N. S. on one side by Prince Eugene, and on the other by the Prince of Orange-Nassau, Stadt-holder of Friesland, in the following manner: The artillery being arrived at Pettes, and all things concerted for the siege, the Prince of Orange-Nassau was detached with thirty-one battalions, to take post at Marquet upon the Deule, within half a league of Lisle, and Lieutenant-General Wood, with thirty-four squadrons, marched to Potteghem. The grand army marched likewise from their camp at Werwick to Helchin; and, the same day, Prince Eugene, having passed the Marque at Pont-a-Trefsin, invested the town between that place and the Upper Deule, whilst the Prince of Orange-Nassau did the same with his detachment between the Upper and Lower Deule; by which means the enemy were shut up, and could put no further reinforcements into the place. The Duke of Marlborough took upon him to cover the siege; and to that end incamped at Helchin, where he had a convenience from time to time to reinforce the troops employed in the siege, or to march and fight the enemy, as occasion should require.

This important siege was to be carried on with fifty battalions; six Imperialists, nine Palatines, five Hessians, and thirty from the grand army; and, all matters being put into a proper posture for a vigorous siege, the trenches were opened on the 22d of August, between seven and eight in the evening, on the right and left of the Lower Deule; the right against the gate of St. Andrew, under the direction of Monsieur des Roques, and the other against St. Magdalen Gate, under the care of Monsieur du Mey. Four thousand workmen were commanded for this service, covered by ten battalions of the Imperial, Palatine, and Hessian troops, commanded by Lieutenant-General Wilke, and Major-General Volkerhoven. Ten battalions and six hundred horse were ready to sustain them; but the trenches were carried on with so good success, that the Allies had above two hours time to cover themselves, before they were perceived by the enemy; who made a terrible fire from the town, though with so little Execution, that the Confederates had not above three or four men killed, and about fifteen wounded. On the 23d, Lieutenant-General Pettensof, in the service of the Elector Palatine, and the Major-Generals Sacken and Soble, relieved the trenches with four Imperial and six Hessian battalions, and one thousand workmen at each attack. But Pettensof going from one attack to the other, and missing his way in the night, had the misfortune to be taken prisoner, and carried into the town. The 24th, Lieutenant-General Spaar relieved the trenches, with Major-General Collier, the Brigadiers Wassenaar and Keppel, and the British battalions of Godfrey and Ingoldby, two Prussian, the Danish guards, and the battalions of Orange, Bellem, Swarts, and Mey. The same night, three hundred and twenty grenadiers were commanded to attack the Chapel of St. Magdalen, wherein the enemy had a hundred and twenty grenadiers, with two Captains, and some subaltern Officers, who having lost one of their Captains, and about twenty men, the rest surrendered. The Besiegers had, in this action, near thirty

(1) Lisle is a large, rich, and strong City, the Capital of French Flanders, and, next to Paris, was reckoned the chief place of the King of France's dominions. The Allies invested it August 13, 1708. The Town was surrendered to them, October 23, and the Citadel, December 11. It stands among the pools and marshes, fifteen miles West of Tournay, twenty-eight North of Deway, thirty-six South-West of Ghent, thirty-seven South-East of Dunkirk, and thirty-eight almost West of Mons.

1708. thirty men killed and wounded; some Officers and Monsieur du Mey (Director of the attacks) received a small contusion. The 26th the Besieged retook the Chapel, having made a sally with most of the grenadiers and two squadrons of dragoons. But the Prince of Orange-Nassau being in the trenches, caused two battalions to advance, who retook it, and caused the enemy to retire with precipitation, into the counterescarp. The 27th in the morning, the besiegers fired fifty pieces of cannon and twenty mortars upon the town with so good success, that they beat down one of the enemy's batteries. On the 29th, early in the morning, the Confederate troops stormed a fortified mill on the right near the gate of St. Andrew with three hundred grenadiers, beat the enemy from that post, and took several prisoners; but, at the same time, the enemy made so terrible a fire from the ramparts, that the Besiegers were obliged to quit it. The next day three hundred grenadiers were commanded to retake that mill, but the enemy set it on fire, and abandoned that post. On the last of August the Prince of Holstein-Beck relieved the trenches; and each battalion was ordered to furnish six waggons, to carry stones near the batteries, to throw the same with mortars into the enemy's works. The 1st of September, at night, the Imperialists relieved the trenches, and the Besiegers carried on the sap towards the salient angle of the counterescarp of the horn-work, within fifty paces of the pallisades; and a vast quantity of fascines and gabions were prepared for making their lodgment on the counterescarp. At the same time the breach being very wide, and the ditch almost filled up with the ruins of the walls, Marshal Boufflers was apprehensive, that the town would fall into the Confederates hands, and therefore ordered several of the largest pieces of cannon to be removed into the citadel. On the 4th the Prince of Holstein-Beck relieved the trenches; as did also Lieutenant-General Spaar the next day; and the approaches were carried on so successfully, that it was judged, the counterescarp would be stormed the same evening; but that enterprize was deferred till the 7th.

Whilst the siege of Lifle was thus vigorously carried on, the Dukes of Burgundy, Vendosme, and Berwick made two or three feint advances, as if they designed to attack the Duke of Marlbrough; who, upon those motions, gave orders for his army to be ready to march upon the first occasion; and, in the mean time, detached the Earl of Aiblone, with fifteen hundred horse, to observe the enemy. The Earl advancing towards Leuse, his van-guard fell in with an hundred horse, detached from the Duke of Berwick's army, whom they charged, defeated, and took thirty prisoners. The enemy made several marches and counter-marches, whereby it was apparent, that they designed to attempt the raising of the siege. The Duke of Burgundy likewise sent a spy, to endeavour to get into Lifle, and acquaint the Marshal Boufflers, that their army being on this side Tournay, he might depend upon being relieved; but that Messenger happened to be discovered and seized by the Allies. Upon this the Duke of Marlbrough, in expectation of an engagement, ordered the Confederate army, on the 5th of September, to march to the ground marked out for them, in order to give the enemy battle; and being reinforced by Prince Eugene with seventy-two squadrons and twenty-six battalions from the siege (with which troops came also King Augustus and the Landgrave of Hesse, as Voluntiers) and Lieutenant-General Fagel having marched with incredible speed out of Dutch Flanders and Brabant, and joined the Confederate army with seven battalions and as many squadrons, they continued till ten o'clock in order of battle. But the enemy declined coming to an engagement; so that the Confederate Generals ordered the tents to be pitched again, and the detachment of Prince Eugene returned to the camp before Lifle, except some Imperial and Hessian squadrons. The Generals concluding, that the enemy had no other design than to give them frequent alarms, to retard the siege, and streighten them in their forage, without venturing an engagement, one hundred men out of each battalion were ordered to cast up an intrenchment in the front of their army, which would both secure the troops from any sudden surprize, and leave the Besiegers at liberty to carry on their attacks without interruption.

The Confederates, thus finding it impracticable to bring the enemy to a battle, thought fit to storm the counterescarp of Lifle, which had been delayed by these movements; and, on the 7th of September in the morning, they made the necessary dispositions for that enterprize, having received a reinforcement from the grand army of seven hundred grenadiers, and the like number of fusileers, and six hundred workmen. Eight hundred grenadiers, supported by the like number of fusileers, thirty carpenters, and two hundred workmen, were commanded for the attack of the right, between the Lower Deule and the gate St. Andrew, under the direction of the Sieur des Roques; and sixteen hundred grenadiers, supported by the like number of fusileers, thirty carpenters, and two thousand workmen, were commanded for the attack of the left, between the river and the gate of St. Magdalen, under the direction of the Sieur du Mey. The batteries of the Confederates made a continual fire before the attack on all the battions to disturb the enemy; and after the signal of three guns, and a general discharge of all the artillery, the attack was made with so much order and courage on the part of the Officers and Soldiers, that the counterescarp was taken in a short time, notwithstanding it was defended by two hundred men of each regiment in the garrison; and the Besiegers lodged themselves in the covered way. But the enemy made such a terrible fire from their out-works with their cannon, mortars, and small arms, and sprung three mines in the covered way, that there were no less than one thousand men wounded and slain.

The Confederates, having made themselves masters of the counterescarp, endeavoured to perfect their works with all possible application. In the night, between the 9th and 10th, the enemy made a sally, but were repulsed with considerable loss. On the 11th, the Imperialists relieved the trenches, and an Adjutant came from the grand army, to acquaint Prince Eugene, that the French were advanced within sight of the intrenchments, and seemed to have a design to attack them: Whereupon the Prince marched with fifteen battalions, and the cavalry, to reinforce the Duke of Marlbrough. The Duke being at dinner, received advice, 1708. that the French foragers were advanced within a quarter of a league of the Confederate camp, and were sustained by several regiments. Lieutenant-General Wood, who happened to be at table, desir'd his permission, that he might charge them with two battalions only: The Duke granted his request; and having detached the regiment of Sir Richard Temple, and another English battalion for that enterprize, they fell upon the enemy, whom they repulsed as far as Ennevelin, where they had posted some forces in a castle, which was surrounded with ditches. The English endeavoured to dislodge them from thence, and charged the French with great bravery. But the Duke of Vendosme caused all his grenadiers, and the piquet of six brigades, which were incamped in the front of his army near Pont-a-Marque, to support his troops in the castle. Whereupon the two battalions were obliged to retire, after a very stout resistance, and retreated in good order, with the loss of about six or seven Officers, and near two hundred men killed or wounded. The next morning the French troops began to be in motion, and about two in the afternoon the Allies saw the head of their army, consisting of several battalions and squadrons, with their workmen, who levelled the ground between them and the Allies in trenches. The Confederate Generals now thought the enemy were resolved upon an attack, so that the troops were immediately ordered to their arms, and the regiments commanded to their respective posts, behind the intrenchments. Prince Eugene likewise joined the army; and, at the same time, orders were sent to the Earl of Albermarle (who was then between Oudenard and Mennin with thirty squadrons, to guard a convoy from Brussels) to return to the camp with the utmost expedition; and, accordingly the Earl, on the 12th, by break of day, arrived with his detachment. About four in the afternoon, the enemy began to cannonade the Confederate camp, directing their fire chiefly against the village of Entiers (where the Brigadiers Evans and Wertmuller were posted with two Brigades of foot) and were answered by the artillery, planted on the intrenchments, which continued till it was dark. The Confederate troops, which lay upon their arms all night, were the next day formed in order of battle, and early in the morning the enemy renewed their cannonading with between thirty and forty pieces, most twenty-four pounders, and the Allies did the like with almost equal execution on both sides. At length the enemy withdrew their heavy cannon; and the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene perceiving, that they had no other design than by frequent alarms to delay the storming the out-works of Lisle, the troops were ordered to encamp in such a manner, as to be immediately ready to receive the French, provided they should make any farther attempts, and the works about the village of Entiers were repaired, and enlarged for the greater security of that post. Prince Eugene being satisfied, that the Confederate camp was sufficiently secured, he returned, on the 13th of September, with his troops to the siege.

In the mean while, the French Generals were contriving means to distress the Confederate army in such a manner, as to oblige Prince Eugene to raise the siege; and, in order to this, they at last found an opportunity of engaging some of the inhabitants at Aeth in a conspiracy to deliver up that town; while, on the other hand, they were indefatigable in concerting measures for cutting off the convoys, of which the camp before Lisle stood in need. The former scheme failed; for, before the conspiracy at Aeth was ripe for execution, it was discovered. But, in the latter part of their design, they succeeded; for, after various motions of both armies, they began to throw up lines for securing the passes of the Scheld, and worked at them so hard, that they appeared rather like the fortifications of a town, than intrenchments thrown up in haste, notwithstanding they were seventy miles in length. On these they laid cannon, and posted the greatest part of their army upon them, so that they did effectually stop all communication by the Scheld. Upon which, the States ordered all that was necessary, both for the army and for the siege, to be sent to Ossend: And if the French had begun their designs, with the intercepting this way of conveyance, the siege must have been raised, for want of ammunition to carry it on.

The Duke of Burgundy was very uneasy for want of intelligence from Lisle; which put Dubois, a Captain in his army, on one of the boldest enterprizes, which perhaps was ever undertaken by a single man: He determined to attempt getting into the City, notwithstanding the strict guards kept by the Besiegers. He undressed himself, and, having hid his clothes, swam over seven canals and ditches, and so got into the town. Marshal Boufflers having provided him with clothes, conducted him to both the attacks, shewed him the condition all things were in, and, having written a letter to the Duke of Burgundy, he rolled it up in wax, which the Captain put in his mouth. He then returned the same way he came, with the intelligence the Duke of Burgundy wanted; by which it was said, Marshal Boufflers acquainted him, that, if one of the Allies convoys could be intercepted, the siege would be raised; and that he would undertake the place should hold out till the 6th or 10th of October.

On the 12th of September, about nine in the morning, the Besieged came out of the town in great numbers, with four colours, and attacked the trenches on the left in six different places, having, at the same time, another body of troops in the covered way, ready to sustain them. But before they could do any other damage than the overturning a few gabions, they were engaged by the next battalions in the trenches, and obliged to retreat in great disorder, having had above sixty men killed, and among them several Officers; and, of the Confederates, fourteen men were killed, and near thirty wounded. Lieutenant-General Arnam continued that night in the trenches, which were relieved the night between the 13th and 14th by the Prince of Holstein-Beck; but the works were not advanced very much, because the troops, which had joined the grand army with Prince Eugene, were not returned to their respective posts. However, they arrived the 14th, a little before break of day. The same night the trenches were relieved by Lieutenant-General Spaar, with ten battalions, as usual; and the Besiegers began to work upon some mines, in order to fill up the ditch of the renaille, and they placed a great many gabions on the pali-

1708. sadoes. On the 15th, Prince Eugene thought fit to alter the former dispositions for relieving the trenches, and ordered, that all the Lieutenant-Generals of his army should roll according to their turns: That one of them should mount the trenches every day with a Major-General: That the former should take his post at the attack on the left, and the latter on the right: And that twelve battalions, instead of ten, should mount the trenches, five Imperialists, Palatines, and Hessians, and seven detached from the troops of the Prince of Nassau. Accordingly, on the 17th in the evening, Lieutenant-General Wilks relieved the trenches with twelve battalions; and, the same night, Director du Mey attacked, with fifty grenadiers, and the like number of fusileers, a traverse in the covered way, from which he beat the enemy with considerable loss. From the 17th to the 20th, the Besiegers made their advances with all possible diligence. The assault was intended to be made on the 20th in the evening; but, the enemy having burnt the galleries and bridges, which were to be made use of therein, it was for this reason put off to the 21st in the evening. About half an hour after fix, the trenches were relieved by Lieutenant-General Wilks, Major-General Saiken, and Sir Richard Temple, with the usual number of battalions, the signal being given by a general discharge from the batteries, and the mines on the right and left sprung with good success. The grenadiers marched out with great intrepidity, mounted the breach of the tenaille on the right, obliged the enemy to retire into the retrenchment of that work, and made there a good lodgment. On the left, they had still greater success, for they possessed themselves of a place of arms on the counterscarp of the tenaille, and drove the enemy out of the counterscarp before the grand breach, so that here they made two lodgments; but, on a sudden, the enemy came down in such numbers, that the Officer, who commanded this party of the Allies with a considerable number of his men, were presently killed, the lodgments ruined, and the rest of the grenadiers obliged to retire. Prince Eugene seeing this, and believing, that his presence would re-animate the grenadiers, came out of the trenches, and, as the French accounts say, rallied them thrice, advancing at their head, till he received a wound by a musket-shot, which, grazing over his left eye, beat off his hat. The Prince of Hesse-Cassel, who was near him, took his own hat, which was likewise shot through, and put it upon Prince Eugene's head, who was prevailed on to retire, in order to have his wound dressed. This action cost the Allies near a thousand men, to supply which, the Duke of Marlborough sent, the next day, a reinforcement of four hundred British and Prussian grenadiers from his army to the siege. The same morning the Duke and King Augustus went to make Prince Eugene a visit, and finding him ready to mount on horseback, they prevailed on him to continue a few days in his chamber, till he was perfectly recovered; during which time the Duke sustained the weight of the command, both of the siege and his own army; for he immediately went into the trenches, visited the works, and performed all that Prince Eugene would have done, had he not been prevented by his wounds.

On the 22d Major-General Cadogan set out for Offend to view a considerable number of troops, which were landed there from England, under the command of Lieutenant-General Erle, and to concert the necessary measures for securing a great convoy they expected from Offend. These troops had been embarked on board the fleet for some time, made a feint of landing in Boulogne-bay, and afterwards alarmed the French coast of Normandy, to the great terror and expence of the inhabitants; and, at length returning to their own coast, the Duke of Marlborough desired they might be landed at Offend; and they proved a very seasonable reinforcement to the grand army in that critical conjuncture. The same day the four hundred grenadiers, who were detached from the Duke's army, and five and fifty fusileers, were to post themselves that evening in the tenaille on the left; but the grenadiers arriving too late, the attack was deferred till the next day; so that, on the 23d, all things being in readiness, the Duke of Marlborough, who was in the trenches, caused a signal to be given for the storm to begin, which was carried on with all imaginable success. The troops drove the enemy quite from the tenaille on the left (that on the right being taken the 21st at night) and made a great lodgment along the covered way, without any considerable loss, except some Engineers and Officers, who were wounded. It was observed on this occasion, that the enemy did not defend these posts with the same vigour, which they had formerly exerted; from whence it was conjectured, that either the garrison had been much weakened in the hot disputes, which they had sustained, or began to want ammunition, which afterwards proved very apparent. For, the siege having been protracted to an unusual length, and the garrison having sustained several assaults, and made all the while prodigious fire, Marshal Boufflers found means to acquaint the Duke of Vendosme, that he had scarce ammunition sufficient for four Days; which pressing necessity obliged the enemy to venture upon a bold attempt of supplying the place. In order to that, the Duke of Vendosme detached the Chevalier de Luxemburg, and under him Monsieur de Tournefort, with a body of horse and dragoons to endeavour to supply the Besieged, each man having a bag of forty pound weight of powder behind him. They advanced the 28th at night, along the causey from Dorway to Lisfe, and were met by an out-guard of one hundred horse, commanded by Count Schlick, who had been incamped at Pont-a-Tressin with thirty squadrons. This out-guard challenged them, and they declared that they belonged to the Allies grand army, and were conducting some prisoners to the camp. But a subaltern Officer, having a mistrust, advanced to examine them, who, thinking it impossible to conceal themselves any longer, rode full gallop along the causey, and got into the line of circumvallation. The guard and centinels having fired at them, the camp in general took the alarm, and several Palatine dragoons, getting on horseback with the utmost expedition, fell upon the enemy, and got into the barrier of the town, which the Besieged were at first cautious of opening; and left their men for some time exposed, by which means a great many were killed, and several returned back into the Confederate camp, and endeavoured to save themselves by favour of the night.

1709. night. The infantry made several discharges at them, and the powder they had in their bags taking fire did great mischief. Those, who made their escape, threw away their powder, which was set on fire by their horses striking against the pavement. The Allies took seven officers and about forty prisoners; but what numbers were killed and blown up, could not easily be known (1).

Whilst these things were transacting before Lisle, the Duke of Marlborough, who, on the 25th of September, returned to the camp at Lanoy, was employed in making detachments, and taking other measures for securing a great convey of ammunition, that was expected from Ostend. The Duke had ordered six battalions, and eight hundred horse under Brigadier Lanfsberg, ten squadrons under Brigadier Starkerberg, and six battalions under General Els, to guard the convey. But having received advice, that the English troops under Lieutenant-General Erle had advanced to Leffingen, on the canal between Bruges and Newport, and that the Count de la Motte had been reinforced with several Brigades from the French army to intercept him, he concluded, that the detachment, he had ordered, would not be sufficient to oppose the enemy. And therefore Major-General Webb, and Brigadier Count Nassau-Woudenburg, son to the Veldt-Marshal d' Auverquerque, marched the 26th, by break of day, with twelve battalions more, to join the detachment on the road between Mennin and Ostend, and were ordered to advance as far as Ichtegem, in the country called le Franc de Bruges, about four leagues from Leffingen. Major-General Cadogan marched in the mean time, with a detachment of horse and foot, to meet the convey upon their passing the canal of Bruges. Notwithstanding it was impossible to take other precautions for securing that convey, than those which were taken, yet the Confederates were under great uneasiness for it, upon advice, that the body of troops, which the enemy had about Brussels, were marched by Ninove to Ghent, to join the Count de la Motte; and that the intercepting of that convey was judged so important, that the Duke of Berwick was gone to Bruges to command the army assembled there. The French having concerted all the necessary measures for disturbing the Allies, and depriving them of any supplies, the Count de la Motte marched from Ghent with about twenty-two thousand men, and came up with six thousand of the Confederate troops, that were ordered to guard the convey; which occasioned one of the most glorious and remarkable actions recorded in history; of which there cannot be a better relation, than what was presented by Major-General Webb to the Queen, on the 6th of October, and afterwards published by authority, in the following manner (2):

After that the detachments, which were sent to cover the march of the waggons from Ostend to the siege of Lisle, had joined at Turout the 27th of September, General Webb, who, as eldest Major-General, commanded in chief, received advice, that Major Savery of the regiment of Geithem had possessed himself of the post at Oudenburgh; whereupon he sent six hundred grenadiers, under the command of Colonel Preslon; a battalion of Orkney's, under the command of Colonel Hamilton, with that of Fine, commanded by Colonel Voogt; the whole under the direction of Brigadier Landberg, to reinforce that post. The 28th, at eight in the morning, all the horse (under the command of Major-General Cadogan) were ordered to Hogledede, to wait the arrival of the convey there, except a hundred

(1) The Hereditary Prince of Hesst-Cassel gave the following account of this affair to the States-General.

Hesst and Major Lord,

Yesterday towards the evening we heard a great blow, which we supposed to be a mine: Half an hour after another crack was heard, and at midnight such a blast, that the ground shook with it. This alarmed the whole army. I went to the right, from whence the noise came (having first given order to all the cavalry under my command to saddle and mount) and found that a great detachment of the enemy, coming from Doway, had endeavoured to break through at the aperture of the line of circumvallation, on the highway between Doway and Lisle, where the Palatinate horse are incamped. Part of them having passed, and our men putting themselves in a posture to oppose them, the bags of powder, which most of the French horse and dragoons had behind them, of about fifty pound weight each, took fire, which made a terrible noise. The foremost of them upon this accident rode full gallop towards the town. Nevertheless, before they could reach it, the same disaster befel them a second time, just as they came up to the barrier, which might in all probability be occasioned by the horses shoes striking upon the pavement, or by the sparks of the first fire, that fell upon their men, who were not aware of it. It is said, that at least an hundred men perished in this manner near the gate; and it is likely, this is the last noise we heard. Between fifty and sixty troopers were killed upon the place, where they passed the line; and it was a dreadful spectacle to see the way strewn with dead carcasses, horses, heads, arms, and legs half burnt. The others, who were behind, retired as fast as they could. I caused them to be pursued, but it was impossible to overtake them. They found, however, upon the road, for two leagues beyond the camp, sacks of powder, swords, pistols, and loose powder, which shews the precipitation, with which they made their retreat. Our Hessian Hussars set fire to a great many sacks, which they found in the road, as they returned from the pursuit. We reckon, that about three hundred men got into the town, but carried too little powder with them, to balance their loss. On the other hand, it is plain, that ammunition, which is so necessary, for their defence, begins to fall short in the place.

Your High Mightiness will, no doubt, have had direct advice of the advantage, which the troops, lately arrived from England sustained by those General Cadogan carried with him from the army, have obtained near the canal, that goes from Ostend to Newport, over the Duke of Berwick's troops, that attacked them. The great convey is arrived at Mennin. I congratulate your High Mightiness upon both these accounts, and am, &c.

1708. hundred and fifty horse, which were sent the night before, under the command of Count Lottum, to Oudenburg, with orders to the two battalions and six hundred grenadiers, to guard the convoy to Cocklaer, and afterwards to rejoin the foot at Turout. About noon, Count Lottum returned to Turout, with advice, that, in his way to Ichtegem, he met with an advanced guard of the enemy, which he pushed into the plain, where he observed sixteen squadrons mounting in great haste, on the alarm which their advanced guard gave them : Whereupon he thought it necessary to return in all haste, to give the General an account of it. On this advice all the foot, consisting of twenty-two battalions, Count Lottum, with his hundred and fifty horse, making the advanced guard, with the Quarter-Masters and Grenadiers, that were not detached, were ordered to march immediately, to gain the village of Ichtegem, by the way of Wynendale (1). As soon as the advanced guard got to Wynendale, they perceived the enemy in the opening of the plain ; whereupon the Quarter-Masters and Grenadiers were drawn up in order of battle. Major-General Webb and Count Nassau-Woudenburg, at the head of the hundred and fifty horse, advanced to reconnoitre the enemy, giving orders at the same time to the foot to advance, and form themselves as fast as possible in the plain. The horse were left at the opening of the plain, under the command of Count Lottum, to amuse the enemy, and, to embarrass them the more, the Quarter-masters and Grenadiers were posted in a low coppice on that side of the plain, where the enemy were expected to pass. As soon as our troops passed out of the defile into the plain, Major-General Webb drew them up in order of battle, posting them in the opening, between the wood of Wynendale and the coppice, on the other side, where the Quarter-masters and Grenadiers were posted. We had scarce got six battalions into the opening, when the enemy began to cannonade us with forty pieces of cannon, whereof ten were of three bores. But, notwithstanding the great fire of the enemy, the hundred and fifty horse kept their ground ; which produced the desired effect, in giving the General time to form his foot in two lines. The left wing was extended beyond the low coppice, as well to prevent the enemy from passing that way, as to cover our flank. On our right wing was posted, in the wood of Wynendale, the regiment of Hukelom ; and on our flank on the left, the regiment of the hereditary Prince of Prussia, commanded by Colonel Rbador, with orders not to discover themselves, nor fire, till they could take the enemy in flank. Some platoons of grenadiers were advanced forty paces upon the right and left, with the same orders ; and the Quarter-masters were also posted in a road on the left, that crossed through the fore-mentioned low coppice. The enemy, after three hours cannonading, advanced towards us on the plain in twelve lines, whereof six were foot, and six horse. Whereupon Count Lottum was ordered to retire, and post himself three hundred paces behind the foot, which he did in very good order. The French continued to march straight up to us with forty battalions and sixty squadrons. But, the General perceiving they extended themselves to their right in the coppice, he sent Count Nassau to observe their motion, who immediately ordered thither the regiment of Grumkau, commanded by Colonel Befchefer : And Brigadier Eltz, being come up with the last regiment, was posted on the right in the wood of Wynendale : About half a quarter of an hour before the engagement began, Brigadier Landberg, with the two battalions and six hundred grenadiers, that had been detached, having advice, that the enemy advanced to attack us, rejoined us just time enough to form a third line. Some minutes after the enemy began the attack, marching within a hundred and fifty paces of our flank on the right, where the battalions, who hid themselves, according to the General's orders, and who were not to fire till the French flank came opposite to them, gave them such a warm fire, that their left wing gave into the center ; and the regiment of the hereditary Prince, who was posted on the flank on our left, much about the same distance, did not miss the opportunity of their disorder, to give them a vigorous discharge, which put their whole line in confusion. Nevertheless, the enemy pushed on, and put two of our battalions into disorder. But the Swiss regiment of Albemarle, under the command of Colonel Hirtzell, advancing upon their horse, that were endeavouring to penetrate, engaged them long enough to give time to the General and Count Nassau, to bring up the regiments of Benldorf, Gauvain, and Lindeboom, to supply the room of those that were pressed ; which was done in a moment. However, the enemy, supported by so many lines, made another attempt to penetrate ; but our battalion rather advanced than gave way, though the General gave orders against advancing, fearing, lest that might render the fire of our flanks useless. This precaution had all the desired success ; the regiments and grenadiers making such a continual fire, as forced their two wings upon their center, and obliged the whole to retire in the greatest confusion, notwithstanding all the efforts their Officers could make by encouragement or violence, to keep them up ; so that they only fired at a great distance on our lines, which ours returned, advancing by platoons, as at their exercise, with all the order imaginable. Major-General Cadogan, who came up some time after the action began, offered to charge the enemy in their disorder with two squadrons of horse ; the other four, which he had sent for, not being arrived till near seven at night. But it was not thought advisable to expose so small a number to charge the enemy, who had brought up all their horse to favour their retreat. The battle lasted two hours, and was very hot, in which we had nine hundred and twelve officers and soldiers killed and wounded. But the enemy, (as we were assured by letters from Ghent and Bruges, and by report of prisoners and deserters) lost between six and seven thousand men. They made their retreat in so great confusion, that they left most of their cannon

We remained on the field of battle till two o'clock the next morning, having first carried off all our wounded, and several of the enemy. This victory is the more surprising, that, by reason of several detachments, we had not above six thousand in the action; whereas the enemy, by their own accounts, had no less than twenty-four thousand men.

The Count de la Motte, being obliged to retire, gave the convoy an opportunity to arrive the same night unmolested at Rouffelaer, and the next day at Mons: And, as this great action was chiefly owing to General Webb's conduct and military abilities, so that eminent service was deservedly acknowledged, both by the unanimous thanks of the Commons of Great-Britain, and, in a particular manner, by the King of Prussia who conferred on that General the noble Order of Generalfrey (1).

On the 30th of September, Prince Eugene being recovered of his wound, visited the trenches, to the inexpressible joy of the Confederate troops. The next day the trenches were relieved by the Prince of Holstein-Beck, Major-General Sacken, and Sir Richard Temple, with five battalions on the right, and seven on the left; and that evening they attacked and made a lodgment on the counterescarp, before the great breach on the right, the enemy retiring behind the traverses on the left. On the 3d a disposition was made for attacking the ravelin on the right, and three hundred grenadiers were detached from the Duke of Marlbrough's army to join the troops for that service. The attack began about noon, and succeeded so well, that by half an hour after one they made a lodgment on the ravelin, and forced the enemy behind the traverses to leap into the water, where most of them were killed or drowned; so that the Besiegers were now masters of both the counter-guards and the ravelin. On the 7th the Besiegers continued to finish the batteries on the counterescarp, to ruin the batteries of the enemy on the courtine, and beat down the bridge of communication, which they had from a place of arms to the ravelin. They carried on two mines on the left attack towards the salient angle of the counterescarp, over-against the breach, and the miners discovered two mines of the enemy, from which they took out the powder. On the 8th in the evening, the enemy sallied out, and overturned several gabions about our places of arms at the left attack; and the next day was partly spent about repairing the works, and setting up the gabions again, which the enemy had overturned the night before. On the 12th the Besiegers continued to enlarge the place of arms for the general assault, and finished two descents into the ditch on the right.

But on the left the enemy returned behind two traverses of the covered way behind the courtine, which hindered the advancement of the work on that side. On the 13th the Besiegers sprung a mine under the place of arms, which blew up several of the enemy's men; and, in the evening thirty grenadiers attacked the enemy behind the two traverses on the left, and overlet the boat, by which they would have retired; so that, of a Lieutenant, a Sergeant, and twenty men, three only were made prisoners, the rest being either killed or drowned. The 15th the Besiegers sprung four mines in the place of arms on the right, where the enemy had cast up an intrenchment; enlarged the places of arms for the general assault; and on the left made some progress in the lodgment in the covered way. The 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th, the Besiegers made all the necessary preparations for a general storm, by continuing to drain the ditch, making apertures in the walls, working on the galleries, filling up the ditch, perfecting their lodgments and places of arms, and finishing their batteries, which consisted of forty-five pieces of cannon and fifty-five mortars; to supply which a new convoy of twenty thousand weight of powder, with a great number of bombs, cannon-balls, and hand-grenado's, arrived at the siege from Ostend.

The Duke of Vendosme, exasperated at Count de la Motte's shameful defeat at Wynendale, marched in person to Oudenburg with the best part of the French army, and ordered the dykes between Bruges and Neuport to be cut in several places, in order to lay the country under water, and hinder the communication between Ostend and the Duke of Marlbrough's army. But, notwithstanding the great inundation, Major-General Cadogan, favoured by the British troops at Leffinghen, found means to carry through the water considerable quantities of ammunition and other necessaries. Hereupon the Duke of Vendosme bent his efforts against the village of Leffinghen with seven or eight thousand of his men (2). They intrenched themselves, and threw up batteries against the place, as if it had been one of the most regular fortifications in the world. On the 19th of October, the enemy fired the whole day from one of their batteries with red-hot bullets against the houses, wherein about four hundred barrels of powder were lodged; but, to prevent mischief, that ammunition was ordered to be laid under water, preserving only as much as was thought necessary for maintaining that post. On the 20th, upon advice that the Duke of Vendosme was to be that night in the trenches, it was resolved to attack the enemy on the other side of the canal; and fifty grenadiers of the Dutch regiment of Vanderbeek, commanded by Captain Moor, and the same number of the regiment of Caris, commanded by Captain Clare, the whole supported

(1) If this great convoy of eight hundred waggons had been intercepted, the siege must have been raised. For the Duke of Marlbrough had sent some ammunition from his army to carry on the siege, and he could spare no more: He began to despair of the undertaking, and so prepared his friends to look for the raising the siege, being in great apprehensions concerning this convoy, upon which the whole success of this enterprise depended.

(2) Leffinghen is an inconsiderable village in the neighbourhood of Ostend, where a body of the Confederate troops were posted, in order to keep open a communication, with the grand army of the Allies, to the Besiegers of Lisle; and from whence the Duke of Vendosme could not drive them, without attacking it in form.

1708. ported by two hundred English, were order'd for that service. Four grenadiers were sent before, who, pretending to be deserters, amused the enemy, whilst the rest of the troops came up, who, charging the French with great bravery, drove them from that post to a second intrenchment, and seized their battery, where they continued for some time. The enemy lost an hundred men in this attack, besides forty taken prisoners, among whom were a Captain and the Chevalier de Croissi Colbert, a Major-General and Engineer, who offered the soldier, that took him, two hundred pistoles and a Commission for his liberty, which he generously refused. On the Confederates side Captain Clare was killed, and Captain Moor received a mortal wound through his body with a bayonet, besides which two subalterns were wounded, and fifteen private men killed or wounded. On the 15th, early in the morning, the French attacked a Church-yard, wherein Colonel Caulfield, who commanded in Leffingben, had posted an hundred and fifty men, who made but little resistance, and retired into a redoubt near the canal. At last a great body of the enemy, consisting of fifty companies of grenadiers, supported by ten thousand foot, possessed themselves of the village, and obliged Colonel Caulfield, with the rest of his troops, to surrender themselves prisoners at discretion.

This easy conquest was not an equivalent for the great loss which the enemy sustained two days after by the surrender of the town of Lisle. For the batteries of the Besiegers, consisting of about fifty pieces of cannon and twenty-five mortars, began to fire, on the 21st of October, with so much success, that, on the 22d, the garrison beat a parley, and offered to capitulate for the town. Whereupon hostages were exchanged, and it was agreed, that Marshal Boufflers should capitulate for whatever related to the garrison, with Prince Eugene of Savoy; and that the Magistrates and Council of the town should propose their own terms for themselves and the castellary of Lisle, and agree about the same with the Field-deputies of the States-General; which was done accordingly. The 23d in the morning, the capitulation was concluded and signed, containing in substance, "That the French should that afternoon, surrender the Magdalen-Gate, and all magazines of provisions and ammunition in the town. That all their sick and wounded should either be transported to Doway, or remain in Lisle till their recovery, at their own charge. That the horse, who had entered the town since the siege, might be sent to Doway, with the wives and families of the officers and soldiers, &c. That all prisoners taken during the siege be restored on both sides: And that the troops of the Allies should not enter the town before the 25th of October; by which time the French garrison was to withdraw into the citadel." These articles being agreed on, and all things disposed for the performance of the capitulation, the cavalry, which got into the place, under the command of the Chevalier de Luxembourg, marched out the 25th for Doway, with the other persons that were allowed by the capitulation; and, at the same time, the Prince of Holstein-Beck, who was appointed to be Governor of the town, marched in with two English and thirteen other battalions, and a detachment of horse. It is difficult to determine the loss on either side, from the 13th of August, N. S. when Lisle was invested, to the 23d of October, the day on which the town surrendered. But, according to the French account, they had twelve thousand men in garrison, when the Confederates broke ground against them, besides three thousand Burgbers, who did constant duty with the regular troops; of which four thousand five hundred only retired with Marshal Boufflers into the citadel; and it is computed, that about two thousand more were sick and wounded at the time of the capitulation; so that the French lost betwixt six and seven thousand men, upon a reasonable computation, and the Allies near eight thousand.

The cessation of all acts of hostility between the town and the citadel, which was to expire the 26th, according to the articles of capitulation, was continu'd till the 29th; during which time the inhabitants, who were very much afraid that the French would not have so much regard to their houses as the Allies had, used their utmost endeavours to persuade Boufflers to capitulate. The enemy made extravagant demands of money, and pretended to march out with all their cannon; and that the Allies should set at liberty Marshal Tallard, with some other unreasonable pretensions, which the Allies rejected with scorn. These negotiations being broke off, the hostilities began at five o'clock; but during the cessation, the Besiegers had cast up intrenchments, and drawn a parallel from one end of the esplanade to the other. They had also made several coupures on the wall near the citadel, to the right and left. The hereditary Prince of Hesse-Cassel posted himself at la Bassée, and orders were given to fortify that place. The Duke of Mariborough continued at Rouffelaer, for the more easy subsistence of the Confederate troops. From thence he detached the Earl of Stair, to provide corn for the army in the districts of Furnes and Dixmuyde. That detachment had the good fortune to surprize four Companies of French grenadiers, at the bridge between Dixmuyde and Newport. On the other hand, they met with the great mortification to have four of their squadrons undergo the same fate. Those troops were all Prussians, and defended themselves for some time with great bravery; but finding, that all the avenues were closed, and that there was no possibility of forcing their way through the enemy's troops, they were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners of war.

While these matters were transacted, the brave Veldt-Marshal Averquerque departed this life on the 18th, in his quarters at Rouffelaer, in the 67th year of his age; whereby the command of the Dutch troops fell of course to the Count de Tilly, as the eldest General in the service of the States. On the 29th, about five in the afternoon, the Besieged in the citadel of Lisle began hostilities, by the discharge of five pieces of cannon, which they continued to fire the rest of the evening, without doing the Besiegers any considerable damage. On the other hand, the Allies contracted the lines of circumvallation, and erected batteries of cannon and mortars, which they were ready to fire upon the citadel by the 11th of November. The Besiegers carried on their approaches by the sap; and, the Besieged sparing their small stock of ammunition, as well as the Besiegers, the attack of that fortress 1708. fortrefs was maintained with confiderable lofs. On the 13th, the Confederates lodged themfelves by the palifadoes of the firft covered way; and the next day they made themfelves mafters of the whole counterfcarp, except two places of arms, which the enemy abandoned the 15th. The Allies erected two batteries on that work, but did not defign to play their artillery from thence, till they had lodged themfelves on the fecond counterfcarp. For which purpofe, they prepared a great quantity of fascines, continued to drain the ditch, made feveral openings into it, paffed the fame the 17th in the night, and lodged themfelves on the glacis of the fecond cover'd way, without any lofs. Four days before the Prince d'Auvergne was detached from la Baffée, to attack the fort St. Venant upon the Lys, on the frontiers of Artois, in which the enemy had pofted a hundred men, who, upon the approach of that Prince, made only one difcharge, and retired towards Aire.

While the fiege of the citadel of Lifle was carrying on with all the vigour that is confiftent with the cautious method of fapping, both out of a juft regard for the lives of valiant men, who had already gone through incredible fatigue and innumerable dangers, and for want of fufficient ftores of ammunition; the enemy thought to have taken fuch infallible meafures for diftreffing the Allies, as well by their inundations between Bruges and Newport, as by their intrenchments along the Scheld, that their public Minifters in Rome and Venice boldly asserted, "That the confederate army was fo coop'd up, that they would foon either be famifhed, or obliged to abandon Lifle." But the two great Confederate Generals being indefatigably intent upon their proper bufinefs, the Duke of Marlborough in providing corn out of the country of Artois, and the diftricts of Furnes and Dixmuyde; and Prince Eugene in managing what was lent him by the Duke of Marlborough, both armies lived in parfimonious plenty; and the fiege of the citadel was carried on with all the fuccefs, that could be expected.

The Elektor
of Bavaria's
defign upon Bruffels.

The enemy opened a new fcene; Their parties made incursions into the diftrict of Boifleduc, burning and ravaging part of the open country; and, at the fame time, the Elektor of Bavaria approached Bruffels with a body of ten thoufand men. But the Duke of Marlborough, having concerted meafures with Prince Eugene to pafs the Scheld, immediately difpatched orders for feveral British and Dutch Regiments to be tranfported from Oftend to Antwerp, and fent to Monfieur Pafchal, the Governor of Bruffels, to affure him, that he would certainly come to his relief. Upon which encouragement, the States Deputies refolv'd to ftay in Bruffels; and the vigorous meafures, they took with the Council of State and the Governor, were very instrumental in the prefervation of that important place. Nor were the States-General lefs follici-tous for Antwerp, whither they difpatched fome of their own Members, with General Frefheim, an experienc'd Officer, and ordered troops to haften thither from Nærden, Heuſden, Grave, and other places. On the 22d of November, N. S. the Elektor of Bavaria invefted Bruffels (1); and, the next day, fent a Trumpeter, with a fummons to General Pafchal to furrender, in thefe terms: "His Elektoral Highnefs knowing, that the Commandant is not in a condition to defend himfelf with the few troops he has; if he obliges his Elektoral Highnefs to begin the attack, he fhall have no capitulation for himfelf or his garrifon. Let not the Commandant flatter himfelf, that he can retire with his garrifon to Antwerp, if he delays to furrender; for he is to know, that he will foon find troops pofted to hinder his retreat." The Governor, who had nine battalions and a thoufand horfe under him, returned an answer by the fame Trumpeter: "That he was very unfortunate in not having the honour to be known to his Elektoral Highnefs; that he durft affure him, he would do all that a man of honour ought to do, and that he was fatisfied with his garrifon." The Elektor was not a little furpriz'd at this refolute answer: and, on the 26th of November, in the morning, the enemy began to fire from their batteries againft the City (but with little fuccefs) and in the evening, with their fmall fhots againft the men in the outworks, and, about nine at night, they attacked the counterfcarp with great fury, between the gates of Louvain and Namur. The fire was terrible on both fides, and lafted till five the next morning; during which time the enemy made nine attacks, and at laft lodged themfelves on the glacis of the counterfcarp. But about fix o'clock the Befieged made a fallly from the cover'd way fword in hand, with fuch fuccefs, that the enemy were driven out of their works, after a moft obftinate and bloody engagement. The action ceas'd the 27th, about ten in the morning, and the Allies expected to be attacked a fecond time at night; for their fpies unanimoſly reported, that the enemy had a defign, not only to make a general affault, but would alfo fire with red-hot bullets, to excite the Burghers to fedition; upon which the Befieged difpos'd all things as well as poffible for refifting the enemy's attacks. But in the afternoon, inftead of renewing the engagement, the Elektor of Bavaria demanded a fufpenſion of arms, in order, as he pretended, to bury the dead, and draw off the wounded; which prov'd but a ſtratagem to raife the fiege with lefs difadvantage. For upon the arrival of two Couriers from Mons, with intelligence, that the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene had paffed the Scheld, in order to relieve Bruffels; his Elektoral Highnefs ſent away his baggage, and in the night march'd off with his troops, without found of trumpet or beat of drum, and with

It was abandoned by the French immediately after the memorable battle of Ramillies, and made its ſubmiſſion to the Duke of Marlborough.

The Elektor made ſeveral furious affaults upon it during the ſiege of Lifle, but the Duke of Marlborough, paſſing the Scheld, made him precipitately quit the ſiege. 1708. with such precipitation, that the enemy left in their camp twelve pieces of cannon nailed up, two large mortars, and about twenty barrels of powder. They also left about eight hundred men wounded in the adjacent villages; and the Dragoons and Hussars, who, the next morning, went out in pursuit of the enemy, brought in a great many prisoners, and some baggage. So that it was computed, that, what with their killed, wounded, prisoners, or deserters, this unsuccessful expedition cost them above three thousand men; whereas the loss of the Allies did not amount to above five or six hundred killed or wounded.

For this brave and resolute defence of the City of Brussels, Lieutenant-General Paschal was justly advanced by King Charles III., to the dignity of a Marquis. However, it had not been possible for that General to defend himself much longer, with a garrison of scarce five thousand men, in so large and unfortified a place. The preservation of Brussels was therefore principally owing to the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, who, with incredible secrecy and expedition, passed the Scheld the 27th of November in the morning, with very little opposition; the French, in a panic fear, abandoning those lines and intrenchments, which they had been casting up for three months past. This affair was managed with so much precaution, as redounded greatly to the reputation of the Confederate Generals. For the Duke of Marlborough being early acquainted with the extremity, which the City of Brussels was in, recalled the troops, which were in the district of Furnes, commanded by Lieutenant-General Fagel, which joined the army at Rousselaer on the 22d, and also the detachment, which was at Lens and la Bassée. The same day they received advice, that the dam which the enemy had been making near Gavre, to stop the course of the Scheld, was broke and carried away by the rapidity of the stream, which very much facilitated their passing that river. The army arrived the 25th at Harlebeck, and continued there till four in the afternoon, for giving time to Prince Eugene to come up to the place appointed.

Measures concerted for passing the Scheld.
The measures were concerted thus: That Prince Eugene's army should pass the river between Eskenasse and Hauterive; the Duke of Marlborough and Count Tilly at Kerkboven; and Count Lotum, with the Earl of Orkney, between Gavre and Asperon. Major-General Cadogan, and Brigadier Evans, were sent before to lay the pontoons over the Scheld, who not only performed their orders, but passed the river, and posted themselves and their detachment on the other side, and put to flight a body of the French, which lay intrenched thereabouts. The Confederate troops were therefore ordered to march with all possible expedition, and, as they passed the river, they formed themselves in order of battle. Prince Eugene, having advice of these proceedings, passed directly over the river, and joined the Duke of Marlborough at Kerkboven. Upon their conjunction, they advanced to Berchem, in order to dislodge the enemy from that post; but Monsieur Souteron, who commanded there, retired with the utmost precipitation. The Dutch cavalry pursued them, and happened to fall in with a party of grenadiers, who had lined some hedges and ditches, in order to secure the retreat of the rest. In this action the Allies had about sixty men either killed or wounded; among the latter Brigadier Baldwin, in the service of the States, was shot through the body; and the Earl of Albemarle, Prince William of Hesse, and Count Maurice of Nassau, had their horses killed under them. The Confederates pursued the enemy till it was dark, and incamped on the hills near Oudenard, to the joy of the whole army, who expected to have met with great difficulties in passing the Scheld, and to the surprize of the Generals themselves, who could not have imagined, that the enemy would have so easily abandoned posts so advantageous by nature, and which they had fortified with so much application and labour. In the several pursuits, the Confederate troops took great part of the enemy's baggage, their bread-waggons, several colours, standards, and two or three pair of kettle-drums, and killed and made prisoners near a thousand men (1).

The Duke of Marlborough, upon his arrival at Oudenard, took the necessary measures for advancing towards Brussels, and, in his march, he was informed at Alost, that the Elector of Bavaria, upon the first notice of the passage of the Scheld, had quitted the siege with great precipitation, leaving all his artillery and wounded men behind him. The Duke came to Brussels on the 29th of November in the morning, to take proper measures for sending a supply of ammunition and stores to the siege of the citadel of Liste, and to thank the garrison of Brussels for their vigorous defence. He was received with great acclamations of joy, and complimented by the States of Brabant, and the Magistrates of the City, upon their deliverance, which they justly attributed to his conduct and expeditious march. The day before, Prince Eugene,

(1) Burnet says (Vol. II. 509.) The Duke of Marlborough, hearing the Duke of Bavaria was going to attack Brussels, made a sudden motion towards the Scheld: But, to deceive the enemy, it was given out, that he designed to march directly towards Ghent, and this was believed by his whole army, and it was probably carried to the enemy; for they seemed to have no notice nor apprehension of his design on the Scheld: He advanced towards it in the night, and marched with the foot very quick, leaving the horse to come up with the artillery: The lines were so strong, that it was expected, that, in the breaking through them, there must have been a very hot action: Some of the General Officers told me, that they reckoned it would have cost them at least ten thousand men; but to their great surprize, as soon as they passed the river, the French ran away without offering to make the least resistance; and they had drawn off their cannon the day before. Our men were very weary with the night's march, so they could not pursue; for the horse were not come up, nor did the garrison of Oudenard fall out; yet they took a thousand prisoners. Whether the notice of the feat, that the Duke of Marlborough gave out of his design on Ghent, occasioned the French drawing off their cannon, and their being so secure, that they seemed to have no apprehensions of his true designs, was not yet certainly known: But the abandoning those lines, on which they had been working for many weeks, was a surprize to all the world: Their Counsels seem'd to be weak, and the execution of them was worse; so that they, who were so long the terror, were now become the scorn of the world.

1078. gene, with his troops, and a detachment of eight battalions and thirty squadrons from the grand army, returned to Lisse, and the sixteen battalions under Count Lottum marched back to the camp. But, the same morning, Lieutenant-General Dompere, with forty squadrons, advanced towards Alost, being ordered to incamp between that place and Asbe, in order to relieve Brussels. The Duke of Marlborough, with King Augustus, and several other persons of distinction, having been entertained at dinner by General Pafkhal, and given the necessary directions, returned in the evening to his camp at Alost, where the troops rested the 30th. The day following, the Confederate army removed from thence, and incamped with the right at Oudenard, and the left near Bierlegghem. At the same time, Lieutenant-General Dedem was ordered to advance with twenty battalions, and to pass the Scheldt at Oudenard, where he incamped on the other side of the river, to assist at the works that were ordered to be made for the security of that place, and to be near at hand to join Lieutenant-General Hompesch, who, with thirty-eight squadrons and eight battalions, were maintained near Menin; by which dispositions a communication was maintained with Prince Eugene, who was at Lisse.

The siege of the citadel at Lisse was all this while carried on with great diligence; and, in the absence of Prince Eugene, the Besiegers had lodged themselves on the second counterescarp, and began, on the 1st of December, to raise batteries thereon; which being finished in six days, the Prince sent a summons to Boufflers, offering him an honourable capitulation, if he would surrender before the batteries had begun to fire; otherwise to expect no other terms, than for him and his garrison to be made prisoners of war. The Governor, whose stock of ammunition was almost exhausted, and who was informed, that the communication between Brussels and Lisse was free and open, thought fit to prevent the consequences of a breach being made in the body of the citadel, by beating a parley the 8th of December, N. S. hostages being exchanged, the articles were signed the day following; and, on the 10th, the Marshal, with the whole garrison, marched out with all the usual marks of honour, and were conducted to Dewey (1).

If the difficulties of an enterprize increase the glory of it, the taking of Lisse must be one of the most glorious actions that ever was known (2). The place itself was as strong as art could make it, on the fortifications whereof the celebrated Monsieur de Vauban had exerted his utmost skill.

(1) The Prince of Orange wrote the following letter to the States-General on this occasion:

High and Mighty Lords,

All the lodgments before the Citadel having been joined, and all things being ready to make the descents into the covered way, and to finish the batteries on the left, in order to batter in breach; the enemy beat a parley yesterday morning at seven o'clock. The hostages on both sides being exchanged, Prince Eugene went with those of the French to the Abbey of Leu; but the capitulation was not signed till this day at four in the afternoon; and I thought it my duty to send it by Major Thilo van Thilau, my Adjutant-General. I most humbly congratulate your High Mightinesses on this new conquest, which is so much the more considerable, because the enemy had been obliged to surrender in a season of the year so far advanced, and that we have not on our part fired a gun, and have lost very few men. I pray God to bless more and more the arms of your High Mightinesses, and those of your Allies; so that after a series of glorious and happy successes, there may result from thence a firm and lasting peace; and that the lustre and glory, which this State has attained to, by the particular favour of the Almighty, under the most wise Government of your High Mightinesses, may be long preferred. I am, &c.

From the camp before Lisse,
December 9, 1708.

J. W. FRISO, Prince of Orange and Nassau.

(2) Dr. Hare, in his Thanksgiving-sermon above-quoted, observes, that Lisse was looked upon by the French as impregnable, 'it being the master-piece of the ablest Engineer that Kingdom has produced; and the great King had added such beauty to its strength, as shewed, he thought no body would dare to touch a place, which he had been at so much charge to make his own; and he was justified in thinking so by an undisturbed possession of more than forty years. In truth, the very slender knowledge our best Engineers had of it is a sufficient proof, they never dreamt of seeing that glorious day, when a confederate army should be able to come against it. It was so great an enterprize in the judgment of the enemy, that they could not believe we really meant it, when it was plain we could mean nothing else: They thought it was a feint only to draw them from the posts they were intrenched in, or pretended to think so, to colour their slaying so long in them to so little purpose, or to excuse their not endeavouring to prevent our artillery from coming up. But, when it was too late to dissemble their concern, then what confusion were they in! What a noise was there, that they would and must raise the siege, cost what it will! How many Councils were there held! What furious motions did they make, or rather what not! Sometimes they threatened a powerful diversion, that they would besiege this place and that, and a third, and a fourth, and give us sufficient reasons to repent so rash an enterprize: Sometimes nothing would do, but they would fight us; and once they ventured nearer than they would have done, when we had by intrenching helped them to a decent pretence for not attacking us, and they were assured we should not attack them. But in their cooler thoughts they were content to sit down with a design to starve us; a poor design, had not the siege been drawn out into an unexpected length; and, to compas it, there was no action so mean, they did not condescend to; no faith so sacred, they did not violate. Once indeed they had the courage to try a braver part, and with a great body of troops marched to intercept a convoy, without which they knew the siege could not be carried on; but the event soon shewed, it had been better for them to have lain still, their attempt having served to nothing else, but to make another place famous by a fresh defeat of them. Wendela will be always named among the successes of this memorable year, where a small body of foot, under the command of a Member of this Honourable House, maintained themselves against near thrice their number, though supported by a good number of horse, and provided with numerous artillery; and, after a brave defence, obliged them to a scandalous retreat. Thus we have the fullest proof even from the enemy, that the right use was made of our first success, and that a more fatal blow could not have been given them; but we want not the voice of enemies or friends to witness the importance of this enterprize, by the success of which not only their frontier is broke into in the most desirable part, and a fair advance made towards penetrating into the heart of France; but, what the great Monarch

1708. skill. It was defended by a numerous garrison, under the command of a Marshal of France, and several other experienced Generals; provided with all manner of necessaries, and encouraged to a vigorous defence by the approach of a powerful army, which was as numerous, if not stronger, than the forces of the Allies. And yet the Allies, without having any communication with their own territories, ever since the Duke of Vendôme took the village of Leffinghen after a siege of eight days, reduced Lisle, found means to subsist about it till the reduction of the citadel, and got corn from the territories of the enemy. The French thought this beyond the power of man, and therefore boasted, that, without striking a blow, they would oblige the Allies to abandon the siege. And, indeed, the difficulties, which the Allies had to struggle with, were so many and so great in themselves, that the confidence of the enemy did not appear altogether unreasonable. But what would have been impracticable by the Duke of Vendôme and other French Generals, was accomplished by Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, who, after the reduction of the town and citadel of Lisle, were resolved to crown their conquests, before the end of the campaign, with the recovery of Ghent and Bruges (1).

The French Generals not imagining, that the French Confederates would have attempted any thing army separated. after the last important conquest, especially in so advanced a season of the year, separated their Ghent army, and returned to Paris. But, all necessary preparations being made for the siege of Ghent, that City was invested on the 20th of December, N. S. in the following manner: Count Lothum, with thirty-nine battalions, and thirty-six squadrons, were posted between the Upper-Scheld and the Lys: The hereditary Prince of Hesse, with forty squadrons, and twenty battalions, between the Lys and the canal of Bruges, and from thence to the canal of Sas: The Duke of Wurtemberg narch owes more to than his sword, his treasure also is extremely affected by it; it loses him a great revenue, which at this time he can very ill want; it makes a mighty interruption in traffic and commerce through his own Kingdom, and almost cuts off the greatest advantage he had by an open trade with our Allies. In short, taking Lisle is cutting a nerve in the body politic, one of the largest and most useful nerves; from whence his greatest armies received their nourishment, from whence his Flanders-forces were always paid.— Could we not have formed that siege, little had remained of our victory, but the glory of regaining by the sword what surprize and treachery had taken from us; but a siege, much less so great a one, we could not undertake without artillery; and to have artillery, while the enemy were in possession of Ghent, every body, I believe, will own they thought impossible, till he, who has a genius equal to all difficulties, shewed the way, and contrived the means; which were executed with that wonderful dexterity and diligence, that the greatest train, that perhaps was ever brought so far by land, was provided in a little time, and conducted between two armies of the enemies, without the least disturbance, safe to us. After this success, which might justly be esteemed a second victory, there seemed to be little to do, but to attend quietly four or five weeks the issue of the siege; but by setting out wrong at first, our Engineers soon came to want, what of all things was hardest to be supplied; and the slow progress, that was made afterwards, put the siege in the utmost danger of miscarriage, and the army of starving. And those unpromising appearances made not a few with the weather would give us a pretence to raise the siege we seemed unable to go through. Never sure had covering army so much work, never had Commander so great a trial of all the qualities, that go to make a consummate General. To hinder so long the junction of the enemy, to prevent their disturbing the siege, or making a diversion, to keep for ten weeks a communication with Brussels, and, when that was stopped, to open another with Ostend, and after that still to find out new resorts, and subsist a great army thrice the time that was expected, in an enemy's country, that we seemed to have eat up, even before we were perfectly confined to it; these are difficulties nothing could surmount, but a mind, that cannot be puzzled or dismay'd. But this is not all; while we were besieging, we were besieged ourselves, the enemy had hemmed us in on every side, and for ten weeks together intrenched the Scheld with all the diligence they could, resolved, it seems, we should not pass on any terms. But, when the siege they had laid to Brussels made the trial necessary, neither river, nor army, nor intrenchments availed any thing. We surprized the enemy, at a time, when they were most concerned to be upon their guard; and, what is beyond all belief, passed the river they had been so long fortifying, without the loss of one man; and by that happy passage their siege was raised before it was well begun. These are such difficulties, as greatly enhance the value of the successes we rejoice in; and serve for shades to illustrate and set off the many masterly strokes, which a curious eye cannot but discern in the beautiful plan of this great and wonderful campaign. I might add, that the length of our siege made it late in December, before we could attempt to retake the places the enemy had stolen from us, which is itself such a circumstance, as is without example in that country; but in the end, this success was also added to the rest, and the campaign was happily concluded with the year.—There is nothing the interposition of God has more visibly appeared in, than the favourable weather we were blessed with so long together; which was so necessary for us, that without it every body saw we could have done nothing; and yet so extraordinary, that the like has not been known in the memory of man; nor was there any thing the enemy trusted more to, than that the rains would overtake us; which had they done, had not the heavens been shut up in the latter season, we must inevitably have been obliged to raise our siege, though no disturbance had been given by the enemy. Had we known in December to the very end of it so much ill weather, as they commonly have three or four months before, we must have been content to let the enemy enjoy quietly their treachery, which could not but have had a very ill influence on the next campaign. To what can we impute this, but to his good providence, who opens and shuts the heavens as he will? Wonderful has his favours to us been in this respect, beyond our most forward hopes, beyond what we dared to wish for. To pass by several very remarkable instances of this kind, the passing and repassing of the Scheld, the first of which was the saving of Flanders, and the other of Brabant, both depended on great marches, that were made without the least disturbance from the weather, which might easily have defeated the success of them; though the first was soon followed with a great rain the very night of the battle, and the other was preceded by a greater, which the enemy felt all the evil of, being then on their march to invest Brussels; but this weather lasted no longer, than till we were ready to make use of better. But there was another circumstance in our repassing of the Scheld, which I cannot omit: A night march, which we were forced to make in order to it, was happily for us, by an unforeseen coincidence, directed by the full assistance of the moon.

(1) The Marquis de Feuquieres in his Memoirs gives the following account of the errors committed in the defence of Lisle. Marshal de Boufflers says he, Governor-General of French Flanders, and of Lille

Wurtemberg between Muleheim and the Lower Scheld, with twenty-five squadrons, and twenty-six battalions: Count Tilly with thirty squadrons, and thirty battalions, between the Upper and Lower Scheld: And the Duke of Marlborough incamped at Meerlebeck, that he might be near the center of the several attacks. On the 14th, in the evening, the trenches were opened at the attack commanded by General Lotum; and two thousand Workmen, covered by seven battalions, and two more in reserve, with six hundred horse, were ordered for that service, under the command of Lieutenant-General Fagel, Major-General Wecke, and the Lord North and Grey. The men worked about half an hour before the enemy discovered them, and then they made such a terrible fire, that the Allies had near thirty men killed, and about seventy wounded. They carried on their works with good success from St. Peter's gate towards fort Monterey, and finished a parallel of a thousand paces from the right to the left, within two hundred paces of the counterescarp. On the 25th at night, the trenches were opened at the Duke of Wurtemberg's attack, with four battalions and six hundred horse, commanded by Major-General Murray, who covered fourteen hundred pioneers, and this attack was directed against the castle. The same night they opened the trenches before the Brussels gate, between the Upper and Lower Scheld, with four battalions and six hundred workmen, commanded by Brigadier Evans, who carried on their works with great success, and made a communication without any loss. But, the works on the right being very difficult, and time as well as fascines being wanting to finish the same, the garrison made a sally with ten companies of grenadiers, who put the first troops into some confusion; and, whilst Brigadier Evans was bringing up the next battalions to support them, he was taken prisoner with Colonel Grave of the Lord North and Grey's regiment. They had likewise about twenty officers and soldiers killed or taken; but the enemy retired upon the first firing of the troops, and had not time to level the works. On the 26th the batteries began to fire upon the Red Fort, and the garrison, consisting of two hundred men, surrendered themselves prisoners of war. The following days the approaches were carried on with a great deal of success; and, the batteries being ready to fire, on the 30th at six in the morning, with red-hot bullets, and the mortars to throw bombs and carcasses into the town, the Count de la Motte sent out a trumpeter to the Duke of Marlborough, and demanded an honourable capitulation, which was granted him; pursuant to which, one gate of the city, and another of the castle, were delivered to the troops of the Allies on the 31st of December, N. S. and two days after Count de la Motte marched out with his garrison, which consisted of above thirty battalions and sixteen squadrons, in order to be conducted to Tournay. The Duke of Argyle, with six British battalions, immediately after took possession of the town and citadel.

The reduction of Ghent occasioned a great surprize at the French Court, and was indeed in itself very wonderful, considering the situation and largeness of the place, the numerous garrison, the hard season of the year, and the fatigue which the troops had already undergone in this extraordinary long and difficult campaign. The consequence of surrendering that important city was the enemy's quitting of Bruges, Plasendale, and Lessinghen, and retiring into their own territories. The Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, having thus gloriously finished this campaign, and settled the winter in particular, defended this place against the armies of the Allies, who besieged it. The place was strengthened with a garrison of near sixteen thousand men; and yet the Besiegers only attacked it on the side of Mogdalen-gate, before a front of fortification, that comprehended near a thousand fathoms in extent; and even this attack was separated by the Duile; and consequently the enemy approached the same front by two attacks, intersected by the river, which afforded them the only communication they had with each other. This conduct of the enemy might have induced the Besieged to think it very practicable to make sallies under the protection of the works, either on one side of the attack or the other; by which means they might have destroyed the works of several days; and yet they only made one sally, with above five hundred men, which did not produce any considerable effect.

The Besiegers, in the conduct of their works, committed a greater error, and of which the besieged neglected to take the advantage. The error was this: Their comprehension of this great front ceased in proportion as they approached the place; so that, when they advanced to the glacis, their grand front was so contracted, that it only equalled the extent of the two salient angles before the tennaille of the counterescarp; by which means the front of the attacks was more extensive than that of the assailants. As the Besiegers therefore were under no necessity of forming such a disposition, but committed this essential error in consequence of mere incapacity in the conduct of works, it seemed reasonable to chastise them for their proceeding; and yet the Besieged wanted resolution to attempt it, though they easily might have opened their glacis, under the protection of the counterescarp, and those works, that were not comprehended; and they might have made such lodgments on the glacis, as would have constantly enabled them to gaul the flanks of the Besiegers contracted front of the attack. This advantage was so much in favour of the Besieged, as the Besiegers made but one attempt to storm the counterescarp at the two salient angles before the tennaille, where they only appeared with five or six hundred men, because they could not march a greater number in the small front they had formed. Most of these men were killed in their advance upon the pallisade; and this single experiment should have convinced the Besieged, that their capital operation for the defence of the place was to make such lodgments on the glacis, as were above-mentioned, in order to multiply the fires against the attack, and to take those, who approached, in flank, and to greater advantage, than in the covered way, which was not comprehended within the Besiegers works.

Though the want of powder frequently silenced the Besiegers cannon, and consequently suspended the fire of the bombs; yet the Besieged did not improve that favourable opportunity in any reparation of the breaches during the night, or clearing away the ruins in the day, though the inhabitants of Lille were numerous and loyal, and might have been employed in this work, while the Besiegers artillery ceased to batter the breaches. The guard even of the attacked work was kept with so little vigilance, that only one sentinel was awake, and the post was surprized, while all the soldiers were asleep, after the desertion of that treacherous sentinel, so that the work was carried without

ter.

If Ghent and Bruges had not surrendered when they did, it could not have been possible to have kept them in the field much longer; for, within two or three days after, there was a great fall of snow, and that was followed by a most violent frost, which continued the longest of any in the memory of man: And, though there were short intervals of a few days of thaw, we had four returns of an extreme frost, the whole lasting about three months. Many died in several parts by the extremity of the cold; it was scarce possible to keep the soldiers alive, even in their quarters; so that they must have perished, if they had not broke up the campaign before this hard season.

in Italy.

The miscarriage before Toulon did not discourage the Duke of Savoy from meditating a new irruption into France, in return for the siege of Turin. The preparations made by his command through Piedmont during the winter and the spring, his assembling so great a body of troops on his frontiers, and preparing, not only a train of field-pieces, but a quantity also of heavy cannon, gave the French apprehensions, not only of an incursion, but of some important siege. And, according to the French Writers, the Duke never dissimbled his intentions, which were to enter Dauphine, and to extort contributions as far as Lyons. But though the bad weather could not suffer him to take the field till the month of July, yet the lateness of the campaign was soon made up by the rapidity of his conquests; which the vigilance and activity of the Marshall de Villars (whom the French used to call their Fortunate General) could neither foresee nor prevent. The Duke, the better to cover his design, had first, with great labour and fatigue, bent his March towards Savoy, over Mount Cenis, as if he intended to penetrate into Dauphine through fort des Barreaux; but, having by this feint drawn the enemy's forces on that side, he turned short towards Sezane and Oulx, prevented Villars's quick march, and took such right measures, that from the 12th to the 31st of August, N. S. he compassed his true design, which was to make himself master of the important fortresses of Exilles, fort la Perouse, and the valley of St. Martin and Fenestrella. By which conquests he secured his own dominions against France, and gained free entrance into the enemy's country, the French having built a strong citadel at Fenestrella, after the blowing up of the fortifications of Pignerol, in order to cover that frontier. The greatest difficulty in taking these places was from the impracticableness of the ground, which drew the sieges out into such a length, that the snow began to fall by the time Fenestrella was taken. By this means the Alps were cleared, and Dauphine was now open to him: And all things were ready for a greater progress in another campaign. Besides these advantages, the Duke likewise made a Divercion in favour of King Charles III., obliging the enemy to send a great detachment from Rouffillon to Villars's support and assistance.

The Queen of Great-Britain and the States-General had solicited the Imperial Court and the German Princes to act with greater vigour than they had hitherto done, and particularly pressed the Emperor to give the utmost assistance he could to his brother in Spain, and heartily concurred with King Charles in desiring, that Prince Engene might be sent thither to command in chief. But this point could not be obtained (1); and, Count Guido de Staremberg being appointed in that Prince's room, he arrived at Barcelona on the last of April, the supplies demanded by King Charles being arrived there before. Great hopes were conceived of this new General, the least opposition on the part of the Besieged. It would have been a very easy affair however to have doubled the sentinels in every place, where the negligence or infidelity of one exposed them to the Besiegers.

But the most surprising circumstance of all is, that Marshall de Boufflers capitulated for the City, almost as soon as that half-moon was lost, and without waiting ten or twelve hours, to see the besiegers fill up the ditch, which would have employed them, at least for that time, on account of its breadth, depth of water, and quantity of soft soil on its bottom. For of what particular importance could it be to Marshall de Boufflers, whether the rest of the provisions and ammunition were consumed in the defending the City some time longer, or in a new defence of the Citadel? It was, however, a very essential point, to prolong the defence of the City, as much as possible, since the surrender of it to the enemy would afford excellent accommodations to an army, who greatly needed them in that advanced season, when the rains are so frequent in Flanders, that, if they had happened during the siege of that City, they would certainly have rendered that great enterprise unsuccessful.

The dispositions for the defence of Lisle were very inconsiderate. The siege from the beginning was rendered too fatiguing to the garrison, which was divided into two bodies, alternately upon duty, for the space of twenty-four hours. This time was much too long. Half of the troops were posted in out-works, and the rest were stationed on the ramparts, and employed in the works; so that the garrison had never any fatigue. No. 58. Vol. IV.

ted hours of rest, which are so absolutely necessary for the officers as well as the soldiers, both for the preservation of their health, and to render them capable of defending the place for a greater length of time. The inhabitants of Lisle were numerous and well-affected; and yet they were not employed in any service, either for the relief of the garrison, or the preservation of the place.

It was reported, that Marshall de Boufflers wanted provisions towards the close of the siege, and could not supply the Citadel with a sufficient quantity for the garrison. This indeed is true, but the fault must be imputed to the disorder and want of oeconomy in the distribution of the provisions, which was always equal; so that no care was taken to lessen the allotments in proportion to the loss of men. A Company, that had been greatly weakened in the progress of the siege was allowed the same subsistence, as it received when it was much stronger; so that at the latter end of the siege the provisions were distributed in almost double the quantity that was necessary; and this irregularity alone would have occasioned the loss of the place, had it been accommodated never so well.

(1) This affair will be best explained by the following extracts of letters published by Mr. Cole in his Memoirs of Affairs of State:

The Earl of Manchester to the Earl of Sunderland.

General, who had before commanded the Imperial troops in Hungary; but it was generally believed, that the affairs in Spain would have had much better success, if they had been managed by Prince Eugene.

Burnet.

The Duke of Orleans still continued to command in Spain; and, according to the vanity of that Nation, it was given out, that they were to have mighty armies in many different places, and to put an end to the war there. Great rains had fallen all the winter in all parts of Spain; so that the campaign could not be opened so soon as it was first intended. The troops of Portugal, which had lain at Barcelona ever since the battle of Almanza, were brought about by a Squadron of English ships, to the defence of their own country. Sir John Leake came likewise over to Lisbon from England with recruits and other supplies, with which the Queen of Great-Britain was to furnish the Crown of Portugal. When all was landed, Leake failed into the Mediterranean to bring troops from Italy, for the strengthening of King Charles, whose affairs were in great disorder.

Soon after Staremberg's arrival in Spain, Major General Stanhope came to us (says the Author of the manuscript to often mentioned) with a Commission of Commander in chief of all her Majesty's forces in Spain, as Belcastle had orders to command the Dutch. All the troops marched out of their winter quarters to different camps, in the road to Cervera and Lerida. When Leake came with his fleet to Barcelona, King Charles sent immediately for Count Staremberg from the camp at Montblanc, to consult with the Generals Stanhope and Carpenter, and Admiral Leake, whether he could undertake any thing for the service; and, nothing being fixed, the Admiral failed for Italy, from whence he brought both the new Queen of Spain and eight thousand men with him. But, by reason of the slowness of the Court of Vienna, these forces came too late to raise the siege of Tortosa; before which place the enemy came the 30th of June. Upon the news of this, a Council of war was held, to see whether we could undertake any thing to save that town, which, on the sea-side, was the key of Catalonia from Valencia. Count Efferen, a Palatine Major-General, was sent to command in Tortosa, with a good garrison. The trenches were opened on the 9th of June, and, in about a month's time, the Governor, having no reason to expect any relief, surrendered upon honourable terms, and marched his garrison to our camp at Constantino, in the Campo de Terragona. During the siege, Leake dissipated a fleet of Tartans, sent from France to supply the Duke of Orleans's army, and took about fifty of them; which was a very seasonable relief to those in Barcelona, and which, it was hoped, though in vain, would have caused the siege to be raised.

From Constantino the army marched for Cervera with a good train of artillery, where they were joined by all the forces from Italy, and by some Dutch and Spanish battalions from Lam-paerdan. Besides Tortosa, the enemy also took Denia, and the garrison were made prisoners of war. But these losses were abundantly made up to the Allies, by the reduction of the Kingdom of Sardinia, and of the famous Port-Mahon, with the whole Island of Minorca.

Sir John Leake having taken on board the fleet a few troops commanded by the Marquis of Alconzel, better known by his former title of Conde de Cifuentes, arrived before Cagliari (1), the capital of Sardinia, on the 12th of August, N. S. and immediately summoned the Marquis of Jamaica, the Viceroy, to submit to King Charles III. The Marquis insisted at first upon extravagant terms: But on the throwing of a few bombs into the City, the inhabitants resolved to compel him to surrender, with his garrison, at discretion; whereupon both he and the late. I had orders from Britain, to urge their sending Prince Eugene to Spain, and also a letter writ by the Queen to the Emperor, recommending the same as a matter of the greatest consequence, but to no purpose. Prince Eugene is to be at hand to defend them, in case of need, against the Turks, and to secure them from any future insults from the Swedes, who has demanded the like liberty for the Reformed to exercise their Religion in Sillesia, as by Count Wratisslaw's Convention at Alt Ransladt the Lutherans are to enjoy. Count Guido of Staremberg is declared General for Spain, without consulting Britain or Holland, whether they will put their troops under his command. I have writ my thoughts pretty freely upon these practices, and Monsieur Bruyninx has done the same. Prince Eugene has a commission to act as the Emperor's Lieutenant-General, which but for the Duke of Savoy he had had last year; the Emperor's Lieutenant-General being to command all who may serve with him. I do not know how the Elector of Hanover will relish the being commanded by Prince Eugene. I believe he will not submit to it; but they must rather let the Commission lie dormant this next summer.

I am glad, that both Houses of Parliament have taken notice of the sending Prince Eugene into Spain. If any thing will prevail with the Court of Vienna, I think that should; but I am far from thinking, that it

We can by no means succeed to make Prince Eugene go into Spain, and his Imperial Majesty alleges reasons for this, that seem to have some weight; but the Emperor designs to send thither the Count Guido of Staremberg, who is likewise a good General.

I wish with all my heart, the Court of Vienna would come to reason, in relation to the sending Prince Eugene to Spain; but that matter seems to be quite over, and Staremberg will be the man.

(1) In the Memoirs of affairs of State, published by Christian Cole, Esq; p. 545, is the following letter of Sir John Norris to the Earl of Manchester, relating to the designed expedition.

Ranelagh, with the fleet bound to Cagliari, July 26, 1708.

My Lord,

The 17th instant we arrived with the fleet and troops at Matters, where we landed the Queen of Spain, the being from thence to make her entry into Barcelona. The next day our transports got to Barcelona, where we landed the horse and foot in good condition. We lost but forty horses in the passage, and nineteen that were in a Genoese vessel, which lost company 1708. Magistrates accepted such articles, as the Admiral was pleased to grant (1). The greatest part of the Spanish garrison readily lifted themselves in King Charles's service. Besides which, near two thousand horses were found there, ready to be transported to Spain, for remounting the enemy's cavalry; part of which were disposed of to the dismounted dragoons, who were employed in this expedition. The Marquis d'Alconzel, who was constituted Vice-Roy and Captain-General of that Kingdom, having held an assembly of the Deputies of the several States, they gave assurances of their affection and fidelity to King Charles III. and, for a proof, offered to furnish thirty thousand sacks of corn for that King's service. This supply made the conquest of Sardinia the more considerable, for, in Catalonia, they were, at that time, much straitened for want of provisions.

The Conquest of Minorca. N. S.

The conquest of the Island of Minorca (2), which followed soon after, was entirely owing to Major-General Stanhope, who was the first projector, and had the principal share in the execution of the design. In the beginning of August he received a letter from the Lord-Treasurer, to acquaint him, that the Admiralty had represented to the Queen, that it was almost impracticable, and very dangerous for our fleet to winter in the Mediterranean, except some safe harbour were procured for it. Upon this, General Stanhope immediately fixed his thoughts upon the Island of Minorca, which was a very great enterprize, and required a greater number of troops, than could be spared out of our army. He took a short journey to Barcelona, to consult the proper measures with the Admiral; which done, he returns post to the camp, and acquaints Staremburg with his design, who much applauded it; but as to forces he could spare none, for we were then within four miles of the enemy, who were much superior to us, and we daily expected to be attacked. However, Staremburg consented that Stanhope should take Southwell's regiment, a battalion of Neapolitans, another of Portuguese, and a small detachment of Spaniards. All which marched immediately to Barcelona. General Stanhope follows them, on the 10th, and had the good fortune of meeting there with Brigadier Wade, just returned from London, which was a great advantage to him. The 21st, he embarks with this handful of men and a few dragoons. What was wanting in troops, was in some measure made up by a fine train of British artillery, with mules to draw it, commanded by Colonel Boreguard, with that excellent Engineer Brigadier Petit, who, in that capacity, might be said to have taken and defended Barcelona, for which services King Charles had raised him to the rank of a General Officer. Stanhope was here informed of the strength of the garrison of fort St. Philip, which would have damped the courage of any man that had not been so zealous in the undertaking. The fleet and transports sailed from Barcelona the 23d, and the men landed the 26th to the South-west of fort St. Philip, within two miles of it. As they sailed by the fort, the garrison pany with the fleet, and was taken by a cruizer of the enemy. The troops have joined the rest of the army, which all people say is in a good condition, and that there is a good agreement with the Commanders of each Nation. But from our unfortunate loss of Torifa, and the accidents of this campaign, the foot we brought does but just make up the number we have lost; and in that the enemy is much superior; but in horse we have the advantage, both in number and goodness, &c. We are under this difficulty, that the land we have there, with the island of Majorca, will not afford grain enough to feed the army and country; for which reason we are now going with the fleet, to try if we can reduce the island of Sardinia to the obedience of King Charles. The troops we have to do it with are our seamen, twelve hundred marines, and some unmounted Spanish dragoons; and, if half be true of what is represented to us, we shall succeed in the reduction of that Kingdom. We have the Conde Cifuentes with us, but he is not to meddle till the place has declared. We go directly for Cagliari, which is the seat of the Vice-King, and the capital of the country. I am, &c.

JOHN NORRIS.

(1) Sir John Norris wrote the following letter upon the taking of this City to the Earl of Manchester.

From on board the Ranelagh before
My Lord, Cagliari, Aug. 18, 1708, O. S.

This being the first opportunity of my writing to Italy, since our arrival before Cagliari, will plead my pardon, that I did not sooner tell your Lordship, that we anchored before the town the 3d instant in the afternoon, and sent a summons to the Vice-King, to render the Town and Kingdom of Sardinia to the obedience of King Charles, with a letter to the Burghers, to assure them of their effects and ancient privileges, in case they made their obedience. The Officer sent had leave to wait four hours for an answer, if required; at which time, being night, he return'd with an answer from the Vice-King, that it was so late, that he could not that night get all the Government together, but would do it the next morning, and send their answers. We judged it best to keep on the fright, and cause no delay, and that instant began bombarding, and hove that night an hundred and twenty shells into the town, and landed our men at the point of day; and, as soon as it was light, the Vice-King sent off a flag of truce, to desire to capitulate; after which the mob took possession of the gates, and delivered them up to us. Thus we have got a City much stronger than Barcelona, and that has eighty-seven brass cannon mounted, and the whole island, without the loss of a man. In our capitulation we obliged them to furnish Catalonia immediately with fourteen hundred tons of corn, and to-morrow it will sail for Catalonia, it being embarked in our transports.

Last night we received letters from the King of Spain and Mr. Stanhope, and news, that the King had appointed fifteen hundred soldiers under Mr. Stanhope, to go to reduce the island of Majorca and the fortrels of Port-Mahon. He desires our assistance in the same; on which we this morning agreed to go to that service, and to-morrow we sail for that island; and, though the French have a garrison there, yet, if the weather proves good, I believe we may say we shall carry it. This will suit us in visiting the Pope, as we intended, for helping the Pretender, till another season. But after this service our winter-ships will go to Naples, to convoy to Catalonia the troops the King expects from thence, and the rest of our ships will be obliged to go home to rest for the next year, &c. I am, &c.

JOHN NORRIS.

(2) Minorca (so called from being less than Majorca, another island about six leagues from it) lies in the Mediterranean. Its greatest length is forty-five, and greatest rifon was not a little intimidated, to see a fleet with two flags (Leake and Whitaker) and so many transports, expecting no less than an army of ten or twelve thousand men; and, indeed, it had the appearance of it. With the four battalions were landed about seven hundred and sixty marines, commanded by Colonel Lee, which made up the whole number, Officers included, three thousand two hundred and sixty four (1). This little army marched to a rising ground over-against the fort, having made as great a show as possible in their march; for it was all in sight of the enemy, whose alarms were much increased by it; and still more, when they saw our troops drawn up in a long line where they could be seen, but the best perspective glass could not discover whether there was a second or third line. From hence they went that evening to a camp marked out by the Engineer, within less than two miles of the fort. The garrison consisted of a thousand Spaniards, and six hundred French marines, under the command of Colonel la Jonquiere, an old Officer, who was sent there by way of punishment, for not behaving so well as was expected from him against the Cevennois. The Inhabitants of Minorca were very much for us, being weary of the yoke of their King, who had taken all their privileges from them, as he had done from his subjects of the Kingdom of Aragon, from whence they had been transplanted to this Island.

Batteries were erected the next day, and the morning after they began to fire against two of the four towers, which are built at proper distances like little bastions, in a wall of stones without cement, that covers the fort a quarter of a mile from it, and that from sea to sea. These towers were soon battered down by our cannon. They had four pieces of cannon in each, with room enough for cannoners, and ammunition. General Stanhope, who wanted to induce the garrison to a speedy surrender, ordered a great many papers to be writ in Spanish and French, in which he promised very honourable terms to the Besieged, if they did not put him to the trouble of raising batteries; but, if they refused, he threatened that all the Spaniards should be sent to the mines, and the French be worse used. These papers were tied round arrows, which were shot in great numbers into the Suburbs of the fort, and into the vacancy between the fort and the stone-wall, where small parties were placed to observe us. It was by a shot from one of these parties that Mr. Philip Stanhope, brother to the General, Captain of the Milford galley, a young Gentleman of great hopes, was killed, the ball fixing in his forehead, as he was held up by two of his sailors to look over the wall, which was nine feet high.

The arrows had a good effect, especially upon the Spaniards, who dreaded the mines. After the towers were beat down, the cannon continued to fire upon the wall, and, in a short time, levelled it to the ground. Through the breach General Wade marched to a redoubt, at the head of all the grenadiers and some marines, with so much intrepidity, even within reach of the enemy's fire, that it struck the garrison (as one of the Officers afterwards told our Author) with admiration and terror, inso-much that the soldiers could not be brought to fire at them, though commanded, and the cannon could not reach them, the ground being too low where they marched. Wade took the redoubt, left some men in it, and returned to the camp unattacked.

The next day their panic increased; a battery of large cannon was fixed against fort St. Philip, and the first ball was ordered to be so fired, as to fall in the ditch; which it did, and was immediately taken up and carried to the Governor. A Council of war was instantly held, wherein it was resolved, by a small majority, to beat a parley. Hostages were quickly exchanged, and Wade was sent to agree on a capitulation. When he came to the Governor's house, he found the large hall on the table, which most of the Officers had been wondering at. They were not many hours in agreeing upon the following terms: The garrison was to march out the next day with all marks of honour, and to be shipped off immediately; the Spaniards to be transplanted to a harbour in Murcia, and the French to Marseilles or Toulon: The magazines to be given up, their arms to be left in the Court of the fort, and the outward gate to be delivered into our hands that evening, as soon as the capitulation was signed; which was done in a short time, and a guard was ordered to the gate. Wade returned to the General in the camp, and both were extremely well pleased with this success.

On the morrow Wade went with all the forces to see the garrison evacuate the fort; and he had not men enough to form the two lines through which the garrison was to march to the sea-side, except they were placed at an unusual distance. The enemy then saw their mistake, as well as before, when they were coming up from the camp, but it was too late. All the boats of the fleet which were come into the harbour the night before, when the capitulation was signed, were ordered to attend to carry the garrison into the transports. When the French were got into three vessels, a Field-officer was sent to let them know, that General Stanhope made them prisoners of war by way of reprisals for the garrison of Denia, which, after a brave defence, were, contrary to the capitulation, made prisoners of war by Count d'Asfeld.

Fort St. Philip being in our hands, the whole Island gladly submitted, except Port-Fornelli. On the 17th of August, Sir John Leake, with the Dutch, sailing for England, Whitaker, Rear-Admiral of the Red, was left with his Squadron before Port-Mahon, who, with a few men of war failing to Port-Fornelli, and meeting little resistance, brought away the garrison, consisting of about two hundred men, prisoners of war. Thus the conquest of the whole Island, with the loss only of forty men killed or wounded, was finished in less than three weeks, to the great admiration of all Europe. The Besiegers found in the forts about a hundred pieces of cannon, three thousand barrels of powder, and all things necessary for a good defence. The Spaniards were all carried to Murcia, except the inhabitants of the Suburbs, who had liberty to return to their houses. As soon as they landed, the Governor threw himself out of a window and died. The French marines were sent to France, except a Captain, who refused to sign the capitulation, and two Lieutenants, who were left to take care of the prisoners, that were detained on account of the affair of Denia. When they arrived at Toulon, Lajonquiere was confined for life, and all the Captains received marks of their Master's displeasure. But the Captain, who stood out against the capitulation, was promised a reward. General Stanhope appointed Brigadier Petit, Governor of fort St. Philip, and Deputy-Governor of the whole Island. By this conquest our fleet had got a safe Port to lie in and refit, and to retire to on all occasions; for till then we had no place nearer than Lisbon (1).

Besides the conquest of Minorca by the Allies, and the taking of Tortosa by the Duke of Orleans, nothing considerable was undertaken during the campaign, though the armies were incamped some months within a few miles of one another. But the enemies would not venture to attack us, notwithstanding their superiority; and Masfal Staremborg, who was reckoned the best General of the age for the defensive, was contented to preserve what we had left in Catalonia. Our army went into winter-quarters the last of October; and, about the middle of November, the Generals Staremborg and Stanhope formed the design of surprising Tortosa, which was executed with the greatest secrecy, but not with the expected success. A detachment chiefly of grenadiers went, the 22d at night, to scale the town, but, by the ignorance or treachery of the guides, the first ladders were set up over against the main-guard, and close to it: So that the whole garrison was immediately alarmed, and marched to Barcelona gate, where the grenadiers were endeavouring to get the bastion that covered it, who were so warmly attacked, that they were forced to retire, leaving many men killed, and most of the rest wounded. This put an end to the design, and to all the operations of the campaign (2).

(1) The Earl of Sunderland wrote the following letter to General Stanhope upon the reduction of Minorca:

Whitehall, October 20, 1708.

I received on Monday the favour of yours of the 30th of September, N. S. by Captain Moyer, with the welcome news of your having taken Port-Mahon; which, though it came at the same time as the news of taking of Lisbon, yet was not at all lessened by it: Every body looking upon our being in possession of Port-Mahon as of the last consequence to the carrying on the war in Spain; besides the other advantages, which, if we are wise, we may reap from it, both in war and peace. I cannot express to you the sense the Queen, and every body here, has of your zeal and conduct in this affair, to which this very important success is so much owing. I heartily condole with you for the loss of your brother, which indeed is a publick loss to us all, he was so deserving a young man. As soon as we heard of your being gone upon this expedition, orders were sent to Sir George Byng, as soon as he should come to Lisbon, to carry with him into the Mediterranean a sufficient quantity of stores for a Squadron to winter there; and, upon the good news Captain Moyer has brought, those orders are renewed, so that you may depend upon that being effectually provided for. I do not say any thing to you of what you mention in relation to the troops from Naples, because you will receive by Mr. Griggs the Queen's approbation of what you have done in relation to it. I send you inclosed a letter of the Queen's to the Countess of Oropesa, writ with her own hand. You will receive directions from my Lord Treasurer, to give her, at the same time, from the Queen the thousand pounds you have so often mentioned. I must not omit telling you, that the Queen does intirely approve of your leaving an English garrison in Port-Mahon, for the reasons you mention, though some of them must be kept very secret. Her Majesty does approve also of the Governor you have named, and is very well satisfied with your having the Commission you mention from the King of Spain, being satisfied you make no use of it but what is for the public service. I have nothing more to trouble you with, but to assure you, that I am, with the greatest truth and esteem,

S I R,

Your most faithful humble Servant,

SUNDERLAND.

P. S. Besides the orders that are gone to Sir George Byng, Captain Moyer carries with him orders from the Prince to Sir Edward Whitaker, in relation to the Squadron's wintering at Port-Mahon. You will receive with this packet a letter of the Queen's to the King of Spain, in favour of the Conde de Salazar, at the desire and recommendation of several Spanish and Canary Merchants.

(2) In our return from the camp to Barcelona (says the Author of the Manuscript account of the campaigns in Spain) I went with Major-General Carpenter to view the convent of Mountferrat, sixteen miles from it, which, for miracles and riches, is said to be equal, and by the Catalans, far to out-do that of the Lady of Loretto. The treasure of this Chapel is immense in jewels and plate, and the income of the Fryars, who are forty Benedictines, besides Lay-Brothers, is very considerable; and all owing to the pretended miracles of the blessed Virgin, whose statue in wood, of a very curious workmanship, and believed to be sent by St. Peter from Rome to Barcelona, and carved by St. Luke, is set up behind the great altar. The mountain, on which the convent stands at the half way, is exceeding high and beautiful; the very top nature has adorned with twelve high rocks at equal distances, in the shape of sugar-loaves, which bear the names of the twelve Apostles; in each a hermitage is built, little frequented, because inaccessible, but all inhabited by hermits, men of good families, and all reputed of great sanctity. A German Captain left his command and retired into one of them, having made great interest to obtain the first vacancy; there was a hermitage some hundreds of years, where this magnificent convent

Besides the having a safe Port to retire to, the conquest of Minorca brought a further advantage to the Allies, by defeating the French King's project of uniting the Princes and States of Italy in a league against the Emperor, in order to rekindle war in that country: And a Confederate fleet was seasonably at hand to assist the Imperialists, who made a considerable progress in the Ecclesiastical State, and threatened to march to Rome, upon the following occasion:

Differences between the Emperor and the Pope.

The Emperor, and his Brother, King Charles, had, for several years, impatiently borne the Pope's partiality, which was of great prejudice to their affairs, and, in consequence, to the common cause. But the Pope having openly owned his engagements with the House of Bourbon, and his designs against that of Austria, and the whole Confederacy, by his proceeding in relation to the Pretender's expedition to Scotland, which, if attended with success, would have ruined the grand Alliance, and given a fatal wound to the liberties of Europe; the same did not only most sensibly affect those two Potentates and the Duke of Savoy, against whose just pretensions in Ecclesiastical affairs the Pope had fulminated his censures, but was resented, with due indignation, by her Britannic Majesty. Hereupon, the Ecclesiastical revenues in the Kingdom of Naples and Duchy of Milan, belonging to persons residing out of those countries, who had neglected to take the oaths to King Charles, were put under sequestration by the Imperial Officers. And, not many days after, while the Pope held a Congregation about that affair, Cardinal Grimani not only notified to him the disappointment of the Pretender's expedition, but, as Vice-roy of Naples, and a Grande of Spain, signified to him, That King Charles expected he should send a Nuncio to Barcelona, to acknowledge him as King of Spain, desiring his Holiness to consider the fatal consequences of his delaying that recognition, and continuing to own his competitor. Besides which, at the solicitation of the Court of Great-Britain, the Emperor was determined, in concert with the Duke of Savoy, to revive his old pretensions to Comacina, and other places in the Ferrarese, in order to check the Pope, and oblige him to enter into such measures, with respect to the rights and late acquisitions of King Charles, as equity, and the peace and welfare of Naples and the Milanese, with the firm establishment of their present Sovereign, necessarily required. The Court of Rome ordered their Minister at Vienna, to communicate to the Emperor a letter from Signior Piazza, Secretary of the memorials to the Pope, wherein he endeavoured to extenuate what his Holiness was charged with, on occasion of the late French expedition against Great Britain, though whatever arts they used to cover their remittances of money into France, they could not palliate the Pope's appointing public prayers for the success of the intended invasion. On the other hand, the Pope's refusal to send, according to King Charles's demand, a Legate a Latere, to compliment his Royal Consort in her passage through Italy, and to treat her as Queen of Spain, having given a fresh disgust to the Courts of Vienna and Barcelona, the Imperial troops, commanded by Monsieur de Bonneval, in conjunction with those of the Duke of Modena, invaded the Duchy of Ferrara, and took possession of Comacina, a sea-port town on the Adriatic sea, Lugo, Argenta, Canale, Presnero, Magnavacca, Condogoro, Pamposa, Bagnacavallo, and some other small places, on pretence of their being allodial states, belonging to the Duke of Modena, and sists of the Emperor, to which the Holy See had no lawful claim, and which were vent stands now. Great Devotions were paid to a little statue of the Virgin which was worshipped here, and abundance of miracles wrought, but none so wonderful as those of the last found out statue, which they tell you was discovered in this manner: Some centuries ago great numbers of people of the neighbouring towns, going in a great procession to this hermitage on the feast of the Assumption, in the month of August, were very much frightened, as they came to the bottom of this mountain, by a bull's coming out of a thicket, jumping and leaping in such a manner, as drove most of the Processioners back, except the Priests and some of the boldest Catalans, who were big with expectation of some miracle, which was soon wrought in their sight; for this bull stopped of himself, after they had used their best endeavours to drive him away, about an hundred yards from the place where he came out; here he began to tear up the ground with his feet and horns, which confirmed the people in the hopes of a miracle, and, spades and pick-axes being immediately sent for, they began to dig up that spot where this famous statue was found, and carried with extraordinary devotions and rejoicings into the chapel of the hermitage; here it was let up in the room of the little one, being well-cleaned and varnished, and provided with fine cloaths, and such crowds came to this place from all the parts of the Kingdom, and from all the islands, as not only enriched the hermitage, but the whole neighbourhood: I asked whether the bull was not canonized, the Fryar answered me, no; but however the bull was very well taken care of, and had in great veneration, and religiously visited as long as he lived, which was to an uncommon old age. As to the miracles wrought by the Lady of Montserrat, they outdo many of those that are recorded in their legend; but I shall relate only that, which was the occasion of building this famous monastery: One Garinus, hermit in this place, debauched a beautiful young Lady, daughter of the Count of Barcelona, Sovereign of all Catalonia, who came to perform her devotions at the hermitage in her father's company, who used frequently to come to this mountain to hunt roebucks and wild-goats, with which it abounded. After this horrid fact, the young Lady was destroyed, and her body cast into a very deep ditch behind this hermitage, which the hermit carefully covered up; and then began his journey to Rome, in the night, to sue for a pardon and absolution from the Pope. When the Count sent for his daughter, neither she nor the hermit were to be found, which caused a great affliction in the Count's family, and many severe reflections against the young Lady and the Hermit, who were judged to have absconded together. The penance imposed by the Pope on the hermit, was, that he should return to the mountain in the night, strip himself quite naked, walk upon all four, live upon grass, and never stand upright before seven years were expired, and his lodging was to be in the hole of some rock; and that during the time of his penance, he should not cease to put up his prayers to the Lady of the hermitage, that the Count's daughter might be restored to life. The penance was strictly performed, and in the middle of the seventh year, the Count went for the first time, since this misfortune, to hunt on the mountain, when the dogs made up to the habitation of Garinus, and would have torn him in pieces, 1708. were expressly excepted in the treaty between Clement the Eighth, and Cæsar of Este. At the same time, the Vice-roy of Naples forbid, on pain of death or banishment, the remitting any money to Rome, or any other part of the territories of the Church; and the Council of the Kingdom drew up a long memorial of the pretensions of his Catholic Majesty against the Court of Rome, which struck at the very foundations of the temporal power of the Pope. Upon the first alarm of the Imperialists marching into the Ferrarese, the Pope wrote a letter to the Emperor, wherein he remonstrated, "That these things were attempted by the abuse of his Imperial Majesty's name, against all justice, equity, and reverence due to the Roman Pontiff, and the rights of the Church: That they were contrary to the divine and human laws, and repugnant to the title of the Defender of the Church, which his famous Ancestors had taken as a great honour and glory." The Pope declared withal, "That he would assert this cause, though he should be sure to lose his life upon that account." But, before his letter reached Vienna, General Bonneval had put his orders in execution; and, when received, it rather exasperated than allayed the resentment of the Emperor, who thereby plainly saw, that the Pope was so far from offering any satisfaction, that, on the contrary, he threatened him both with his spiritual and temporal arms. And, indeed, the Pope resolved to repel force by force, and, for that purpose, began to raise an army, the command of which he gave to Count Marigli, who was formerly dismissed the Emperor's service, for not performing his duty at the siege of Brijae. At the same time, the Pope's Ministers revived the project, which they had set on foot three years before, of a league of the Princes and States of Italy, for their mutual security, which was defeated by the terror of the Confederate fleet. Nor had his Holiness's earnest application to the French King for succours better success, that Prince having, at this juncture, too much work upon his own hands, and his country lying, besides, at too great a distance from the Ecclesiastical State. Notwithstanding these disappointments, the Court of Rome went on with their new levies, which were increased by the troops sent from Avignon. But though the Pope's subjects drew the first blood in the Ferrarese, and forced the Germans to quit several posts; yet the Emperor, chusing rather the way of negotiation than of the sword, sent orders to the Marquis de Prié, a Piedmontese Lord, to pursue his journey to Rome, to know from the Pope himself, Whether he would have peace or war? In the mean time, his Imperial Majesty, and the Duke of Savoy, by their intercession with the Queen of Great Britain, suspended pieces, if the huntmen had not made haste to his rescue: They were surprised to find a kind of monster, who would not speak, nor lift himself up, though he had the shape and features of a man. The Count ordered him to be tied and led to Barcelona, where he continued chained in a corner of the stable, without eating any human food, but herbs; and many people had the sight of this monster. At last, on the very day, that the seven years expired, the Count made a very great feast for his family and others of his friends. Some of the company desiring to see the monster, he was brought to the door, when a child of five or six months old, son to one of the Count's daughters, fixing his eyes upon him, spoke these words with a loud voice, Garinus rise up, thy sins are forgiven thee; upon which he run back with his keeper to the stable, the company being all struck with fear and amazement at this great miracle: He began to speak to his keeper, and desired a sheet to cover himself with, and that he would go to the Count to obtain leave to come into his presence, having a very great secret to reveal to him. He was immediately admitted, and upon his knees confessed his crime, but assured the Count withal, that by his continued prayers to the Lady of Mountferrat, and her prevailing intercession, his daughter would be found living, and as well in all respects as ever she was. The miracle of the child's speaking made the Count believe without hesitation all that Garinus told him, so that he gave immediate directions for a very grand procession of all the orders of Fryars and others to go to the holy mountain, for so it is called, to see the miracle that was wrought upon his daughter. When they came there, the young Lady was found, and presented to her father, in the same clothes she had on when she went from him, and looking as fresh, as young, and as well, as if she had never gone from her father's house. The Count was affected with so much gratitude for this surprising miracle in favour of his family, that he made a vow, before he left the place, to build and to endow that large Monastery, that is now there. This whole history is beautifully painted in the cloysters of the convent, and for the satisfaction of all strangers, who resort thither in great numbers yearly, it is printed upon large paper, and upon very thin silk, to make it more portable, and fold for half a crown. The Lay-brother, who shews the curiosities of this place, is a Fleming, and speaks several languages: He was Lieutenant in Count Noyelle's regiment, and preferred this idle life to the fatigues of an army. After we had viewed every thing, and especially the treasure, which, if all the jewels it contains be real, is beyond valuation, we were carried to the Abbot's apartment, where a nice collation was provided. After we had partaken of it, I walked with the interpreter into a balcony, into which the Abbot's dining-room opens; from hence he shewed me the hole in the rock, where the famous Garinus lived during his penance: I asked him in French whether he did believe it; the Abbot, who was talking with General Carpenter, who spoke very good Spanish, overheard me, and in a kind of emotion told me, Yes, Sir, we believe it as much as we do the gospel, which put a stop to all farther inquiries. Speaking of the richness and beauty of the crowns, that are put upon the statue's head, especially on great festivals, the Abbot told us, That a Fleming jeweller was many years in making that of diamonds, that it is reputed worth sixteen millions of pieces of eight, and that of emeralds, by reason of the bigness of the stones, is reckoned worth little less. That of diamonds is certainly, for the largeness of the stones, and the beautiful order in which they are fixed, the most excellent and richest piece of work of that kind now extant; and, to fit it off the more, the top of it is a complete ship, with masts, and sails, and cordage, &c. all of diamonds, a present of Isabella, Queen of Aragon. And it is no wonder if this place be so immensely rich, considering the numberless vows, that are made by persons in all sicknesses and distresses, especially by women in labour, which are always very religiously performed. The two Kings Charles and Philip made here their vows for the success of their arms, and did offer each his present in person at the altar of the shrine; the first of a rich sword set with diamonds, and the other of a gold chalice enriched with many jewels. They have in the outside of the convent a good large house for the entertainment of strangers, and of all the people that come to pay their vows, with very good accommodations, which brings the convent a great yearly income.

pended the execution of the orders sent to Sir John Leake for bombarding and destroying Civita Vecchia.

The Pope's coffers being exhausted, he held a consistory on the 24th of September, N. S. at which assisted forty-two Cardinals, whom he acquainted, "That he was obliged to have recourse to extraordinary means, and therefore thought, that part of the three millions of golden crowns, deposited by Sixtus the Fifth in the castle of St. Angelo, ought to be employed in these pressing necessities of the Church." His proposal appeared extraordinary to some Cardinals, who represented, that this treasure was sacred, and never to be made use of, but when all other means failed: That the present case of the Church was indeed difficult enough, yet far from being desperate, since they had to deal with the first Christian Prince, who could not have in view the destruction of the Church: That this dispute might be made up in a pacific way, instead of being decided by the sword. And therefore they exhorted the Pope to consider seriously the fatal consequences of a rash rupture with the Emperor, and to stand on his guard against the suggestions of some fiery persons, who were altogether for war, in hopes to better their fortunes during the confusions of it. But this representation had little effect upon the Pope, who was too partial to hearken to any advice, that was not for the interest of France; and, most of the Cardinals there present being of the French and Spanish factions, they resolved to take out of the Treasury of the castle of St. Angelo five hundred thousand golden crowns, upon a solemn promise made by the Pope, that the like sum should be again deposited in the same place as soon as the war was over. The Pope was so highly elated with his success in this important debate, that he declared he would not hearken to any proposals made on the part of the Emperor, nor receive any Envoy or Minister from him, till the Imperial forces were withdrawn from Comacino, and other parts of the Ecclesiastical State; which rash resolution was probably suggested to him by the Marshal de Teslé, who was lately come to Rome with the character of the French King's Ambassador Extraordinary, in order to inflame the rupture, and encourage the Pope with great assurances of support. He was ordered likewise to try, whether the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the Republics of Venice and Genoa, could be engaged in an Alliance against the Imperialists. The Emperor bore all the Pope's threats with great patience, till the Duke of Savoy ended the campaign, when the Imperial troops, that had been commanded by that Duke, were ordered to march into the Pope's territories, and were joined by some more forces drawn out of the Milanese and Mantuan. The Pope's troops began the war in a very barbarous manner; for, while they were in a sort of a cessation, they surprized a body of the Imperialists, and without mercy put them to the sword. But, as the Imperial army advanced, the Papalists, or, as the Italians in derision called them, the Papagallians fled every where before them, even when they were three to one. As they came on, the Pope's territories and places were all cast open to them. Bologna, the most important and the richest of them all, capitulated, and received them without the least resistance. The people at Rome were uneasy at the Pope's proceedings, and at the apprehensions of a new sack from a German army. They shewed this so openly, that tumults there were much dreaded, and many Cardinals declared openly against the war. Upon this the Pope declared, that he was ready to receive the Marquis de Prié, who arrived at Rome on the 24th of October, N. S. however many days passed before the Pope would admit him to his audience, upon a punctilio about the ceremonial, because he had no other character than of Plenipotentiary of the Emperor, which, it was pretended, was not admitted at the Papal Court. This difficulty being at last removed by the Pope's signifying to the Marquis, that he would receive him with the same ceremonies, as were observed at the audience of Count Martinitz, when he went through Rome for Naples, to take possession of the dignity of Viceroy of that Kingdom, that Minister went to his audience, on the 10th of November, N. S. and, in a few days after, delivered his proposals for an accommodation, importing in substance, "1. That the Pope should disband his new levies. 2. Give winter-quarters to the Imperial troops in his territories. 3. And the investiture of Naples to Charles III. and acknowledge him as King of Spain: And, 4. That he should allow the Imperialists passage through his dominions, as often as there should be occasion." The Pope was amazed at these high terms, but there was no remedy left. The ill state of affairs in France was now so visible, that no regard was had to the great promises, which Teslé was making, nor was there any hopes of drawing the Princes and States of Italy into an Alliance for his defence. In conclusion the Pope, after he had delayed yielding to the Emperor's demands long enough to give the Imperialists time to eat up his country, at last submitted to every thing; yet he delayed acknowledging King Charles for some months, though he then promised to do it; upon which the Emperor drew his troops out of his territories. The Pope turned over the manner of acknowledging King Charles to a congregation of Cardinals; but they had no mind to take the load of this upon themselves, which would draw an exclusion upon them from France in every conclave, and therefore left it to the Pope, who affected delays; so it was not done till the 15th of January, 1709, N. S.

With regard to the campaign in Germany, Campaign in Germany, the Elector of Bavaria had been sent to command on the Upper Rhine. The true reason was believed, that he might not pretend to continue in the chief command in Flanders. He was put in hopes of being furnished with an army so strong, as to be able to break through into Bavaria. The Elector of Hanover again undertook the command of the army of the Empire. Both armies were weak, but they were so equally weak, that they were not able to undertake any thing on either side; and therefore, after some months, in which there was no considerable action, the forces on both sides went into winter-quarters.

The affairs in Hungary continued in the same ill state, in which they had been for some years. The Emperor did not grant the demands of the Diet, that he had called; nor did he redress their grievances; and he had not a force strong enough to reduce the malecontents; so that 1708. that his Council could not fall on methods, either to satisfy or subdue them.

Poland continued still to be a scene of war and misery. To other calamities they had the addition of a plague, which laid some of their great towns waste. The party formed against Stanislaus continued still to oppose him, though they had no King to head them. The King of Sweden's warlike humour possessed him to such a degree, that he resolved to march into Muscovy. The Czar tried, how far submissions and intercessions could soften him; but he was inflexible. He marched through the Ukrain, but made no great progress. The whole Muscovite force fell on one of his Generals, who had about him only a part of the army, and gave him a total defeat, most of his horse being cut off.

The Elector Palatine was this year restored to the possession of the Upper Palatinate, with the title and rank, which had been vested in the House of Bavaria by the treaty of Munster. And the Elector of Brunswick Lunenburg was at last acknowledged as such by the Electoral College. The Duke of Savoy received the investiture of the Mantuan, Montferrat, and other adjacent countries; and the ban of the Empire was, on the 30th of June, N. S. published against the Duke of Mantua, which probably hastened his death, which happened five days after. The mediation of Great-Britain did not a little contribute towards the pacifying of the intestine divisions of the city of Hamburg. But though, at the desire of the King of Sweden, the Queen had readily accepted the guaranty of the treaty of Alt-Ransbach, yet the Reformed in Silesia received no benefit from her Majesty's earnest interposition in their favour; the Court of Vienna, now freed from the dread of the King of Sweden's resentment, pretending, that the Lutherans only, and not the Calvinists, were included, both in that treaty, and in that of Westphalia.

Affairs at sea. Our affairs at sea were less unfortunate this year, than they had been formerly. The Merchants were better served with convoys, and no considerable losses were sustained. Commodore

Commodore Wager destroys the Spanish Galleons.

Wager gained a signal advantage against the Spanish Galleons in the West-Indies. He had, on the 22d of December, 1707, returned to Jamaica, from the coast of Hispaniola, upon some advices of the arrival of Monfieur Du Casse, with a French Squadron of great force, in order, as it was supposed, to make some attempt upon Jamaica. The next day the Commodore, being then with his squadron in Port-Royal harbour, held a Council of war, to consider of the several advices he had received. During the month of January, he sent out several ships to cruise, and to get intelligence of the enemy; and, on the 5th of February, it was resolved, in a Council of war, to go over to the Spanish coast. Accordingly, the Commodore sailed in a few days after to the Keys, where he was joined by several other ships and sloops. Upon advice, that the Spanish Galleons were gone from Carthagena for Porto Bello, the Commodore sailed with such ships as were ready, leaving directions, how and where the rest should join him. On the 25th they came to an anchor off the Ile of Pines. In March, the Commodore received advice at two several times from Captain Pudner, who was stationed near Porto-Bello, that the Galleons, with the King's money, could not sail before the first of May; upon which it was resolved to return to Jamaica, but it was given out, that they were only gone to cruise. On the 6th of April, the Commodore anchored at Port-Royal Keys, and having taken in provisions, he sailed again on the 14th, and, about eight or ten days after, gave chase to several ships off Bocca Chica, some of which escaped into Carthagena, and others he lost sight of in hazy weather. On the 23d of May, the Anne sloop joined the Commodore from the Bastimentos, and brought a letter from Captain Pudner, with advice, that the Galleons, being thirteen sail, were at sea, coming from Carthagena. The Commodore had then with him the Expedition, Kingston, Portland, and Vulture fire-ship, and cruized till the 27th, in expectation of the Galleons; but, not meeting with them, he began to fear they had intelligence of his being on the coast, and were gone for the Havanna. On the 28th of May, about noon, the Galleons, in all seventeen sail, were discovered from his top-mast-head; and, at the same time, they discovered him, but, despising so small a force, resolved to proceed. He chased them till evening, when they, finding they could not weather the Baru, a small Island, which lay in their passage to Carthagena, resolved to dispute the matter there, and stretching therefore to the Northward with an easy sail, they drew as well as they could into a line of battle. The Admiral, who wore a white pennant at the main-top-mast-head, in the center, the Vice-Admiral, with the same pennant at the fore-top-mast-head, in the rear, and the Rear-Admiral, who bore the pennant on the mizzen-top-mast-head, in the van, about half a mile from each other, there being other ships between them. Of the seventeen two were sloops, and one a brigantine, which stood in for the land; two others of them were French ships, which, running away, had no share in the action; the rest were Spaniards. The Commodore instantly made his disposition; he resolved to attack the Admiral himself; gave orders to Captain Simon Bridges, who commanded the Kingston, to engage the Vice-Admiral, and sent his boat to the Portland, commanded by Captain Edward Windsor, with orders to attack the Rear-Admiral; and, as there was no immediate occasion for the fire-ship, she plied to the windward.

The Sun was just setting, when Commodore Wager came up with the Admiral, and then beginning to engage, in about an hour and half's time (it being dark) she blew up, not without great danger to the Expedition, from the splinters and planks, which fell on board her, on fire, and the great heat of the blast. Hereupon the Commodore put abroad his signal lights for keeping company, and endeavoured to continue fight of some of the enemies ships; but finding, after this accident, they began to separate, and discovering but one, which was the Rear-Admiral, he made sail after her, and coming up about ten o'clock, when he could not judge which way her head lay, it being very dark, he happened to fire his broad-side into her stern, which did so much damage, that it seemed to disable her from making sail; and being then to leeward, he, tacking on the Spaniard, got to windward of him, and the Kingston and Portland (which had by reason of the darkness of the night, or the blowing up of the Admiral, lost sight of the other ships) following his lights soon after, came up with him, and assisted in taking the Rear-Admiral, who called for quarter about two in the morning. On board of this ship he sent his boats to bring to him the chief Officers; and, before the rising of the sun, he saw one large ship on his weather bow, and three sail upon the weather-quarter, three or four leagues off, lying then with their heads to the North, the wind being at North-east, an easy gale. Then he put out the signal for the Kingston and Portland to chase to windward, not being able himself to make sail, being much disabled; and, as he had a great part of his men in the prize, so were there no less than three hundred prisoners on board his own ship.

On Sunday the 30th, the wind being from the North east, to the North North-west, and but little of it, the Kingston and Portland had left off chase; but the Commodore made the signal for continuing it, which they did, and ran him out of sight, the fire-ship still continuing with him; and he having lain by some time, not only to put the prize in a condition of sailing, but to refit his own rigging, made sail eastward on the 31st, when the Kingston and Portland joined him, and gave him an account, that the ship they chased was the Vice-Admiral, to which, as they said, they came so near, as to fire their broadsides into her, but were so far advanced towards the Salmadinas, a shoal off Carthagena, that they were forced to tack, and leave her. This gave the Commodore great uneasiness, and determined him to call the Captains of these ships to account; but, in the mean time he sent them orders to take or destroy a Galleon of forty guns, which he understood by a Swedish ship, that had been trading at Baru, had taken shelter in that Island. She was just coming out of Port, as the Kingston and Portland appeared; upon which her crew ran her ashore, set her on fire, and blew her up, so that nothing could be got out of her, as the Captains affirmed, and, as it appeared to the Commodore afterwards, was true. On the 2d of June, the Commodore finding his provisions and water short, the wind contrary, and nothing more to be done in those parts, resolved to set the Spanish Prisoners ashore, according to their request, on the Island of Baru, and then proceed for Jamaica; which he performed accordingly; and the Spanish Rear-Admiral retained, as long as he lived, a grateful sense of the Commodore's civility.

On the 8th of July, the Expedition, Kingston, and Vulture fire-ship, brought the prize safe into Port-Royal harbour (1): Here the Commodore found the new act of Parliament for the distribution of prizes; and though he had before permitted the sailors to plunder as they thought fit, when the prize was taken, yet now he appointed agents, in obedience to that act of Parliament, and ordered Captain Long to deliver up near thirty thousand pounds worth of silver and effects, that he had taken between decks, in order to satisfy the sailors of the uprightness of his intentions. He likewise took care to dispatch intelligence to England, that ships might be fitted out to cruise for the galleons, that had escaped; and, on the 23d of July, he held a Court-martial on the two Captains Bridges and Windsor, who were both dismissed for not having done their duty in the late engagement (2).

Another Squadron of the British fleet, under the command of Sir George Byng, carried over the Arch-duchess Mary Anne, married to the King of Portugal, which was performed with great magnificence: She had a quick and easy passage, arriving at Lisbon on the 27th of October. This did in some measure make amends to that crown for our failing them in not sending over the supplies, that had been stipulated. And it was a particular happiness, that the Spaniards were so weak, as not to be able to take advantage of the naked and unguarded state, in which the Portuguese were at that time.

After this large account of foreign affairs, it is time to return to the transactions at home.

In the month of July, an Ambassador from the Emperor of Fez and Morocco arrived in rocco Ambassador confined Great-Britain with a present of six lions for the Queen; but upon his coming to Hammer-smith near London, he was put under an easy confinement by way of reprisal for the restraint put upon Captain Delaval, the Queen's Envoy in that country, before he reached that Court; which happened upon a false report, that some ill usage had been offered to Hamet Ben Hamet Cardenas,

(1) The prisoners gave an account, that the Admiral was a ship of sixty-four brass guns, with six hundred men, called the St. Joseph, and had on board, as some said, five millions of pieces of eight; but, according to others, seven millions in gold and silver: That the Vice-Admiral mounted sixty-four brass guns, and had between four and five hundred men, with four, or, as some said, six millions of pieces of eight: And that the Rear-Admiral was mounted with four and twenty guns, having eleven more in the hold, and between three and four hundred men: But that, upon some difference between the Admiral and him at Porto Belle, orders were given, that no money should be shipped on board her; so that thirteen chests of pieces of eight, and fourteen pigs or fows of silver, which were privately brought on board in the night, and belonged to some of the passengers, was all the treasure, which was on board, except what others might have about them, or were in trunks, of which they could give no account. This is the account, which the prisoners gave. Several relations published soon after that time make the riches of the Admiral and Vice-Admiral to have been far greater, the former at least thirty, and the latter twenty millions of pieces of eight. They all however agree, that the Rear-Admiral had no registered money on board. The other Spanish ships had little or no money on board, but were chiefly laden with cocoa, as the Rear-Admiral was, and but one of them was of any considerable force, being of seven hundred tons burden, and having forty brass guns, and an hundred and forty men. But the two French ships had about an hundred thousand pieces of eight on board.

(2) Captain Bridges of the Kingston was dismissed, because he left off chase when within shot of the Spanish Vice-Admiral, doubting the pilot's knowledge, and being near the shoal of Salmadinas, though the pilot offered to carry the ship within shoal. Captain Windsor of the Portland was also dismissed, for not bearing so near the enemy, as to keep sight of some of them, when they were engaged on the 28th in the night; for leaving off chase the next day, and for shortning sail on the 30th, before he came up so far with the Spanish Vice-Admiral near Salmadinas, as he might have done.

1708. Cardenas, the late Morocco Ambassador here. But, upon better information, the Captain was released, as was also the Morocco Ambassador. However the British Envoy did not think fit to go in person to the Court of Morocco, and only sent thither, with her Majesty's letter and present, Mr Corbiere, his Secretary, who was received with great demonstrations of respect.

The Muscovite Ambassador arrested.

About this time an indignity offered in London to Count de Matueof, the Muscovite Ambassador, was highly resented, not only by himself, but likewise by all concerned in the preservation of the rights and privileges of public Ministers. Thomas Morton, a laceman in King-street, Covent-Garden, and some other tradesmen, to whom the Ambassador owed several sums of money, amounting in the whole to about three hundred pounds, finding he had taken his audience of leave, and being apprehensive, that he would leave the Kingdom without paying his debts, though a Merchant in the City, trading to Muscovy, had set a day for satisfying most of them, held several consultations together, and at last resolved to arrest him; which was done accordingly, on the 21st of July, in the open street, with several aggravating circumstances. For the Ambassador, not knowing at first the reason of his being seized, and imagining he was set upon by villains, struggled in his own defence, and was ill-used and overpowered by the bailiffs, who carried him to a spunging-house at the sign of the Black Raven, where he was detained till the Earl of Feversham and a Merchant of the City had bailed him. The Ambassador, incensed at this insult, in violation of the law of Nations, applied himself for redress to the Government; and the next day wrote a letter to Mr. Secretary Boyle, wherein he urged, "That the Queen, who was so jealous of the respect due to the Ambassadors of crowned heads, and had so gloriously vindicated the honour of the Earl of Manchester, her Ambassador at Venice, and caused a rigorous punishment to be inflicted on the Officers of the Custom-House, some of whom were set in the pillory, and others condemned to the galleys, only for insulting the Gentlemen of his retinue, could not but most justly revenge the affront lately put upon him by a corporal punishment. That Count Zobor, who was delivered up to the discretion of the King of Sweden for picking a quarrel with his Envoy, likewise afforded an instance of the satisfaction he required, as being desirous of nothing with greater earnestness, than to avoid all the ill consequences of this affair. For, in case the criminals were connived at, under any colour whatsoever, he should be obliged to take other measures, and retire without recredentials, leaving the whole matter to the management of his Czarish Majesty, his Master, as the Protector of his injured honour, and of his abused Minister."

At the same time Count Gallas, the Emperor's Envoy, the Baron Spanheim, Ambassador from the King of Prussia, and several other foreign Ministers, thinking themselves concerned in the affront put upon their character, demanded a due reparation for the same: All which having been laid before the Queen, who still continued at Windsor, she expressed a very great resentment for the indignity offered to the Muscovite Ambassador, and commanded an extraordinary Council to be summoned on the 25th of July on that occasion. Mr. Morton, and some other creditors, with the Attorney, Bailiffs, and other persons concerned in the arrest of the Ambassador, having been examined, were committed to the custody of several Messengers, and ordered to be prosecuted with the utmost severity, according to law. The next day, before Mr. Boyle was returned from Windsor, the Muscovite Ambassador wrote to him another letter, importing, "That, as he had not received any testimony of concern, or regret, either from the Queen, or any of her Ministers, since he had sent him his complaints in writing, he found himself obliged to press for his departure; and therefore intreated Mr. Secretary to get a passport for him as soon as possible." Mr. Boyle acquainted the Ambassador, "That seven of the principal accomplices, in the desperate attempt upon his person, were committed to prison, and under prosecution, by order of the Privy-Council, who were to meet again about that affair as soon as possible." But the Ambassador, being impatient to leave the Kingdom, wrote a third letter on the 27th of July to Mr. Secretary, for a passport for himself and family. Mr. Boyle wrote, two days after, a letter to the Ambassador, acquainting him, "That he had that morning sent him the passport he desired: That orders had been issued out to the Officers of the Custom-House to wait on him, to cause his equipages to be transported without any molestation; and he hoped, they had already done that to his satisfaction: That an extraordinary meeting of the Queen's Privy-Council was to be held that day, to inquire further into the circumstances of that dismal affair: That they had made a strict search after those, who were any ways concerned therein; and had caused ten others to be apprehended: That express orders had been given again to the Attorney-General, to prosecute the seventeen persons now confined, with the utmost rigour; and to omit nothing, that might contribute towards the making him the most signal reparation, that could be, according to our law." Notwithstanding these assurances, the Ambassador refused the ordinary presents made to Ministers of his character, which were offered him by the Queen, and retired in disgust into Holland, from whence he transmitted a memorial, with a letter from the Czar of Muscovy to the Queen, dated the 17th of September, wherein that Prince demanded no less, than that a capital punishment, according to the rigour of the law, be inflicted on all the accomplices of the indignity put upon the person of his Ambassador; or, at least, such a one, as was adequate to the nature of the affront, which every particular person put upon the Ambassador." Such a punishment being altogether inconsistent with the laws of England, this unlucky affair gave no small uneasiness to the Queen and Ministers (1).

(1) Mr. Addison gave the following account of this affair, in a letter to the Earl of Manchester, dated at the Cock-pit, July 23, 1708, O. S. and published in Cole's Memoirs of affairs of State, p. 546. "We had

The death of Prince George of Denmark.
Barnet.

On the 28th of October, about ten in the forenoon, died Prince George of Denmark, in the 56th year of his age, after he had been twenty-five years and some months married to the Queen. He had, for many years, been troubled with an asthma, and sometimes spitting of blood, which often endangered his Life; and, about three months before, a dropical humour, with which he had been formerly afflicted, seized his legs and most parts of his body. This was attended with a sleepiness, cough, and an increase of the asthma; and, on Saturday the 23d of October, the violence of the cough produced a spitting of blood, and an increase of the sleepiness, with an addition of convulsive motions of the tendons; which symptoms not yielding to the remedies administered by his own and several other physicians, he fell into a suffocation, and which neither bleeding, nor a vomit, could relieve him, so that he soon after expired. The Queen, who, during the whole course of her marriage, had been a most tender and affectionate wife to him, in his last illness, which lasted some years, would never leave his bed, but sat up, sometimes half the night in the bed by him, with such care and concern, that she was looked on very deservedly as a pattern in this respect. The Prince was Duke of Cumberland, Lord High-Admiral of Great-Britain and Ireland, Generalissimo of all her Majesty's forces both by sea and land, and Warden of the Cinque-ports. He had shewed himself brave in the wars both in Denmark and in Ireland. His temper was mild and gentle. He had made a good progress in mathematics. He had travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, and knew much more than he could well express; for he spoke acquired languages ill and ungracefully. He was free from all vice. He meddled little in business, even after the Queen's accession to the Crown. He was so gained by the Tories, by the act which they carried in his favour, that he was much in their interest. He was unhappily prevailed with to take on him the post of Lord High-Admiral, of which he understood little, but was fatally led by those, that had credit with him, who had not all of them his good qualities, but had both an ill temper and bad principles. His being bred to the sea gained him some credit in those matters. In the conduct of our affairs, as great errors were committed, so great misfortunes had followed on them. As soon as the Prince had resigned his last breath, the Queen came from Kensington to her palace at St. James's, where she resided the whole winter. On the 11th of November, the body of his Royal Highness was carried from Kensington, to the Painted Chamber, within the palace of Westminster, where having lain in state till the 13th, it was that night interred in the Abbey-Church, with all the pomp consistent with a private funeral.

The death of Prince George occasioned some alterations at Court; for the Earl of Pembroke was, on the 25th of November, advanced to the post of Lord High-Admiral, which he entered on with great uneasiness, and a just apprehension of the difficulty of maintaining it well in a time of war. He was at that time both Lord-President of the Council, and Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. The Earl of Warburton had the Government of Ireland (who made Mr. Addison his Secretary) and the Lord Sommers was made Lord-President of the Council. The great capacity and inflexible integrity of the Lord Sommers would have made his promotion to this post very acceptable to the Whigs at any juncture, but it was most particularly so at this time; for it was expected, that propositions for a general peace would be quickly made; and so they reckoned, that the management of that, upon which not only the safety of the Nation, but of all Europe depending, was in sure hands, when he was set at the head of the councils, upon whom neither ill practices nor false colours were like to make any impression. Thus the minds of all those, who were truly zealous for the present Constitution, were much quieted by this promotion, though their jealousies had a deep root, and were not easily removed.

It may here be observed, that, notwithstanding the Duke of Marlborough's successes this year, and the Queen's kind letter to him on occasion of his victory at Oudenard (1), his interest an unlucky business about two days ago, that befel the Muscovite Ambassador, who was arrested going out of his house, and rudely treated by the bailiffs. He was then upon his departure for his own country, and the sum under an hundred pounds that stopped him; and, what makes the business worse, he has been punctual in his payments, and had given order, that this very sum should be paid the day after. However, as he is very well convinced, that the Government intirely disapproves such a proceeding, there are no ill consequences apprehended from it. Your Lordship knows, that the privileges of Ambassadors are under very little regulations in England; and I believe, that a bill will be promoted in the next Parliament for setting them upon a certain foot; at least it is what we talk of in both offices on this occasion.

(1) This letter is printed in the Account of the Duties of Marlborough's conduct, and was as follows:

Windsor, July 6, 1708.

I want words to express the joy I have, that you are well, after your glorious success; for which, next to God Almighty, my thanks are due to you. And indeed I can never say enough for all the great and faithful services you have ever done me. But be so just as to believe, I am as truly sensible of them as a grateful heart can be, and shall be ready to shew it upon all occasions. I hope you cannot doubt of my esteem and friendship for you, nor think, that, because I differ with you in some things, it is for want of either. No, I do assure you, if you were here, I am sure you would not think me so much in the wrong in some things, as I fear you do now. I am afraid my letter should come too late to London, and therefore dare say no more, but that I pray God Almighty to continue his protection over you, and send you safe home again. And be assured I shall ever be sincerely

Your Humble Servant.

To this the Duke answered:

MADAM,

July 23, 1708.

I have the honour of your Majesty's letter of the 6th, and am very thankful for all your goodness to me. And I am sure, it will be always my intention, as well as my duty, to be ready to venture my life for your Service.

As I have formerly told your Majesty, that I am desirous to serve you in the army, but not as a Minister, I am 1708. with her began greatly to decline, through the intrigues of Mrs. Majham and Mr. Hurley, all the summer (1).

At the same time the Lord Sommers was made President of the Council, the Archbishop of York, the Dukes of Mountague and Montrose, the Earls of Louden, Rivers, and Essex, the Lord Ferrers, and Mr. Peregrine Bertie were sworn of the Privy-Council; as, a little before, were Chief-Justice Holt, the Duke of Queensberry, the Earls of Seafeld, Scarborough, and Ranelagh, and Lord Coningsby. The Earl of Cholmondeley was made Treasurer of the Household in the room of the Earl of Bradford deceased, Sir Thomas Felton Comptroller, and Mr. Edmund Dunch Master of the Household. Sir James Mountague Attorney-General, and Mr. Robert Eyre Solicitor-General, the Duke of Dorset was appointed, the 3d of December, Constable of Dover, and Warden of the Cinque-Ports.

The second Parliament of Great-Britain met, the 16th of November, with great advantage; for the present Ministry was now wholly such, as gave an intire content to all, who wished well to the public affairs; and the great successes abroad silenced those, who were otherwise disposed to find fault and complain. The Queen did not think it decent to come to Parliament during this whole Session; and therefore, having granted a Commission under the Great Seal, appointing the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord-Chancellor, the Lord-Treasurer, the Lord-Steward, and the Master of the Horse, to represent her Royal Person, the Commons were desired to come up to the House of Peers, and hear the Commission read. Which done, the Lord-Chancellor signified to the Commons, that they should immediately proceed to the choice of a Speaker, and present him the Thursday

following. The Commons being returned to their House, the Lord William Powlet moved to chuse for their Speaker Sir Richard Onslow, a worthy man, intirely zealous for the Government, and very acceptable to the Whigs. He was seconded by Sir William Strickland. But Major-General Mordaunt, by way of irony, proposed, "That they should chuse Mr. Joddrel, the Clerk of the House, who, having been assistant to good Speakers, to indifferent ones, and to the worst, seemed to be as well qualified for that station as any body." But, at last, General Mordaunt supported the Lord Powlet's motion, commended Sir Richard Onslow's experience and integrity; and added, "That, being possessed of a good estate, he did not lie open to the temptations, that might bias persons, who had their fortunes to make against the interest of their Country." Upon this he was led to the Chair by the Lord Powlet and Sir William Strickland, after he made a short speech, in which he modestly endeavoured to decline that important trust in so critical a juncture of affairs, "wherein the good or bad success of this necessary war did in a great measure depend on the resolutions of that great Assembly." The Tories, upon a surmise, that the Court or Whig-party would have been divided between Sir Richard Onslow and Sir Peter King, Recorder of London, had designed to have put up Sir Thomas Hanmer; but, being disappointed in that expectation, they thought it prudent, not being able to make a majority, unanimously to concur with the rest. Indeed, the Tories perceived, they had so little strength in this Parliament, that they resolved to lie silent, and to wait for such advantages, as the circumstances of the affairs might afford them. The same day, the Duke of Queensberry was introduced into the House of Peers by the Dukes of Somerjet

I am every day more and more confirmed in that opinion. And I think myself obliged upon all accounts on this occasion to speak my mind freely to you. The circumstances in this last battle, I think, shew the hand of God; for we were obliged, not only to march five leagues that morning, but to pass a river before the enemy, and to engage them before the whole army was passed, which was a visible mark of the favour of Heaven to you and your arms.

Your Majesty shall be convinced from this time, that I have no ambition, or any thing to ask for myself or family. But I will end the few years, which I have to live, in endeavouring to serve you, and to give God Almighty thanks for his infinite goodness to me. But, as I have taken this resolution to myself, give me leave to say, that I think you are obliged in conscience, and as a good Christian, to forgive, and to have no more resentments to any particular person or party, but to make use of such as will carry on this just war with vigour; which is the only way to preserve our Religion and Liberties, and the Crown on your head. Which that you may long enjoy, and be a blessing to your people, shall be the constant wish and prayer of him, that is with the greatest truth and duty, Madam, &c.

(1) The Duchess of Marlborough, in the Account of her conduct, p. 206, observes, that the Duke was perfectly sensible of the change in her Majesty towards him; and, having complained of it in a letter to the Duchess, she sent that letter to the Queen, inclosed in the following one from herself:

No. 59. Vol. IV.

"I cannot help sending your Majesty this letter, to shew how exactly Lord Marlborough agrees with me in my opinion, that he has now no interest with you: Though when I said so in the Church on Thursday [August 19, 1708.] you were pleased to say it was untrue. And yet I think he will be surprized to hear, that when I had taken so much pains to put your jewels in a way, that I thought you would like, Mrs. Majham could make you refuse to wear them in so unkind a manner; because that was a power she had not thought fit to exercise before. I will make no reflections upon it; only that I must needs observe, that your Majesty chose a very wrong day to mortify me, when you were just going to return thanks for a victory obtained by Lord Marlborough."

In answer to this the Queen wrote the Duchess these few words:

Sunday.

"After the commands you gave me on the Thanksgiving-day of not answering you, I should not have troubled you with these lines, but to return the Duke of Marlborough's letter safe into your hands, and for the same reason do not say any thing to that, nor to yours, which inclosed it."

Upon receiving this letter, the Duchess wrote again as follows:

"I should not trouble your Majesty with any answer to your last short letter, but to explain what you seem to mistake in what I said at Church. I desired you
D d not

1708. Somerset and Ormond, as a Peer of Great Britain, and Duke of Dover. After this, both Houses adjourned to the 18th, when the Commons being come to the House of Peers to present their Speaker, the Lord-Chancellor, in the name of the Commissioners, signified to them the Queen's intire satisfaction in their choice of a person so well qualified for that office, both by his great abilities, and his zeal and affection for the Government, and the Protestant Succession: And then he delivered to both Houses the following speech.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Chancellor's speech to both Houses.

"IN pursuance of the authority given us by her Majesty's Commission under the Great Seal, among other things, to declare the causes of her Majesty's calling this Parliament;

"We are, by her Majesty's command, in the first place, to oblige to you, that the extraordinary length of this year's campaign hath obliged her Majesty to defer your meeting longer than otherwise she would have done, that you might be informed with the greater certainty of the state and posture of the war, in order to your resolutions for the ensuing year.

"This necessary delay hath now so far shewn us the success of affairs abroad, as that, whether you consider the places acquired by the Allies, or the farther and continued proofs given this last year of their superior courage and conduct (which, as to the future part of the war, is equal to all other advantages) we may, with thanks to God, and justice to those he hath been pleased to use as instruments in this great work, conclude, that, upon the whole, we are brought much nearer than we "were last Session, to the end of our undertaking this war, the reducing the dangerous power of France, and settling such a peace, as may secure itself from being violated.

"Her Majesty therefore commands us to assure you, she hath not the least doubt, but that this Parliament will be of the same opinion with her last, as to the vigorous prosecution of this war, and the ends of it; believing it impossible, the Representatives of the British Nation can endure to think of losing the fruits of all our past endeavours, and the great advantages we have gained (particularly this present year) by submitting at last to an insecure peace.

"And therefore, since probably nothing can hinder our success abroad for the time to come, but misunderstandings among ourselves at home; we have it in command, to conjure you, by your duty to God, and to her Majesty, your zeal for the Protestant Religion, your love for your Country, and the regard you cannot but have for the liberty of Europe in general, to avoid all occasions of division, which are ever hurtful to the public, but will more especially be so at this juncture, when the eyes of all our neighbours are upon you with a very particular concern; and your unanimity and good agreement will be the greatest satisfaction and encouragement to all our Allies.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"You cannot but be convinced, that the several parts of the war, which were provided for by the last Parliament, will require your support, at least in the same degree. But, in Flanders, the nature of the war is much altered, by the great advances made there to wards not to answer me there, for fear of being overheard. And this you interpret, as if I had desired you not to answer me at all, which was far from my intention. For the whole end of my writing to you so often, was to get your answer to several things, in which we differed, that, if I was in the wrong, you might convince me of it, and I should very readily have owned my mistakes. But, since you have not been pleased to shew them to me, I flatter myself, that I have said several things to you, that are unanswerable. And, I hope, some time or other you will find leisure to reflect upon them, and will convince Lord Marlborough, that he is mistaken in thinking, that he has no credit with you, by hearkening sometimes to his advice; and then, I hope, you will never more be troubled with disagreeable letters from me; for I should be much better pleased to say and do every thing you like. But I should think myself wanting in my duty to you, if I saw you so much in the wrong, as without prejudice or passion I really think you are in several particulars I have mentioned, and did not tell you of it; and the rather, because no body else cares to speak out upon so ungrateful a subject. The word command, which you use at the beginning of your letter, is very unjustly supposed to come from me. For though I have always writ to you as a friend, and lived with you as such for so many years with all the truth and honesty and zeal for your service, that was possible; yet I shall never forget, that I am your subject, nor cease to be a faithful one.

Through the whole summer after Mr. Harley's dismission, the Queen continued to have secret correspondence with him. And, that this might be the better managed, she staid all the sultry season, even when the Prince was panting for breath in that small house she had formerly purchased at Windsor, which, though as hot as an oven, was then said to be cool, because from the park such persons, as Mrs. Masham had a mind to bring to her Majesty, could be let in privately by the garden. And when, (continues the Duchess of Marlborough) upon the death of the Prince, one would have thought, that her Majesty's real grief would have made her avoid every place and every object, that might sensibly revive the remembrance of her loss, she chose for her place of retirement his closet, and for some weeks spent many hours in it every day. I was amazed at this; and, when I spoke to her of it, she seemed surprized, just like a person, who on a sudden becomes sensible of her having done something she would not have done, had she duly considered. But the true reason of her Majesty's chusing this closet to sit in, was, that the back-stairs belonging to it came from Mrs. Masham's lodgings, who by that means could secretly bring to her whom she pleased. And that a correspondence was thus carried on with Mr. Harley, became every day more and more manifest by the difficulties and objections, which her Majesty had learnt to raise against almost every thing proposed by her Ministers. Nay, it is well known, that Mr. Harley and his Associates, when at length they had compassed their designs, and got into the management of affairs, did often (both in their cups and out of them) boast, that they, while the Queen's Ministers were asleep, were frequently at Court, giving advice in secret, how to perplex them in all their measures.

But they were much mistaken, if they imagined, that “alarmed our enemies, that they are drawing “more troops daily to that side, for the defence “of their own country. And therefore her “Majesty hopes you will have so right a sense “of our present advantages, as to enable her “Majesty to make a considerable augmentation “for preserving and improving them, which,

 “by the continuance of God’s blessing on our “arms, must soon put a glorious period to this “long and expensive war.

“As to the condition of the fleet, we have
 “it in command from her Majesty to acquaint
 “you, that the constant and remote services, “in which the ships have been employed, have “made a greater sum than usual requisite, as “well for the extraordinary repairs, as the build“ing of new ships. And the taking of Port-

 “Supplies for those ends; and likewise, for the “carrying on such fortifications for the security “of our Ports, and extinguishing the enemy’s “hopes of profiting by disturbances in Scotland, “as you shall think fit.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

“The Union is esteemed by her Majesty to “be so happy and great a part of the successes

“of her Reign; and her Majesty hath so much
 “at heart the confirming and improving it,
 “that she is pleased to command us, to remind “you of preparing such bills, as shall be “thought conducive to that end; and particu“larly to make the laws of both parts of “Great-Britain agree, as near as may be, for “the common interest of both people, especi“ally as to those laws, which relate to criminal “cases and proceedings, and settling the Militia
 “on the same foot throughout the United “Kingdom.

“Her Majesty is graciously pleased we should “also assure you, that if you can propose any “means for the improvement of our trade or “manufactures, or better employment of the “poor, her Majesty will take the greatest satis“faction in enacting such provisions; there be“ing nothing she so earnestly desires, as that “God would bless her with more and more op“portunities of doing all possible good to so “well deserving a people, so firm and affectio“nate to her interests.

“And as her Majesty doth not doubt, by “God’s blessing and your good affections, to “continue to defeat the designs of the Preten- “der, and his open or secret Abettors; so her “Majesty will always endeavour, on her part,
 “to make her people happy to such a degree,
 “as that none (except of desperate fortunes) “shall enter into measures for the disturbance
 “of her Government, the Union, or the Pro“testant Succession, as by law established, with“out acting at the same time manifestly against “their own true and lasting interest, as well as “their duty.”

Both Houses immediately resolved upon ad-

that their proceedings at the time I am speaking of were so intirely covered. The Ministers were fully convinced of the truth, and frequently repmented to her Majesty, what a discouragement it was to them in their endeavours for her service, to find, that she had no confidence in them, but was influenced by the counsel of others, who counter-worked them in every instance. Upon this subject I myself wrote and spoke a great deal to her with my usual plainness and zeal. But finding, not only that I could make no impression on her in this respect, but that her change towards me in particular was every day more and more apparent, I at length went to her, and begged to know what my crime was, that had wrought in her so great an alteration. This drew from the Queen a letter, dated October 26, 1709, wherein she charges me with imbecility (as her word is) against poor Malham; and with having nothing so much at heart as the ruin of my cousin. In speaking of the misunderstanding betwixt her Majesty and me, she says, they are for nothing, that she knows of, but because she cannot see with my eyes, and hear with my ears. And adds, That it is impossible for me to recover her former kindness, but that she shall behave herself to me, as the Duke of Marlborough’s wife, and her Groom of the Stole. This declaration to plain and express of her Majesty’s thorough change towards me was the more extraordinary, as in this same letter are these words: You have asked me once or twice, if you had committed any fault, that I was so changed; and I told you, no, because I do not think it a crime in any one not to be of my mind. Upon the receipt of this letter, I immediately set myself to draw up a long narrative of a series of faithful services for about twenty-six years past; of the great sense the Queen formerly had of my services; of the great favour I had been honoured with on account of them; of the use I had made of that favour; and of my losing it now by the artifice of my enemies, and particularly of one, whom I had raised out of the dust. And, knowing how great a respect her Majesty had for the writings of certain eminent divines, I added to my narrative the directions given by the Author of the Whole Duty of Man with relation to friendship; the directions in the Common-Prayer-Book before the Communion with regard to reconciliation, together with the rules laid down by Bishop Taylor upon the same head: And I concluded with giving my word to her Majesty, that if, after reading these, she would please only to answer in two words, that she was still of the same opinion, as when she wrote that harsh letter, which occasioned her this trouble, I would never more give her the least trouble upon any subject, but the business of my office, as long as I should have the honour to continue her servant; assuring her, that, however she might be changed towards me, and how much soever we might still differ in opinion, I should ever remember, that she was my Mistress and my Queen, and should always pay her the respect due from a faithful servant and dutiful subject. I sent from St. Albans this narrative, which she promised to read and answer. And, ten days after, writing to me upon another occasion, she said she had not leisure yet to read all my papers, but, when she had, she would send me some answer. But none ever came, nor had my papers any apparent effect on her Majesty, except that, after my coming to town, as she was passing by me, in order to receive the Communion, she looked with much good nature, and very graciously smiled upon me. But the smile and pleasant look, I had reason afterwards to think, were given to Bishop Taylor and the Common-Prayer-Book, and not to me.

The Proceedings in both Houses this Session were agreeable to the directions given at Court; for, the Court being now joined with the Whigs, they had a clear majority in every thing: All elections were judged in favour of Whigs, and Courtiers, but with so much partiality, that those, who had formerly made loud complaints of the injustice of the Tories, in determining elections, when they were a majority, were not so much as out of countenance, when they were reproached for the same thing: They pretended they were in a state of war with the Tories, so that it was reasonable to retaliate this to them, on the account of their former proceedings: But this did not satisfy just and upright men, who would not do to others, that which they had complained of, when it was done to them, or to their friends (1).

The chief business of this Session was concerning the supply, the Scotch elections and invasion, the naturalization of foreign Protestants, and the trials of treasons in Scotland.

The supplies, that were demanded, were granted very unanimously in the House of Commons, not only for maintaining the force then on foot, but for an augmentation of ten thousand men more. This was thought necessary to press the war with more strength, as the surest way to bring on a speedy peace. The States agreed to the like augmentation on their side. The French, according to their usual vanity, gave out, that they had great designs in view the next campaign: And it was confidently reported by the Jacobites, that a new invasion was designed both in Scotland and on Ireland. The whole supply, voted by the Commons for the service of the year 1709, amounted to above seven millions. The land-tax of four shillings in the pound, and the duty on malt, were readily agreed to; but it took some time to find funds for the rest, and it would have proved a very difficult matter, if the Bank of England had not offered to circulate two millions five hundred thousand pounds in Exchequer bills for the Government, on condition the time for their continuance was enlarged twenty-one years from August 1, 1711, and their stock of two millions, two hundred and one thousand, one hundred and seventy-one pounds was doubled by a new subscription. The Commons, agreeing to the proposal, addressed the Queen 1709. to issue out a Commission under the great Seal for taking the subscriptions; which being done, the books were opened at Mercers-Hall, on the 22d of February, about nine in the morning, and by one o'clock in the afternoon the whole sum of two millions, two hundred and one thousand, one hundred and seventy-one pounds (at the rate of an hundred and fifteen pounds for every hundred pound) was subscribed. Such was the crowd of people, that brought their money to this new fund, that it was believed a million more would have been subscribed before night, if there had been room. This shewed both the wealth of the Nation and their entire confidence in the Government. It was observable, at this very juncture, the French Court had a project for erecting a Royal Bank for circulating their Mini-bills, but the design was soon found to be impracticable, because of the great scarcity of money in that Kingdom, and the almost entire ruin of their public credit. By this subscription, and by a further prolongation of the general mortgage of the revenue, the Commons created good funds for answering all the money they had voted in the beginning of the Session. The two third subsidy was appropriated for the interest of the money raised by the Bank-cheme.

The Scotch Elections occasioned great debates in both Houses. The Commons, on the 3d of December, took into consideration that part of the act of Union, which relates to the election of Members to serve in that House for Scotland. The petitions and representations, concerning the incapacity of the eldest sons of Scots Peer to sit in the Parliament of Great-Britain, were read, and Council heard upon it. The substance both of these representations and the Council's arguments, was, 'That by an act of the Scots Parliament, intitled, An act for settling the manner of electing sixteen Peers and forty-five Commoners, to represent Scotland in the Parliament of Great-Britain, which act was ratified by the act for uniting the two Kingdoms, it is declared, That none shall be capable to elect, or be elected, to represent a Shire or Burgh in the Parliament of Great-Britain for this part of the united Kingdom, except such as are now capable to elect, or be elected, as Commissioners for Shires or Burghs to the Parliament of Scotland.' That from hence it evidently followed, that the Scots Peers eldest sons could not sit in the House of Commons of Great-Britain, unless it did appear, that they were capable to be elected, and sit as Members of the Parliament of Scotland. But, as a proof of the contrary, several instances were alledged of their being

(1) It was proposed, that all questions at the trial of elections should (if any Member insisted on it) be determined by ballot, but it was carried in the negative. The House, having heard the merits of the contested election for the City of Westminster, sent Huggins, then High-Bailiff, to Newgate, for refusing to tender the oaths of Abjuration; and voted Thomas Medlicot, Esq; who was set up by the Tories, in opposition to Sir Henry Dutton Colt, to be duly elected for that City, Yeas 154, Notes 142. Several accidents happened to Sir Henry's disadvantage in that contest, in which the Whigs, for the most part, favoured him, though they did not much esteem or love him, otherwise than as he was a man of Revolution-principles. Huggins is the same person, that lay lately so long in Newgate for a criminal case, in the exercise of the Office of Warden of the Fleet. On the other hand, Sir Simon Harcourt having been returned for Abington, and Mr. John Hicks having lodged a petition against him, the cause was argued, and the debates continued till two in the morning, on the 28th of January, when Mr. Hicks carried it by a great majority. Sir Simon took his leave of the House with a speech, which he began with asserting: 'Whatever the determination of this House may be, this I am sure of, and it must be admitted, that I am as duly elected for the borough of Abington as ever any man was.'

1708. bate it was carried, that the oaths were duly tendered to them. Some other exceptions were proved and admitted; the returns of some, certifying that they had taken the oaths, were not sealed; and some had signed these without subscribing witnesses. Other exceptions were offered from provisions, which the law of Scotland had made, with relation to bonds and other deeds, which had not been observed in making of proxies. But the House of Lords did not think these were of that importance, as to vacate the proxies on that account. After a full hearing, and a debate, which lasted many days, there was but one of the Peers, who were returned, that was found not duly elected, and only one of the petitioning Lords was brought into the House; the Marquis of Annandale was received, and the Marquis of Lothian was set aside.

A faction among the Scots in Parliament.
Burnet. The Scots Members in both Houses were divided into factions. The Duke of Queensberry had his party still depending upon him. He was in such credit with the Lord-Treasurer and the Queen, that all the posts in Scotland were given to persons recommended by him. The chief Ministers at Court seemed to have laid it down for a maxim not to be departed from, to look carefully to elections in Scotland; that the Members returned from thence might be in an intire dependance on them, and be either Whigs or Tories, as they should shift sides. The Duke of Queensberry was made third Secretary of State: He had no foreign Province assigned him, but Scotland was left to his management. The Dukes of Hamilton, Montrose, and Roxburg had set themselves in an opposition to his power, and had carried many elections against him. The Lord Sommers and the Earl of Sunderland supported them, but could not prevail with the Lord-Treasurer to bring them into an equal share of the Administration. This had almost occasioned a breach; for the Whigs, though they went on in a Conjunction with the Lord-Treasurer, yet continued still to be jealous of him.

Burnet. The bill for naturalizing all Protestant Foreigners was also the subject of great debates this Session. Since the revocation of the edict of Nantz, so fatal to France by the decrease of her trade, and the loss of numberless subjects, England abounded with French Protestants. They had indeed been well received, but with much more reserve than in the United Provinces, Brandenburg, and Prussia. They had however done all the service they could, and the English themselves had not behaved with more bravery and resentment against France than these Refugees.

For ever excluded from their native country, 1708. they had long been seeking to be incorporated by an act of naturalization with a people, to whom they had fled for refuge. But their endeavours had hitherto proved ineffectual. The present Parliament, wherein the Whigs had the majority, whose maxim it was to countenance foreign Protestants, at length granted their desire. For, on the 5th of February, Mr. Wortley Montague made a motion for a bill for naturalizing foreign Protestants, and, in a set speech, shewed the advantages, that would accrue to the Nation by such an act; alledging, amongst other particulars, "the example of the King of Prussia, who had not only invited, but furnished abundance of French Refugees with means to settle in his Dominions; wheteby "he had fertilized an almost barren country, improved trade, and vastly increased his revenue." Adding, "That if Foreigners were induced to settle under a despotic Government, where they found protection and encouragement, they would undoubtedly be the more inclined to bring their effects, and at least their industry, into Great-Britain, where they would share the privileges of a Free Nation." Mr. Compton, and several other Members, supporting this motion, the House ordered the bill to be prepared and brought in.

Whilst this bill was depending, a paper was printed, and industriously dispersed, importing, 1st, That the confux of Aliens, as would probably be the effect of such a law, might prove dangerous to our Constitution; for these would owe allegiance to their respective Princes, and retain a fondness for their native countries; and therefore, whensoever a war should break out, might prove so many spies and enemies. And, besides this pretence, the professed enemies of our established Church and Religion might flock over, with design to effect its overthrow. 2dly, That a general naturalization might undoubtedly spread an universal disgust and jealousy throughout the Nation; there having been many complaints and commotions in London, and elsewhere, on occasion of Foreigners. 3dly, That the design of inviting multitudes of Aliens to settle here, might prove in time a further mischief; for they would not only be capable of voting at elections, but also of being chosen Members of Parliament; have admission into places of trust and authority, which, in process of time, might endanger our antient Polity and Government, and, by frequent intermarriages, go a great way to blot out and extinguish the English race (1).

(1) Several other reasons were urged, as 4. That antiently naturalizations by act of Parliament were seldom or never made, but upon special reasons, and for particular occasions. And though some acts have given encouragement to foreign Merchants and Weavers to settle here; it was when our weaving-trade, and other manufactures, were inconsiderable, to the advancement they have since attained: And that from the settlement of the great customs in Edward the First's time, in all acts of Parliament for subsidies since passed, Aliens had always been charged with an increase of customs above natives, and a discrimination kept up between them; as was particularly remarked by the learned Lord-Chief-Justice Hale, in a Tract against a general Naturalization. 5. That it was more than probable, that the greatest number, that would come over, would be of poor people, which would be of fatal consequence with respect to the many poor industrious families, who would thereby be reduced to the uttermost straits; it being evident, that no hands were wanted to carry on our manufactures, from the great quantities, that lay on hand, their cheapness, and the lowness of wages now given. What then would be the effect of such an addition? For these Aliens would altogether settle in places of manufacture; there being no instances of any of the late Refugees betaking themselves to the spade, plough, or sail. And it would be a very great charge to those parishes, wherein they should settle; there being now great numbers of French, who for want of work were relieved, and, in a great measure,

1708.
Reasons
for it.

The Majority of the House easily discerned the fallacy of these popular arguments, being thoroughly convinced, both by their own observation, and the reasons alledged both within and without the walls, that (as the preamble of the bill set forth) the increase of people is a means of advancing the wealth and strength of a Nation: This maxim was abundantly verified, not only in Prussia, Holland, and other Protestant Countries, which had greatly increased in riches by the French Refugees settling there, but principally in Great-Britain, where, by the industry of the Refugees, several new manufactures had been set up, and others improved, to the great advancement of trade, and the total turning the balance thereof, to the prejudice of France, and the benefit of this Nation. That, besides the improvement of commerce, the French Refugees had greatly contributed towards the support of the Revolution Settlement, by putting the best part of their own substance, and of their friends and relations abroad, into the public funds; of which they had a fresh instance, in subscribing near five hundred thousand pounds into the Bank of England; so that, by a modest computation, the Refugees were reckoned to have above two millions sterling in the Government. That, as they could not be supposed to have brought one half of that money into England, so it was prudence to divert the thoughts they might have, upon the conclusion of the war, of carrying their vast gains abroad (which would very much lessen the current cash and credit of Great-Britain) by granting them the advantages and privileges enjoyed by her Majesty's natural-born subjects; which would not only engage them to settle here, but likewise bring over such of their friends and relations, as might hope to inherit their estates. That the French Refugees had at all times, in their several stations and capacities, given signal proofs of their love for our happy constitution, and of their zeal and affection for the Government: And, in particular, such of them, as had military employments, which they had discharged, both in the late and present war, with distinguishing bravery and conduct. That this war had already consumed such vast number of men, that it was highly necessary to supply that loss, by inviting Foreigners to come over, whether the war continued, which would still increase the scarcity of men; or whether it was drawing to a period; in which case a great number of hands would be requisite to carry on the manufactures. In short, that all the objections against a naturalization were grounded upon this false supposition, that Foreigners would ever continue, and be looked upon as such; which was sufficiently confuted by past and daily experience.

When those who were against the bill perceived they should have no strength, if they set themselves directly to oppose it, they studied to limit strangers, in the receiving the Sacrament, to the way of the Church of England. This probably would not have hindered many, who were otherwise disposed to come among us: For the much greater part of the French came into the way of our Church. But it was thought best to cast the door as wide open as possible, for encouraging of Strangers: And therefore since, upon their first coming over, some might chuse the way, to which they had been accustomed beyond sea, it seemed the more inviting method to admit of all who were in any Protestant Communion. Accordingly, the bill was measure, maintained by the Queen's bounty and charity of their Churches, and other well-disposed persons, who, when naturalized, would have recourse to their own respective parishes for an allowance. 6. That a general naturalization would, in effect, defeat the patent of the act of navigation, which had always been esteemed to conduce to the interest of the Nation, by the encouragement and increase of English Mariners, and advance of trade. 7. That hereby, in process of time, Aliens would be advanced in riches, and her Majesty's subjects impoverished; for those beneficial trades, buying and selling by commissions, remittances, and exchanges of money, would, in a great measure, be ingrossed by Foreigners, by reason of their many friends and relations abroad. Besides, such Aliens generally living in lodgings, and at little charge, frequently escaping public taxes and Parish duties, would be able to undersell and undermine the native Merchants. 8. That hereby the treasure of the Nation would be exhausted and remitted into foreign parts; for it might well be supposed, that those Aliens, that have valuable estates, could not or would not transport the greatest part thereof hither; and leaving children, and their nearest relations behind them, they would come hither only upon a design of getting riches, and to return home again therewith, particularly upon a prospect of war; an instance of which we have in the practice of our Merchants, who, when they have got estates abroad, constantly return home to enjoy the same. 9. That the Queen's customs would hereby be considerably diminished; for many statutes, which lay a greater duty on Aliens than on natives, would, as to this, be repealed. 10. That opportunity would hereby be given to Merchants, to colour the goods and merchandizes of other strangers beyond sea, their correspondents, friends, or relations, to the great detriment of her Majesty's customs, and trade of the native subjects; a practice which was offered to be proved before their late Majesties and the Lords of the Treasury: Which reasons did influence the judgments of our Ancestors, as appears by the statutes of 11 Hen. VII. c. 11. 11 Hen. VII. c. 14. 22 Hen. VIII. c. 8. 11. That the duties of package and scavage of the goods of all Merchants, as well Denizens as Aliens, were the indispensable right and inheritance of the Commonalty and Citizens of London, let to farm by lease (wherein were about eighteen years to come) for a fine of one thousand pounds, and the yearly rent of nine hundred and fifty pounds; and, among other things, were, by act of Parliament, charged towards the raising of eight thousand pounds per annum for ever to the Orphans, and other Creditors of the said City; which duties would be wholly lost, to the great prejudice of the said City, and would render them incapable to support the government of the same. 12. And in the last place, That, the Nation being now engaged in an expensive, though necessary war, taxes high, trade obstructed, great quantities of woollen, and other manufactures lay unfold; and, as an effect hereof, the several prices of making them very small, many families destitute of work throughout the Kingdom: What then, at such a time as this, must be the consequence of inviting hither, by a general naturalization, multitudes of poor Foreigners, who would only employ themselves in trade and manufactures?

About the same time the City of London having, on the 18th of February, petitioned the Commons, that they might be heard by their Council against the bill, and their request being granted, their Lawyers chiefly insisted on the 11th of the above-mentioned reasons; but upon examination it was found, that the duties of package and scavage did not, of late, yield above twenty pounds per annum, most of the Foreign Merchants having been already naturalized.

carried in the House of Commons by a great majority, for naturalizing all foreign Protestants, upon their taking the oaths to the Government, and receiving the Sacrament in any Protestant Church. All those, that appeared for this comprehensive way, were reproached for their coldness and indifference in the concerns of the Church. Of this the Bishop of Salisbury had a large share; for, when the bill was brought up to the Lords, he spoke copiously for it; whilst the Bishop of Chester spoke as zealously against it, who seemed resolved to distinguish himself as a zealot for that which was called High-Church. The bill passed with very little opposition, though it was protested against by several Lords, as prejudicial to trade and manufactures, and of ill consequence to our Liberties and Religion (1).

The other subjects of debate in this Session were, the inquiry into the Scotch invasion, and the trials of treason in Scotland. What gave rise to the great and long debates on these affairs was this: Upon the attempt made by the Pretender, many of the Nobility and Gentry of Scotland, who had all along adhered to that interest, were secured; and after the fleet was got back to Dunkirk, and the danger was over, they were ordered to be brought up prisoners to London; when they came, there was no evidence at all against them, so they were dismissed, and sent back to Scotland. No exceptions could be taken to the securing them, while there was danger: But, since nothing besides presumptions lay against them, the bringing them up to London, at such a charge, and under such a disgrace, was much censured, as an unreasonable and an unjust severity; and was made use of, to give that Nation a further aversion to the Union. That whole matter was managed by the Scotch Lords then in the Ministry, by which they both revenged themselves on some of their enemies, and made a shew of zeal for the Government; though such as did not believe them sincere in these professions, thought it was done on design to exasperate the Scots the more, and so to dispose them to wish for another invasion. The Whig Ministry in England disowned all these proceedings, and used the Scots prisoners so well, that they went down much inclined to concur with them: But the Lord Godolphin fatally adhered to the Scotch Ministers, and supported them, by which the advantage that might have been made from these severe proceedings was lost. Hence it was, that the Lords having ordered their Members to attend on the 10th of January, they took into consideration the state of the Nation, with respect to the late invasion of Scotland. The Lord Haversham opened the debate with a long speech, wherein he set forth, that the Nation expected an enquiry into this matter, in which not only their welfare, but their very being itself, the security of the Nation, and the safety of the Queen, were highly concerned. For the successes of their arms had not disabled the French King from making farther attempts. Besides, it was plain, his chief dependence in the late invasion was from the encouragement he had from hence; and yet, notwithstanding all enquiries, it was still a great mystery, who the persons were, that were concerned in that unnatural treason. It is true, several persons of great quality had been taken up on suspicion, but had any thing been proved against them? The French King had more encouragement than before to renew his attempt upon us, since the methods hitherto taken to discover the many friends he has among us had signified so little. Another encouragement was the defenceless condition of Scotland, the deficiency of forces, and ill state of the garrisons at the time of the invasion, notwithstanding the certain account we had of it. He concluded with saying, 'My Lords, if your Lordships have any intention of looking into this matter, I shall make your Lordships a motion, which perhaps may give us some light. It is, That her Majesty will please to order, that there may be laid before this House, at what time her Majesty received the first account of the intended invasion? What orders were thereupon issued into Scotland, with relation either to forces or garrisons? What was the number of regular troops and forces there at the time of this intelligence? What was the state of the garrisons there at that time? What augmentation was made, or forces sent thither, from the time of the intelligence, to the time of the invasion? What orders had been given with relation to the garrisons, and when, both before and since the invasion, from the time of the first intelligence?'

The Lord Haversham having ended this speech, several other Peers spoke to the same purpose. Whereupon the House appointed a Committee, to inquire into the state of the Nation in relation to the intended invasion, and ordered an address to be presented to the Queen, to desire, that the papers concerning that affair might be laid before them; which was readily complied with.

Not long after this address, the Lord Haversham opened, in the House of Lords, the account of the Scotch invasion in a much longer speech, wherein he observes, that the Lords, who seconded his motion for the papers to be laid before them, never so much as looked into them, or have mentioned the matter since; perhaps, they will say they never intended it, and that they called for the papers only to cover some design, or to try how an act of Grace will relish, to which, as he was innocent, he should not give his consent. As to the papers, he had looked into them, and, with their Lordships leave, would take notice of some particulars: Mr. Boyle received certain intelligence, the 23d of February, that the armament of Dunkirk was intended for Scotland; and the Queen, on the 25th, impowers her Privy-Council there to put her forces, forts and garrisons in the best order. There were not at that time above fifteen hundred men of regular forces in Scotland. Though this was an insufficient strength, and though the Parliament raised the establishment, December 20, 1707, from two thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, to five thousand nine hundred and thirty-two, yet there was little or no augmentation made, nor had the Council one shilling for necessary expences the 11th of March, nor so much

Enquiry into the invasion of Scotland. Pr. H. L. Pr. H. C.

He then proceeds to shew, that when Scotland was in this defenceless condition, what assistance they had from Osland, England, and Ireland. The transports from Osland did not arrive at Tinmouth-Bay, till ten days after the enemy were seen on the Scotch coast, so that the dispute, had there been any, would have been over before they could come up. As to the troops from England, they had not orders to march till the 14th of March, which, considering the length of the march from hence to Edinburgh, was certainly too long a delay. As for the troops from Ireland, the very orders to provide transports were not given by the Lord Sunderland till the 12th of March here, nor by the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, for the troops to be in a readiness till the 13th. Now, considering what time would be taken up in providing necessaries for transporting the troops, it seems very evident, that the Queen was not truly acquainted with the danger she was in, and that these forces must arrive in Scotland very late. He then took notice of the wretched state of the garrisons, particularly of the castles of Stirling, Blackness, and Dumbarton, and concluded with saying, 'I will not trouble you farther: I think this matter is now very plain before your Lordships, I could wish I had not said one word of truth, in what I have said to you; but the vouchers shew it to be so; and, if all this be true, it is a very strange, a very surprizing, and a very astonishing truth.'

I shall not move any thing to your Lordships farther, in this matter: I believe there has been enough now said, to justify those Lords for moving this enquiry, and shall add but this word, 'That if there be no greater care taken for the future than there was at this time of such imminent danger, it will be the greatest miracle in the world, if, without a miracle, the Pretender be not placed upon that Throne.'

This is the substance of what was observed by Lord Haverham, though there happened some interlocutions between him and another Lord; and some observations were made upon the papers as they were read. The Duke of Buckingham and several Peers spoke to the same purpose. Upon which it was ordered, that the affair should be considered the Tuesday following in a full House. But all ended in a joint address, as will presently be seen.

During these debates in the House of Lords, The Commons had also taken the affair of the invasion into consideration. Pursuant to an address they had presented to the Queen, Mr. Boyle laid before the House a state of the whole matter of the designed invasion of North-Britain; the proceedings against the late Lord Griffin and others taken in open rebellion, and also an account of the names of all those that were taken up, and the proceedings against them; and in what posture of defence the castles and garrisons of North-Britain were at that time, and now are. Not long after the Commons resolved to present another address to the Queen, 'That there might be laid before them a list of the ships of war employed on account of the late invasion, under Vice-Admiral Byng and Rear-Admiral Baker, and of the names of the Captains, who were employed in that expedition, and what journals had been delivered in relating to the same.' But after all these addresses, when the papers, relating to this affair, came to be considered, the House at length resolved, 'First, That orders were not issued for the marching of the troops in England until the fourteenth day of March, it being necessary for the security of her Majesty's Person and Government, that the troops in this part of the Kingdom should not march into Scotland, till there was certain intelligence, that the enemy intended to land in that part of the United Kingdom. Secondly, That timely and effectual care was taken by those employed under her Majesty, at the time of the intended invasion of Scotland, to disappoint the designs of her Majesty's enemies both at home and abroad, by fitting out a sufficient number of men of war, ordering a competent number of troops from Flanders, giving directions for the forces in Ireland to be ready for the assistance of the Nation, and by making the necessary and proper dispositions of the forces in England.' Pursuant to these resolutions an address was drawn up, and presented to the Queen with the concurrence of the Lords (1).

'That the same papers being laid before the House of Commons, pursuant to their address, produced the like observations there, and that the Scott Gentlemen concurred with the English, in blaming the conduct of the Ministry; affirming it was such, as gave great encouragement to the enemies of the Government; while its friends look'd on their country to be perfectly given up. This, they said, was their general sense. In the House of Commons, some observations were also made upon the imprisoning many persons in Scotland at that time; several Lords and Gentlemen of the best quality and estates were apprehended and seized, by virtue of warrants sent from hence for suspicion of treason and treasonable practices; though it does not appear from the papers, that there was any cause to suspect; nor that any of their countrymen (who were the properest persons to be advised with on this occasion) were consulted in it. For the Earl of Mar in his letter to the Earl of Leven, March 9, writes, That he, with the Dukes of Queensberry and Montrose, the Earls of Loudon and Seafeld, was summoned to the Cabinet, and were told there, that since both Houses had, for securing suspected persons, suspended the Habeas Corpus act, it was fit, persons in Scotland should be apprehended; and a list was read to them, which they took down in writing, and warrants were ready drawn. This was certainly a very extraordinary way of proceeding, and the more extraordinary, because the greatest part of the Lords and Gentlemen, taken up by these warrants, had given undoubted testimonies ever since the Revolution (in which some of them had been very active and instrumental) of their fidelity and good affection to the Government; they had taken all oaths, that have been enjoined for their security; they had sat in Parliament; and some of them had been in offices and employments of great trust in the Reign of King William and of her Majesty. Proceedings on the

cerning trial of treason in Scotland.
Pr H. L.
Burnet.

The consideration of the state of the Nation, with respect to the late invasion, gave occasion to a bill concerning trials of treasons in Scotland, under the title of an act for improving the Union of the two Kingdoms. This bill caused very great and long debates, and sprung from the proceedings against the suspected persons in Scotland, and particularly from a trial of some Gentlemen of that Kingdom, who had left their houses, when the Pretender was on the sea, and had gone about armed, and in so secret and suspicious a manner, that it gave great cause of jealousy. There was no clear evidence to convict them; but there were very strong, if not violent presumptions against them. Some forms in the trial had not been observed, which the criminal Court judged were necessary, and not to be dispensed with. But the Queen's Advocate, Sir James Stewart, was of another mind. The Court thought it was necessary by their laws, that the names of the witnesses should have been signified to the prisoners fifteen days before the trial. But the Queen's Advocate had not complied with this, as to the chief witnesses, so that the Court could not hear their Evidence. He did not, upon that, move for a delay; and therefore the trial went on, and the Gentlemen were acquitted. Severe expostulations passed between the Queen's Advocate and the Court. They complained of one another to the Queen, and both sides justified their complaints in print. Upon this it appeared, that the laws in Scotland concerning trials in cases of treason were not fixed nor certain. For which reason a bill was brought into the House of Commons to settle that matter; but it was so much opposed by the Scots Members, that it was dropped in the Committee. It was taken up and managed with more zeal by the Lords.

of the act.

It consisted of three heads: All crimes, which were high-treason by the law of England, and these only, were to be high-treason in Scotland. The manner of proceeding settled in England was to be observed in Scotland; and the pains and forfeitures were to be the same in both Nations. The Scots Lords opposed every branch of this act. They moved, that all things, that were high-treason by the law of England, might be enumerated in the act, for the information of the Scots Nation; otherwise they must study the book of Statutes, to know when they were safe, and when they were guilty. To this it was answered, that directions would be given to the Judges, to publish an abstract of the laws of high-treason, which would be a sufficient information to the people of Scotland in this matter. That Nation would by this means be in a much safer condition than they were now; for the laws, they had, were conceived in such general words, that the Judges might put such constructions on them, as should serve the ends of a bad Court; but they would by this act be restrained in this matter for the future.

The second head in this bill occasioned a much longer debate: It changed the whole method of proceedings in Scotland. The former way there was, the Queen's Advocate signed a citation of the persons, setting forth the special matter of high-treason, of which they were accused. This was to be delivered to them, together with the names of the witnesses, fifteen days before the trial. When the Jury was impanelled, no peremptory challenges were allowed: Reasons were to be offered with every challenge; and, if the Court allowed them, they were to be proved immediately. Then the matter of the charge, which is there called the relevancy of the libel, was to be argued by lawyers, whether the matter, suppose it should be proved, did amount to high-treason, or not. This was determined by a sentence of the Court, called the Interloquitur; and the proof of the fact was not till then to be made. Of that the Jury had the cognizance. Antiently the verdict went with the majority, the number being fifteen; but by a late act the verdict was to be given upon the agreement of two third parts of the Jury. In the sentence, the law did not limit the Judges to a certain form, but they could aggravate the punishment, or moderate it, according to the circumstances of the case. All this method was to be set aside; a Grand Jury was to find the bill; the Judges were only to regulate proceedings, and to declare what the law was; and the whole matter of the indictment was to be left intire to the Jury, who were to be twelve, and all to agree in their verdict.

In one particular, the forms of Scotland were much preferable to those in England; the depositions of the witnesses were taken indeed by word of mouth, but were writ out, and after that were signed by the witnesses; they were sent in to the Jury; and these were made a part of the record. This was very slow and tedious; but like circumstances were taken up by warrants, bearing date the 29th of March, when the danger was over; which made the Scots Gentlemen very free in declaring, that the taking them up could be for no other reason, than to influence the approaching elections to Parliament; and for their disaffection to the interests some Courtiers then promoted, rather than for their disaffection to her Majesty's Person and Government, in which they were the more confirmed, because they saw there was no evidence in the papers against any of them. There was indeed some evidence of high-treason pretended against five Gentlemen, taken up by warrants from the Privy-Council of Scotland; but that was such, as the Lord Advocate writes, neither he nor the other Advocates employed for her Majesty, did think would convict them; and therefore humbly offered it as their opinion, that it would be more for the honour and service of her Majesty, and of her Government, that they should not be prosecuted. The Earl of Sunderland, in his answer, acquainted him, he had laid his memorial before her Majesty, who was well satisfied with what he had done, in procuring evidence against the prisoners; and though possibly, upon their trial, the evidence might not be sufficient to convict them by the law of Scotland, yet considering all the circumstances of that affair, and the noise it has made in the world, her Majesty thought it absolutely necessary for her service, that it be carried as far as it will bear. Accordingly, they were brought upon their trials, and acquitted. After all the observations made upon the papers, the consideration of them ended in the House of Commons, in the resolution above-mentioned. The Gentlemen, that were against this resolution, desired, that all the papers laid before the House, relating to the intended invasion of Scotland, might be printed, that the world might see and judge, how well-grounded it was. But those, who had justified the Ministry in their debates, and voted for the resolution, would not suffer the papers to be printed, so that the question was carried in the negative.¹

1708-9. but the Jury, by this means, was more certainly possessed of the evidence, and the matter was more clearly delivered down to posterity; whereas the records in England are very defective, and give no light to an Historian, who peruses them.

The Scots opposed this alteration of their way of proceeding: They said, that neither the Judges, the Advocates, nor the Clerks would know how to manage a trial of treason. They insisted most on the having the names of the witnesses to be given to the persons some days before their trial. It seemed reasonable, that a man should know who was to be brought to witness against him, that so he might examine his life, and see what credit ought to be given to him. On the other hand it was said, this would open a door to practice, either upon the witnesses to corrupt them, or in suborning other witnesses to defame them. To this it was answered, that a guilty man knew what could be brought against him; and, without such notice, would take all the methods possible to defend himself. But provision ought to be made for innocent men, whose chief guilt might be a good estate, upon which a favourite might have an eye: And therefore such persons ought to be taken care of. This was afterwards so much softened, that it was only desired, that the names of the witnesses, who had given evidence to the Grand Jury, should, upon their finding the bill, be signified to the prisoner five hours before his trial. Upon a division of the House on this question, the votes were equal; and therefore by the rule of the House, that in such a case the negative prevails, it was lost.

Upon the third head of the bill the debates grew still warmer. In Scotland many families were settled by long entails and perpetuities; and therefore it was said, that since, by one of the articles of the Union, all private rights were still preserved, no breach could be made on these settlements. Bishop Burnet carried this further; he thought, that it was neither just nor reasonable to set the children on begging for their fathers faults: That the Romans, during their liberty, never thought of carrying punishments so far: That it was an invention, under the tyranny of the Emperors, who had a particular revenue called the Fife (1); and all forfeitures were claimed by them, from whence they were called Confiscations: That it was never the practice of Free Governments: That Boulogne flourished beyond any town in the Pope's dominions, because they made it an article of their capitulation with the Pope, that no confiscation should follow on any crime whatsoever: That in Holland the confiscation was redeemable by so very small a sum, as an hundred guilders (2). That many instances might be brought of prosecutions, only to obtain the confiscation. But in this none of the Lords seconded the Bishop. It was acknowledged, that this was just and reasonable, and fit to be passed in good times; but, since the Nation was then exposed to so much danger from abroad, it did not seem advisable to abate the security of the law. But clauses were agreed to, by which, upon marriages, settlements might be made in Scotland, as was practiced in England, for no estate is forfeited for the crime of him who is only tenant for life. By this act also tortures were condemned, and the Queen was empowered to grant Commissions of Oyer and Terminer, as in England, for trying treasons. The Scots insisted on this, that the Justiciary of the criminal Court being preserved by an article of the Union, this broke in upon that. It was answered, that the criminal Court was still to sit in the time regulated; but these Commissions were granted upon special occasions. In the intervals between the terms, it might be necessary, upon some emergency, not to delay trials too long. But, to give some content, it was provided by a clause, that a Judge of the criminal Court should be always one of the Quorum in these Commissions. Thus the bill passed in the House of Lords, notwithstanding the opposition of all the Scots Lords, with whom many of the Tories concurred, they being disposed to oppose the Court in every thing, and to make treason as little to be dreaded as possible.

The bill met with the same opposition in the House of Commons; yet it passed with two amendments. By one, the names of the witnesses, who had appeared before the Grand Jury, were ordered to be sent to the prisoner ten days before his trial. The other was, that no estate in land was to be forfeited upon a judgment of high-treason; which came up fully to the motion, which Bishop Burnet had made. Both these amendments were looked on as such popular things, that it was not probable, that the House of Commons would recede from them. Upon that the Whigs in the House of Lords Proceedings on the bill in the House of Commons.

(1) This remark of Bishop Burnet is clearly overthrown by the Author of an excellent piece, published this present year 1745, and intitled, Some considerations on the law of forfeitures for high-treason, occasioned by a clause in a late act, for making it treason to correspond with the Pretender's sons, or any of their Agents, &c. in which the law of forfeitures is justified from the principles of Natural Justice, the practice and genius of the freest States, the constitution of the English Government, with a perspicuity, force, and comprehension of reasoning, not to be found in any other discourse on that subject. This Writer opposes to the Bishop's observation, concerning the Roman Fife, the words of Cujacius ad L. Jul. Maj. Ejus erat Populi, nunc Imperatoris; which intimates, "That forfeitures was a known punishment during the Republic. It was then called Bonorum Publicatio. But the Bishop seems to have been misled by the late origin of the word, to imagine the thing itself was introduced no earlier."

(2) The Author of some considerations on the law of forfeitures, p. 39, takes notice of this assertion as a mistake in Bishop Burnet, and observes, "That the contrary is well known; and that it would be to turn legal punishments of high crimes into a jest, were a redemption of that kind allowed. This is not only the case in the separate administration of many of the Provinces, but we are told by one of the best Writers, on the Constitution of the Low-Countries [Jamison, Vol. I. p. 183.] that the Council of State condemns any Officer, who abuses a public trust in the finances, the armies, the negotiations, or justice of the Republic, to the heaviest penalties by fine, suited to the crime, the exigency, and example. And it is much the same thing to the children of a criminal, whether the fortune of the family be taken from them by judgment of intire forfeiture, or by a discretionary sentence condemning to a severe fine, which may equal or exceed the value of it."

Lords did not think fit to oppose them, nor to join the bill; and therefore it was moved to agree to these amendments, with this proviso, moved by the Lord Sommers, that they should not take place till after the death of the Pretender. It was said, that, since he assumed the title of King of Great-Britain, and had so lately attempted to invade the Nation, it was not reasonable to lessen the punishment and the dread of treason, as long as he lived. Others objected to this, that there would be still a Pretender after him, since so many persons stood in the lineal descent before the House of Hanover, so that this proviso seemed to be, upon the matter, the rejecting the amendment. But it was observed, that to pretend to the right of succeeding was a different thing from assuming the title, and attempting an invasion. The amendment was received with this proviso; but those, who were against the whole bill, did not agree to it. The House of Commons consented to the proviso, which the Lords had added to their amendment, with a further addition, that it should not take place till three years after the House of Hanover should succeed to the Crown.

The bill
both Houses.

This met with great opposition; it was considered as a distinguishing character of those, who were for or against the present Constitution and the Succession; the Scots still opposing it on the account of the former laws. Both parties collected their strength, and many, who had gone into the country, were brought up on this occasion; so that the bill, with all the amendments and provisos, was carried by a small majority; the Lords agreeing to this new amendment. The Scots Members in both Houses seemed to apprehend, that the bill would be very odious in their country; and therefore, to maintain their interest at home, they who were divided in every thing else, did agree in opposing this bill.

Grace.

The Court apprehended from the heat, with which the debates were managed, and the difficulty in carrying the bill through both Houses, that ill-disposed men would endeavour to possess people with apprehensions of bad designs and severities, that would be set on foot; and therefore resolved to have an act of Grace immediately upon it. It was the first the Queen had sent, though she had now reigned above seven years. The Ministers, for their own sakes, took care, that it should be very full. It was indeed fuller than any former act of Grace. All treasons committed before the signing the act, which was the 19th of April, were pardoned, those only excepted that were done upon the sea. By this they, who had embarked with the Pretender, were still at mercy. This act, according to form, was read once in both Houses, and with the usual compliments of thanks.

Besides these, there were other things of less importance passed this Session.

Webb

Pr. H. C.

The injury done to Major-General Webb, after the battle of Wynendale, having made a great noise, the Leaders of the Tory party readily seized this opportunity, both to do him justice, and, at the same time, to expose the partiality of those in power. Sir Thomas Hanmer therefore made a motion, on the 13th of December, "That the thanks of the House be given to Major-General Webb, for the great and eminent services performed by him at the battle of Wynendale;" which was unanimously carried in the affirmative. The Major-General being then in the House, the Speaker gave him, in his place, the thanks of the House; which he acknowledged in a very handsome and modest speech, saying, among other things, "That he valued the honour done him by the Commons above the greatest rewards." This gave Mr. Bromley occasion to say, "That he did not disapprove the custom, which, of late years, had been introduced, of returning thanks to such Generals, as had performed eminent services; especially when they received those compliments as modestly, as the worthy Member, to whom they were now given, had done. But it was with grief, he observed, that a certain Commander, on whom not only the thanks of the House, but also great rewards had been bestowed, appeared yet to be unsatisfied." This reflection was visibly levelled at the Duke of Marlborough, who, about that very time, was attacked in two pieces, which were printed, and industriously spread about, the one intitled, A speech of Caius Memmius, Tribune to the people of Rome, translated from Sallust; the other intitled, An account of a dream at Harwich.

On the other hand, the same day that an address was voted by the Commons for such treaties and agreements, as had been made for contributions, it was unanimously resolved, "That the Commons of Great-Britain being truly sensible, not only of the great and eminent services performed by his Grace the Duke of Marlborough the last successful campaign, so much to the honour of Great-Britain, and advantage of all Europe, but also of the indefatigable zeal he persevered in for the service of the common cause abroad, while he might, with reason, expect to be received with all the marks of honour and satisfaction at home, did, with a just regard to his glorious actions, return him the thanks of the House, and ordered their Speaker to transmit the same to his Grace." This being done, the Duke of Marlborough returned an answer, dated from Brussels, February the 13th 1709, importing, "That he was extremely sensible of the great honour, which the House of Commons had done him, in the vote the Speaker had been pleased to transmit to him by their order: "That nothing could give him more satisfaction, than to find the services, he endeavoured to do the Queen and his Country, so acceptable to the House of Commons: And he begged the favour of the Speaker to assure them, he should never think any pains or perseverance too great, if he might, by God's blessing, be instrumental in procuring a safe and honourable peace for her Majesty and his Fellow-subjects."

Moreover, when the news of the reduction of Ghent was brought over, both Houses presented an address to the Queen, wherein the Duke of Marlborough was mentioned with honour. In this address, "they congratulated her upon the last great effort of this glorious year; a year, that would be ever famous in history, as well for the intire disappointment of all the attempts and hopes of her enemies, as for the wonderful successes, with which God had blessed the arms of her Majesty and her Allies." Adding, "That the unusual length of the campaign, the variety of events, and the difficulty

Address for demolishing of Dunkirk. Pr. H. L. Pr. H. C.

The Duke of Marlborough being arrived, after a dangerous passage from Offend, came to London the 1st of March, whilst the Lords were sitting; the Lord-Chancellor, by order of the House, returned him thanks for the eminent services performed by him the last campaign. As he was supposed to bring over proposals of peace, the Lord Sommers moved for an address to be presented to the Queen, that she would be pleased to take care, at the conclusion of the war, that the French King might be obliged to own her Title and the Protestant Succession, and that the Pretender might be removed out of the French Dominions; which being unanimously approved, the address was sent down to the Commons, where Mr. Boyle represented, "That the British Nation having been at a vast expence of blood and treasure, for the prosecution of this necessary war, it was but just they should reap some benefit by the peace: And the town of Dunkirk being a nest of pirates, that infested the Ocean, and did infinite mischief to trade, he therefore moved, That the demolishing of its fortifications and harbour be insisted upon in the address:" Which, with that amendment, was unanimously approved, and carried back to their Lordships by Mr. Secretary Boyle. The Lord-Chancellor, on the part of the Peers, and the Speaker of the Commons, on the part of the Commons, having attended the Queen with the said address, her Majesty told them, "That she was of the same opinion with her two Houses of Parliament, in the several particulars of that address; as she had also been in all the other which they had made on the same subject;" assuring them, "no care should be wanting on her part, to attain the ends they had desired." This address of both Houses was highly acceptable to the whole Nation, and to all our Allies.

An order having been made, on the 13th of January, by the Privy-Council, in pursuance of her Majesty's pleasure to them, signified, "That in the Form of Prayer, with Thanksgiving to Almighty God, to be used in all Churches and Chapels every year upon the eighth day of March (being the day, on which her Majesty began her happy Reign) in the prayer at the Communion Service, immediately before the reading of the Epistle, for the Queen, as Supreme Governor of this Church, these words following be left out: And, that these blessings may be continued to after-ages, make the Queen, we pray thee, an happy mother of children; who, being educated in thy true faith and fear, may happily succeed in the Government of these Kingdoms." This order seeming to intimate, that the Queen designed to pass the remainder of her life in widowhood; Mr. Watson, son to the Lord Rockingham, moved, on the 25th of January, in the House of Commons, "That

1708-9. "an humble address be presented to her Majesty, that she would not suffer her just grief so far to prevail; but would have such indulgence to the hearty desires of her subjects, as to entertain thoughts of a second marriage." This motion, being seconded and supported by several young Members, was unanimously carried, and a Committee was appointed to draw up the address; which being agreed to, and the Lords having given their concurrence to the same, was the next day presented to the Queen by the Speakers of the two Houses. The Queen was not a little surprized at this unexpected address; to which she returned an answer, importing, "That the frequent marks of duty and affection, she had received from both Houses of Parliament, must needs be very acceptable to her: That the provision she had made for the Protestant Succession, would always be a proof, how much she had at heart the future happiness of the Kingdom: But that the subject of this address was of such a nature, that she was persuaded they did not expect a particular answer." However the Commons, on the 29th, voted their thanks for this answer.

A bill was brought into the House of Commons, for the exportation of tobacco, and other commodities and manufactures of the growth and product of Great-Britain; the design of which was, to exchange tobacco for French wines. But the Portuguese Ambassador having, by a memorial, represented to her Majesty, and by word of mouth to several Members without doors, that such a bill was contrary to the Alliance between her Majesty and the King his Master; and it being considered, besides, that such an exchange would redound to the advantage of France, and to the benefit of five or six persons in Great-Britain only, the bill was dismissed, by putting off the consideration of it for a month. And, on the other hand, a bill was ordered to be brought in, for the more effectual prohibiting the importation of French wines, and all other commodities of the growth and product of France.

It may here be observed, that our trade was now very high, and was carried on every where with advantage, but no where more than at Lisbon: For the Portuguese were so happy, in their Dominions in America, that they discovered vast quantities of gold in their mines, and we were assured that they had brought home to Portugal, the former year, about four millions sterling, of which they, at that time, stood in great need, for they had a very bad harvest: But gold answers all things: They were supplied from England with corn, and we had in return a large share of their gold.

The deficiency of the laws to punish insults, in case of foreign Ministers, being apparent in the case of the Muscovite Ambassador, a bill was brought into the House of Commons, for preserving the privileges of Ambassadors and other foreign Ministers. Count Gallas, the Imperial and Spanish Envoy, having got a copy of it, communicated it to Baron Spanheim, the Prussian Ambassador, at whose house there was a meeting of foreign Ministers, who resolved to lay before the Secretaries of State their observations on the bill, in a memorial, importing, "That the preamble of the bill mentioned only the particular indignity offered to the Muscovite Ambassador, and his being arrested and taken out of his coach by violence,"

That, in the clause for preventing for the future the seizing, arresting, or imprisoning of public Ministers, it should be made criminal to offer them any insult or ill treatment. III. That their equipages, goods, and other effects, of what nature soever, ought likewise to enjoy the same protection with their persons and servants, and not be seized or stopped on any pretence. IV. That their houses ought to be accounted and declared Sanctuaries, and no Bailiffs, or other Officers of Justice, allowed to enter the same. V. And that foreign Ambassadors, and other Ministers, ought to enjoy these privileges from their first coming into Great-Britain, till they are out of her Majesty's Dominions, even after they have had their audience of leave, as long as they retain their characters. The substance of this Memorial being communicated to the Committee, to whom that bill was referred, they inserted the first amendment in the preamble, but did not think proper to mention the other particulars: And, Mr. Compton having reported the several amendments made to the bill, the House added a clause, "That no person should be proceeded against for having arrested the servant of an Ambassador, or public Minister, by virtue of this act, unless the name of such servant be first registered in the office of one of the Principal Secretaries of State, and by such Secretary transmitted to the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who shall hang up the same in some public place in their offices, &c." and ordered the bill to be ingrossed. The foreign Ministers, having also procured a copy of this last clause, held another Assembly at Baron Spanheim's house, at which the Earl of Sunderland assisting, they represented to him, "That the exacting lists of foreign Ministers' servants was a thing unpractised in other Courts, and liable to several inconveniences; and desired besides, that the Lord Chamberlain of her Majesty's household might be added to the number of the persons appointed by this bill, to take cognizance of the offences committed against the privileges of foreign Ministers, and to inflict such punishments, as they shall judge fit." But the Parliament did not think fit to make any more alterations in the bill.

On the 14th of March, the Commons, in a Grand Committee, came to several resolutions in favour of the inhabitants of Nevis and St. Christopher's, who had suffered by the late invasion of the French; and voted the sum of one hundred and three thousand two hundred and three pounds for the use of such sufferers, as should re-settle in their plantations in those islands.

The Commons being informed, that the humour of laying wagers about the Events of war was grown to such an height, that many unwary persons were ruined by it, and that the 1708-9. most crafty in those bargains maintained clandestine correspondences abroad, which might be of dangerous consequence to the Government, a bill was brought in, which passed both Houses, and received the Royal assent, to prevent the laying of wagers relating to the public.

These were the transactions of this Session of 1709. Parliament, which was concluded the 21st of April, when the following speech of the Lords Commissioners was delivered to both Houses by the Chancellor:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"BEING now, by the Queen's directions, The Commissioners to put an end to this Session, we have it speech to both Houses. in command from her Majesty to assure you, her Majesty is extremely sensible of the zeal, and affection you have shewn for her service, April 1. and the good of her people, and of the prudence and dispatch, with which you have completed the important business of this Session.

"The vigour and firmness of your proceedings have already had a very good effect on affairs abroad; and there is ground to hope, that, by God's blessing on her Majesty's endeavours, this will every day appear more and more evident.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"We are to return you in particular her Majesty's thanks, for your having provided so timely and effectually the supplies found necessary to the prosecution of this war, with an augmentation of those forces, which, in conjunction with our Allies, have, by God's assistance, procured us the present advantages over the common enemy.

"Your cheerfulness in giving such large supplies at this juncture, and the ready advances, which have been made for their being effectual with so little burden to the people, shew, you perfectly understand how to make a right use of our past successes, and that nothing is too difficult for so dutiful and affectionate subjects, acting in defence of so good a cause.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Her Majesty, through the whole course of her Reign, having been desirous to shew all possible instances of goodness and clemency to her subjects, hath now, for the strengthening the Union, and quieting the minds of all her subjects throughout the United Kingdom, thought fit to grant them an act of Grace and free pardon, in a more full and beneficial manner, than hath been formerly used; not doubting, but all her people will make a right use of, and suitable returns on their part, for so extraordinary an indulgence.

"Her Majesty, having also been graciously pleased to give the Royal assent to the several bills you have presented during this Session, commands us to observe to you on that occasion, that the life and benefit of all laws, how wisely soever they are framed, do chiefly consist in a due and regular execution of them,

1709. "them, and therefore to exhort you, that, when you return to your countries, you would think it indispensably your duty, to set a good example towards an impartial and steady observation of the many good laws, which have been enacted (especially since the late Revolution) and which fall within your province to execute; it being but too evident, that the defect at present attending us is not so much the want of new laws, as the neglect and disregard of those already made."

After this the Parliament was prorogued to the 19th of May.

Great
Eur.

The severity of the winter-season (as hath been said) was very remarkable this year; for it began to freeze, the night before Christmas-day, with great violence, and not long after fell great snows. Those, who compared the great frost in 1683-4 with this, observed, that the first was generally a bright one, and continued above two months without interruption; but the latter mostly dark, and with some intervals lasted a month longer; during which, many cattle, especially sheep, and likewise birds, perished. The Thames was frozen over, and, on the 3d of January, people began to erect booths, and set up tents on the ice. It was also observed, that the summer, which succeeded the frost in 1683-4, was excessively hot and dry, affording in general great plenty of things necessary for human life; but this proved very near as comfortable as the winter, by reason of the coldness and moisture of the air, pouring almost continual rains on the earth, which, as it retarded the maturity of the fruits, so, in many places, occasioned a thin harvest, and this a scarcity of corn. This great frost was general in Europe, but most severely felt in France, where, in most places, the fruit-trees were killed, and the corn frozen in the ground, which occasioned there a dreadful calamity and desolation.

Queen.

Two young Princes, near relations to the Czar of Muscovy, arriving in London in Janua- ry, the Queen gave orders for their being entertained at her charge, and attended by her officers; the Princes, to shew their grateful sense of these favours, desired an audience, to which, being introduced by Mr. Boyle, they made their compliments to her Majesty in Latin, acknowledging, with great respects, the singular marks of kindness, which she was pleased to heap upon them; and, at the same time, congratulated her upon the signal success of her victorious arms, and wished her a long continuation of the same. To which the Queen answered, 'That she had so much esteem and friendship for his Czarish Majesty, that she could not but be very well pleased to see any so nearly related to him in her Kingdoms, and have an opportunity of shewing her kindness and distinction to them. She likewise thanked them for their congratulations and good wishes, adding, That she would endeavour to make their stay here as agreeable to them, as she could.' Besides this compliment paid to the Czar, in order to soften his resentment of the late affront offered to his Ambassador, an information was tried at the Court of Queen's-Bench, before the Lord-Chief-Justice Holt, for the Queen, against Thomas Morton the Laceman, and thirteen others, for meetings, consulting, and conspiring to arrest and imprison the Muscovite Ambassador, of which they were found guilty, the special matter of the privilege of Ambassadors, to be argued before the Judges the next Term. There were present in Court the Earl of Sunderland, Mr. Secretary Boyle, the Lord Halifax, and several other persons of Quality (1).

Trial about the affair of the Rus-

On the 3d of February, the Queen, in Council, was pleased to declare, 'That, the public business increasing, her Majesty had thought fit to appoint a third Secretary of State of Great Britain; but that she intended, nevertheless, to continue the foreign affairs, for the present, in the course of dispatch they were now in.' Upon this the Duke of Queenberry was made third Secretary of State, and took for one of his under

(1) The Muscovite Ambassador, seeing the slowness of the judicial proceedings in England, wrote expostulatory letters to Mr. Boyle, who at last assured him, That the laws of the Kingdom could not admit of a final decision till the next term: That nothing had been omitted to procure all reparation, which the utmost rigour of law could afford: That a bill had, by the Queen's order, been brought into the Parliament for securing the privileges of Ambassadors and foreign Ministers, to shew how far she detested the violence offered to his Excellency's person and character: That the Queen had no sooner notice, that the two young Muscovite Princes, relations of the Czar, were arrived in her Kingdom, but she gave orders for their reception. In answer to this letter, the Ambassador replied, That if it was in the Queen's power to consult the Parliament about a law to secure the immunities of foreign Ministers, could not due measures have been taken at the same time for reparation of the past affront? That it was a very easy matter to do it, and was what the herself had caused to be done in the case of her Ambassador the Earl of Manchester at Venice. That as to the honours lately done to two young Noblemen, who were taken for Muscovite Princes, the Czar reckoned none but the Imperial Hereditary Prince within the verge of his August House: That these were two young Lords, who were a-kin to him, and were travelling incognito, but he did not desire they should be defrayed by any Power, having wherewithal to bear their own charges. Several other letters passed between Mr. Secretary Boyle and Mr. D'Ayrall, the British Secretary at the Hague; but it having been found impracticable in England to inflict any legal punishment on those, who had affronted the Ambassador, it was at last agreed between the two Courts, that the Queen, by way of satisfaction, should make solemn excuses for the insufficiency of our former laws in that behalf. This was accordingly done by Mr. Whitworth, the Queen's Envoy Extraordinary to the Czar, in a speech at his public audience, on the 8th of February, 1709-10. Upon which the Czar ordered his Ministers to settle the affair with him in a Conference, and the following articles were agreed on: 1. That his Czarish Majesty accepted of the excuses, and was willing to forget the criminal proceedings of the authors of the affront, and desired they might be discharged. 2. That satisfaction should be given to the Ambassador by a letter from the Queen to repair his honour; and by a reimbursement of all the costs and damages he had been at on account of the affront. 3. That the Ambassador should demand his letter of credence, which he had refused to accept, as well as the usual present and the yacht, which the Queen caused to be offered him. 4. That his Czarish Majesty would acquaint the Queen, that he was content with this satisfaction, by a letter, which should be delivered to Mr. Whitworth.

under Secretaries Nicholas Rowe, famous for his dramatic performances.

The Convocation was summoned, chosen and returned as the new Parliament was. It was too evident, that the same ill temper, that had appeared in former Convocations, did still prevail, though not with such a majority: When the day came, in which it was to be opened, a writ was sent from the Queen to the Archbishop, ordering him to prorogue the Convocation for some months: And, at the end of these, there came another writ, ordering a further prorogation: So the Convocation was not opened during this Session of Parliament; by this, a present stop was put to the factious temper of those, who studied to recommend themselves by embroiling the Church. This did not cure them; for they continued still by libels and false stories to animate their party. The most effectual encouragement to that end was, the secret insinuation that the Queen's heart was with them: That though the war, and the other circumstances of her affairs, obliged her at present to favour the moderate party, yet, as soon as a peace brought on a better Settlement, they promised themselves all favour at her hands. It was not certain, that they had then any ground for this, or that she herself, or any by her order, gave them these hopes; but this is certain, that many things might have been done to extinguish those hopes, which were not done: So that they seemed to be left to please themselves with those expectations, which kept still life in their party; and indeed it was but too visible, that the much greater part of the Clergy were in a very ill temper, and under very bad influences; enemies to the Toleration, and soured against the Dissenters.

A letter against the Sacramental Test, Calamy.

About this time was published a letter from a Gentleman in Scotland to his friend in England, against the Sacramental Test; as inconsistent with the Union, dangerous to the Ecclesiastical Constitution of North Britain, and to such parts of their Civil Constitution as are reserved to them: Inconsistent with the civil interest of Great-Britain in general; contrary to the design of our Saviour's Institution of the Lord's-Supper, and to the doctrine of the Church of England: And an apology for this letter.

The Test Act is here represented as contrary to the rules of Religion, because it requires an end in receiving the Sacrament, that must prophane it, and such as bears no proportion to the original design of it; and usurps an authority, which no power on earth can lay any just claim to, to apply divine Institutions to such ends, as only serve the interest of politic Societies; and obliges such as have any civil post to take the Sacrament, without any regard to the fitness, which the law of Christ requires, for that solemnity. It looks as if it was no matter, how ill a character a person bore, if it can be covered with the name of Churchman; which shews, that it is not the honour of Religion, but the secular interest of a Party that is principally regarded.

Whilst the House of Commons, in January, 1709, were considering a bill for the speedy and effectual recruiting the land-forces and marines, by encouraging the parishes to provide them, this letter against the Test was dispersed by persons unknown, at the door of the House. It was a snare laid for the Whig-Members. By approving the letter and abolishing the Test, which bore so hard upon the Dissenters, and excluded the most rigid from places of trust, they alarmed the Church, and furnished a specious pretence of asserting, the Church was in danger. If the Test was preserved, notwithstanding the reasons alleged against it in the letter, the disputes about Occasional Conformity, which had been so troublesome in the former Parliaments, would have revived and produced the same animosities in This. The Commons, being aware of these things, avoided the snare, by condemning the letter, upon a complaint made to them of it, to be burnt for a scandalous, seditious libel, and the Author and Printer to be enquired after.

By this time the negotiations for a peace were begun at the Hague (1). It has been already observed, that, soon after the battle of Ramillies, the

(1) Dr. Hare in his piece intitled, The negotiations for a treaty of peace in 1709 considered: In a third letter to a Tory-Member, having stated this whole affair in a clear and full light, it will be proper to transcribe his account of it. He begins his letter with some reflections on the general conduct of the French in all the treaties they had made for fifty years before, to shew the necessity there was for the Allies to refuse entering into any Conferences for a general peace, till some preliminaries were first settled, as a foundation, on which it should be built. But before we come, says the Doctor, p. 7. to consider the preliminaries themselves, that you may the better judge of the sincerity of France, I must observe to you, that they had previously, by their emissaries, been feeling the pulse of the Dutch; and, by the mighty professions they made of the sincere desires of the King to put an end to the war, they obtained some private Conferences the beginning of the year 1709, in which the restitution of Spain and the Indies to King Charles, was always supposed as the first step towards a treaty; and, for the rest, as they hoped the Dutch, for their part, would not be very difficult, since they were assured, that in other points they might have their own terms, and not only be secured by a good barrier, in which the French were pleased to be very liberal, but likewise be made very easy in relation to trade. The Dutch, who, on this occasion, shewed they understood the French, as well as the French thought they did them, appeared to be very well pleased to hear of overtures of peace, and expressed great readiness to enter on a treaty; but that they could do nothing without the concurrence of their Allies, to whom they communicated what had passed; and, in order to a treaty, gave leave to the Ministers of France to come to Holland; first to Monsieur Rouillé, and afterwards to the Marquis de Torcy, who both timed their coming thither too remarkably, not to be taken notice of. The Duke of Marlborough made two voyages that spring to England; one in the beginning of March, N. S. which was the soonest the affairs of the war would admit of his return after the campaign of Lisle; the other about the end of April, when he went to communicate to the Queen what had passed, and to receive her instructions. Now Monsieur Rouillé came to Holland, almost as soon as the Duke was gone from thence the first time; and the Marquis de Torcy followed soon after the Duke's leaving it the second: By which it should seem, they thought they might make some advantage of his absence; and that it was for their Master's service, to have the Dutch as much as they could to themselves, as the likeliest way to procure such a peace as they had a mind to.

Monsieur Rouillé and the Marquis de Torcy came neither

1709. the Elector of Bavaria gave out hopes of a peace, and that the French King would come to a treaty of partition, by allowing Spain and the West-Indies to go to King Charles, provided the Dominions of Italy were given to King Philip. They hoped, that England and the States-General would agree to this, as less concerned in Italy; but they knew, that the Court of Vienna would never hearken to it; for they valued the Dominions in Italy, with the Islands near them, much more than all the rest of the Spanish Monarchy. But, at the same time that Lewis XIV. was tempting us with the hopes of Spain and the West-Indies, that King, by a letter to the Pope*, offered the Dominions in Italy to King Charles. But, as the Parliament had always declared the ground of the war to be the restoring the whole Spanish Monarchy to the House of Austria (which indeed the States-General had never done) so the Duke of Marlborough could not hearken to this. He convinced the States of the treacherous designs of the Court of France in this offer, and it was not entertained. The Court of Vienna (as hath been said) was so alarmed at the inclinations, which some had expressed towards the entertaining this project, that this was believed to be the secret motive of the treaty for evacuating the Milanese, and of their persisting so obstinately in their design upon Naples; for by this means they became masters of both. The French being now reduced to great extremities, by their constant ill success, and by the miseries of their people, and more especially by the general decline of the public credit, the eminent Bankers of Paris and Lyons having been obliged to stop payment, neither of them into Holland, till the Duke of Marlborough had left it; which was a plain proof, that they had some designs, which they feared he would not come into; and, that in his and Prince Eugene's absence, they hoped the States, by the great inclination they expressed for peace, might be drawn in to consent to some points, which might either produce a treaty to their minds, or divide the Allies among themselves. This they hoped to do these two ways; first, by gaining their consent to a partition, which they had never absolutely declared against; and next by offering to them, in consideration for that, a greater barrier than they thought consistent with the interest and honour of the House of Austria. The first of these they knew the Emperor would not agree to; and neither the Emperor nor England to the latter. And from this occasion and ground for division they promised themselves great success. But, to their surprize, the firmness of the States was so great, that, as they would absolutely reject nothing, so neither would they agree to any thing separately from the rest of the Allies, nor enter into any treaty, but jointly with the Queen and the Emperor, who, to shew their readiness to hearken to any reasonable terms of peace, that would answer the end for which they went into the war, immediately upon notice of the proposals the French had made, sent to the Hague the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene; the first was attended by my Lord Townshend, and the other was soon followed by Count Zinzendorf. And both these Ministers distinguished themselves in these negotiations very much to the satisfaction of all the rest. My Lord Townshend particularly has, by his good sense, integrity, openness, and affability, acquired the universal esteem of the States, and all the rest of the Allies, beyond what could be hoped from so young a Minister, and to such a degree, as will always be remembered to his honour in that country, however it may be denied or forgot in this. If therefore you do not meet with his and Count Zinzendorf's names in what follows, I must desire you would suppose of them what I say of the two Generals, so far at least, as to think they did not in any thing of moment ever differ from them.

But to proceed; Upon the arrival of these Ministers at the Hague, Conferences were daily held with those of France, to settle preliminary articles. In treating of which their insincerity soon discovered itself, and great reason was given to suspect their chief aim was to amuse and divide those they seemed so much in haste to agree with; that, if they could not get such a peace for themselves as they desired, the campaign at least might be lost to the Allies. For it was very observable, that they easily agreed, and, in a very little time after these Conferences were begun, to all the demands of England and Holland for themselves, though some articles were contained in both, which the French never dreamt of being asked, when the first overtures of peace were made; such as the demolishing of Dunkirk, and the giving up many towns, which were no part of the Spanish Netherlands at the time of King Charles's death, nor had in the course of the war been taken from them. When the first steps of a treaty were made, the French so little thought of these demands, that the quitting even Lisle and Mosin was refused. But now these extraordinary points on the part of England and Holland were by the Ministers of France readily agreed to; and yet, at the same time, great difficulty was made with respect to what was asked for the Emperor and the Duke of Savoy, though there was nothing in those articles, but what was extremely reasonable and necessary to secure the Dominions of those Princes from the invasions they would otherwise be exposed to. There was an interval of several days, before the French Ministers would treat about these articles; nor did they at last consent to them, but with a reserve and a declaration, that this was beyond their instructions; and that therefore they must suspend a full assent, till the further pleasure of the King was known. Now what could be the meaning of this management, but to insinuate the maritime powers, if they could, and draw them into a base design of sacrificing the interest of their Allies to their own? And what use can any body imagine they would have made of this, but to engage the Allies in a quarrel among themselves, and to take advantage of their differences; to break the Confederacy, and to intice some of the Members of it by large offers to come into separate measures with them? But, this scheme failing by the firm adherence of the maritime powers to the rest of the Allies, there was one article still remained to be adjusted, which in effect included all the rest, and which would afford the French a specious pretence for breaking off the treaty, whenever they had a mind to it; and that was to settle terms, on which a perpetual suspension of arms should be agreed. No body had ever doubted, but that there was such an understanding between the French King and his Grandson, that the former could oblige the latter to resign the Spanish Monarchy whenever he pleased, since he not only gave it King Philip at first, but had hitherto supported him in it. Accordingly every thing about him was intirely French; and the restitution of Spain at least, and the Indies, had, as I observed before, been always supposed. And as this was the point that occasioned the war, the first thing settled in the preliminaries was a perfect and intire cession of the whole Spanish Monarchy to King Charles III, to be made within two months from the first of June following. And, in case the Duke of Anjou should make any difficulty to comply with this, it is expressly covenanted in the fourth article, That his most Christian Majesty and the Allies shall take in concert the proper measures to oblige him to it. What was to be understood by taking proper measures, both sides were content should not be then explained. Thus far looked well; and one would have thought the French meant in earnest, that the Duke of Anjou should immediately quit Spain to his Competitor. But all hither-

1709. payment, began to entertain serious thoughts of a peace, and resolved to try the States again. When the Duke of Marlborough came over to England, Monsieur Rouillé was therefore sent to Holland with general offers of peace, desiring them to propose what they insisted on; and he offered them as good a barrier for themselves, as they could ask. The States, contrary to the expectation of France, resolved to adhere firmly to their Confederates, and to enter into no separate treaty but in conjunction with their Allies. However, upon the arrival of Monsieur Rouillé at Antwerp, they appointed Monsieur Buyz, Pensionary of Amsterdam, and Monsieur Vanderdussen, Pensionary of Gouda, to have a Conference with him at Moerdyke. Upon the report of what passed in this interview, the States permitted Rouillé to come to Woerden, a place between Leyden and

Utrecht, that he might be nearer at hand for the intended negotiation; and then the Deputies of the States had another Conference with him, in which he made some loose proposals towards a general peace, which, however, he refused to give in writing. The States-General, being still cautious of making any advances in so important an affair, without the participation of their Allies, gave immediate notice of what had passed, to the Courts of Vienna and Great-Britain. Prince Eugene, who, during this interval, was gone to Vienna, returned from thence to Brussels, on the 27th of March, N. S. with full powers from his Imperial Majesty; and, on the 8th of April, came to the Hague, where the Duke of Marlborough likewise arrived the next day from England. These two great men had a long Conference with the Grand Pensionary to was words only, and would signify nothing, unless the execution of this essential point was effectually provided for; and there was but one way of doing this, which was to make this Cession one of the conditions of continuing the suspension of arms, agreed to in the thirty-fourth article, to the conclusion of a general peace; which was accordingly done in the thirty-seventh article, which declares, That this suspension shall continue till a general peace, provided the King of France executes all that is promised on his part in the foregoing articles, and the whole Spanish Monarchy be restored, rendue & cedée, to King Charles, as is settled in these articles. This article touched home, and discovered plainly, that all the French pretended to consent to in this fundamental Point was mere grimace; and that they meant nothing else, but to draw the Allies into a separate peace, and leave them to get Spain as they could. This was the most they meant; and I am apt to think, for reasons I will give you by and by, they did not mean so much; but, whether they did or not, they did not want a specious cover for their opposition to this article; they made greater professions of the sincerity of their King's intentions; that he would punctually execute all that depended upon him; and that he would endeavour to persuade his Grandson to a compliance; but that to force him to it, and that within so short a term, was not in his power: That it would therefore be impossible for the King to consent to this article; and to consent to the rest of the preliminaries, unless an absolute suspension of arms were agreed to, would be to leave himself at the mercy of the Allies, and put himself into a much worse state than before. And these pretences, you may be sure, wanted no art to set them off. But to all this it was easy to answer, That they were fully persuaded, that, if the King was really in earnest in this matter, he might certainly recall his Grandson without any difficulty; and provided he asked the fair part, and did all he could towards it, according to the fourth article, he might depend upon it, the Allies would take no advantage of any words in the thirty-seventh, to begin the war again upon him, when he had faithfully performed the other parts of it, and surrendered the places agreed to be delivered up to them in the thirty-fifth. That supposing what they objected to this article, were not a pretended but a real difficulty, which could hardly be believed, the consequence then would be, that the Allies must either assent to the sincerity of France, or France to that of the Allies. As the King, supposing it not in his power to oblige the Duke of Anjou to resign, would, by executing the rest of the treaty, be at the mercy of the Allies; so, on the other hand, if the Allies made a peace with the King without this article, they would be at his mercy for the recovery of the Spanish Monarchy; which was the great point, for which they entered into the war; but which they could never hope to gain, if he did not absolutely abandon his Grandson, which they could by no means depend on, while they had nothing but his bare word for it. Now in this case, Which is more reasonable for France to trust the Allies, or the Allies France? This cannot be a very hard question, since France had been guilty of the breach of public faith on so many occasions, that it is hard to find an instance to the contrary. This very war will make two notorious instances of this remembered to all ages; the (scandalous violation of the partition treaty, almost as soon as made; and the usurpation of the Spanish Monarchy, notwithstanding the most solemn and repeated renunciations, that had been made of it. It would be endless to enter into a detail of all the complaints of that kind against France, since the Pyrenean treaty. And therefore it cannot be reasonable for the Allies to trust to those, by whom they have so often been deceived. But it is not so with them; they never have been guilty of the breach of public faith in any flagrant case; at least, I know of none. But I will venture to add further, that they neither would, nor, if they would, can they act a false part in such a case as this. They would not, they do not think it for their interest to continue or renew a war unnecessarily; they are sufficiently weary; the burthen of the war has laid so heavy upon them, that they would be glad to have a little respite, and to be at leisure to cultivate the arts of peace, and enjoy, as fast as they can, some fruits of it. Thus they have always done; they have hardly had patience to keep up their armies till a peace was signed. And it is this humour of the Allies has made the French have so little regard to execute their treaties with them. Besides, it must be owned, there is a great probity, plainness, and honesty, both in the Dutch and German, which appear in all the affairs of common life, and have been very observable in their dealings with the French all this war, in which the Allies, notwithstanding the many provocations they have received, have, in no instance, retaliated, when they could not do it without breach of faith. The war in Flanders affords many instances of this, that they have always punctually performed whatever articles they have signed, and not made reprisals, where even honest men have thought they might have done it without any violation of justice. But the greatest instance, and the only one I shall name, is the exact performance of the treaty of the evacuation of the Milanese, when the French had just reason to fear their troops would have been detained against the letter of the articles, in revenge of the injustice and insolence, with which they had disarmed and seized a considerable body of the Duke of Savoy's troops, at the very time he was in Alliance with them. I need say nothing of our own country, that France could have no reason to fear any perfidiousness from home. The character of her Majesty is too well known to give the French grounds for any such suspicion; and, had we a Prince of less renown on the Throne, France would have little to fear from him, unless he were supported by his people; which no Sovereign of England has ever been, when they have thought the war he made unjust

Heinfus, Messieurs Buys and Vanderdussen, and other Deputies of the States, where they debated the overtures made on the part of France; which being thought insufficient to be the ground of a treaty of peace, orders were given for carrying on the warlike preparations with all possible application and diligence, in order to open the campaign, as soon as the backwardness of the season would permit, and pursue the late advantages with the utmost vigour. The Deputies of the States having informed Rouillé, that his overtures were not satisfactory, that Minister sent an express to Paris for new instructions. This threw the French Court into great uneasiness; for as, on the one hand, they were resolved not to comply with the demand of the Confederates, in giving up the whole Monarchy of Spain; so on the other hand, the great difficulties they laboured under, which were much increased by the general scarcity of corn, and other provisions, occasioned by the great severity of the preceding winter, laid them under a necessity of keeping up the sinking spirits of the people with hopes, at least, of putting a speedy end to the war, by peace. Rouillé's express was therefore immediately sent back, with directions, (as appeared in the sequel) to that Minister, to amuse the Allies with a seeming compliance with all their demands, but not to sign any thing, that should be drawn up in writing.

The Pensionary having, by order of the States, made a report to the Duke of Marlborough, of what passed at the Conference, which had been held by Buys and Vanderdussen, with the French Minister, after the return of the Courier from France, the Duke resolved to return to Great-Britain, to acquaint the Queen with the progress of this important negotiation.

The Duke therefore embarked the 13th of April, N. S. and arrived three days after at London. During this second absence of the Duke, the French Court, to cover their artifices with an air of sincerity, sent the Marquis de Torcy, Secretary of State for foreign Affairs, to Holland, thinking the presence of so great a Minister might have some influence on the States. Upon his arrival at the Hague, the passport, by which he came, having been sent blank by Rouillé, he was there two days before his quality unjust. But it is not enough to say the Allies would not be false, nor act against the intentions of a public treaty; I think I may affirm, they cannot be so. A single Potentate is master of his own will, and can act without controul; but a Confederacy can do nothing without a concurrence of all parts; which, in so unjust a cause as this, there would be no reason to apprehend. When all the most just and necessary causes of a war concur, it is very hard to keep a Confederacy long together; much less can it be imagined it should be kept up to oppress a Prince, who has done all he can to satisfy the demands of all parties. Either honesty or interest will certainly disarm some of them. No Ally, when he has gained all he can hope for by the war, will be willing to continue the expence of it in compliment to any of the rest, especially when the cause is manifestly unjust. No, were it ever so just, this is hardly to be hoped for. When a Confederacy is successful, jealousies naturally arise among themselves; and they are more concerned, that one part should not be too great gainers, and have too much to their share, than that any other should not have enough. Of which we see an instance, though a very foolish one, among ourselves; our present masters of politics, to render the very successes of the war odious, alarm us with new fears, which no body before ever thought of; and tell us, the Dutch will have by this treaty a better country than our own. And, if a certain correspondence by way of Calais has been continued, France might be assured, that no advantage would be taken of the thirty-seventh article, though Spain was not relinquished in the time stipulated; and that therefore they might safely sign the preliminaries, for that the war could not be renewed, since they might depend on it, that England would never consent to use in so barbarous a manner a Prince whom so great a party among them have always had so much respect for: And, without England, they know the rest of the Allies could do nothing.

But whether it was more reasonable for the Allies to trust France, or France the Allies, was not left at this time to general reflections. What was doing at this very juncture in Spain, gave the Allies abundant cause to suspect the sincerity of France, that they meant nothing less than the restitution of that Monarchy. No body that looks into the accounts of that time, and sees how thick expresses went one upon another between France and Spain, can doubt, whether the King and his Grandson did not perfectly well agree: And not only the news of that time, but the facts themselves shew, that the King gave him all possible assurances, that he would not abandon him, though it was necessary for his affairs to promise it. This, I say, is very plain, from what was at that time doing in Spain; for, though the Marquis de Torcy told the Allies, he did not know but King Philip might be at Paris before him, there was not the least sign of any intention to relinquish Spain; but, on the contrary, there were on the part of the Duke of Anjou all the appearances that could be of a Prince that thought of nothing less. For the war was pressed with the utmost vigour in all parts; Alicant was besieged at a vast expence, and other places in Valencia were reduced with all diligence; preparations were made for the siege of Girona, and the army was put into the best condition it could be, to invade Catalonia; and at the same time, the Marquis de Boy advanced close to the Portuguese in Estramadura, with a design to give them battle; in which, against the opinion of my Lord Galway, they unhappily prevented him. This did not look like a design to quit Spain to King Charles, but, on the contrary, shewed a resolution to drive him out of it, if possible. But what gave the Allies a greater jealousy than all this, was the causing the Prince of Asturias to be acknowledged presumptive heir of Spain by all the States of the Kingdom; which ceremony was performed with the greatest magnificence the 7th of April; that is, about a month after M. Rouillé had been in Holland; which proceeding, you may remember, every body was then alarmed at; such a step being plainly taken for no other end, but to lay in matter for a new war, or rather it was a declaration, that an end could not be put to this, as long as the restitution of Spain was made one condition of a peace. The French Ministers had but one reply to this, that their Master was not answerable for what the Duke of Anjou had done; but that, for his own part, he was sincere, and would do whatever depended upon him, and that therefore, if a peace was not concluded, it could not lie at his door. The Allies, though they could not think what was urged had any truth in it, yet to shew how far they were from designing to impose upon the King impossible conditions, thought of an expedient, which could not be refused, without discovering, that France meant nothing by this treaty, but to make peace for themselves, and to leave the Allies involved in a war with Spain. If it was not in the King's power to oblige his Grandson to retire out of Spain, they declared they would be content with his doing what evidently was in his power; which was to deliver up to them such places in the Spanish Dominions, as were garrisoned by his own troops. But this 1709. quality was known. After this he paid a visit to the Pensionary, and offered to communicate the proposals which he had to make; but that Minister told him, he could not confer with him, nor see his proposals, without leave from the States. However the States having consented, that he together with the Deputies, who had been appointed to receive the proposals of Rouillé, should meet the Marquis, and hear what he had to offer, they had an interview with him the next day. The result of this Conference being communicated to the States-General, the Pensionary had orders to inform the French Minister, that they could not give him any resolution, till they were informed of the sentiments of the Queen of Great-Britain, by the return of the Duke of Marlborough.

The Duke, who made but a short stay in England, returned to the Hague the 18th of May, N. S. The first thing he did was to confer with Prince Eugene, who arrived there six days before from Brussels, and had the satisfaction, in his Conferences with the Pensionary, to receive fresh assurances, "That the States would "never separate from the general interest and scope of the Grand Alliance, upon any private considerations whatsoever." As the Duke of Marlborough went over the Lord Viscount Townshend, as Ambassador extraordinary, and joint Plenipotentiary with him, the Duke reckoning the load too great to bear it wholly himself. The choice was well made; for as Lord Townshend had great parts, had improved these by travelling, and was by much the most shining person of all our young Nobility, and had, on many occasions, distinguished himself very eminently; so he was a man of great integrity, and of good principles in all respects, free from all vice, and of an engaging conversation. Upon their arrival, the President of the week and the Pensionary went together to the Duke, to compliment him on the part of the States, and at the same time to confer with him, which they did for about an hour and an half, and then they returned to the Assembly of the States-General. The same evening the Marquis de Torcy went alone to the Duke of Marlborough's lodgings, and had a Conference of above

this expedient was rejected; and the Marquis de Torcy thinking, I suppose, that the Allies insisting upon the Duke of Anjou's being recalled, was a more specious handle to break off the treaty upon, than the refusal of the expedient they proposed instead of it, he agreed at last to let the thirty-seventh article stand as it is now worded; which is perfectly agreeable to the main design of the treaty, and to the tenour of the other articles; but with a reserve, as before, to know the King's pleasure, without whose further instructions he could not sign. And thus the Conferences held to settle these preliminaries ended the 28th of May, and were the same day signed by the Allies. The Marquis de Torcy immediately set out for Versailles, leaving Monsieur Rouillé behind, to whom he promised to return the King's answer by the 4th of June at farthest; which, from the necessity of the King's affairs, the point the treaty was carried to, the Marquis's rank and character, and personal merit, and the great protestations he made of his Master's sincerity, was hoped would be favourable; but most of all from his desire to the Allies at parting, that they would hasten the ratifications of these articles with all the dispatch they could.

These hopes the Marquis left with the Allies; and the near prospect of a good peace filled all people with a joy, that is not to be expressed. They waited with great impatience for the 4th of June: It was the next day before the answer came, upon the receipt of which Monsieur Rouillé acquainted the Allies, that the King could not agree to these preliminaries. The articles excepted against were the same, that the Marquis had before disputed, those relating to the Emperor and the Duke of Savoy, and the thirty-seventh. The Allies were not a little surprized at this answer, and more at the haughty air with which Monsieur Rouillé in a long Conference on this subject pressed his objections; a behaviour very different from what either he or the Marquis had shewn before; which there being no visible cause for, they thought it was in great measure galconade; that it meant nothing else but to make what advantage he could of the inclinations the Allies had without disguise shewn to peace; and that he would at last recede from his pretensions, when he saw they would not; and that in all events they could not, on their part, give up articles so reasonable in themselves, and which they had so unanimously agreed to, as absolutely necessary to make a good and lasting peace. And what they suspected did in good measure prove to be the case, at least it seemed so; but after having insisted with so much stiffness upon the objections he had in the King's name made, when he perceived it had no effect on the Allies, his departure being fixed for the ninth: The seventh in the evening, or early the next morning, he waited on the Pensioner; and, as an instance of his great sincerity and concern, that the treaty might not be broke off, communicated to him his instructions, by which it appeared, that he was empowered to recede from all the other points he had before insisted on, excepting that of the thirty-seventh article, which seems to have been a master-piece of French artifice. For, if the treaty must be broke, it is as effectually done by insisting upon one article, as upon twenty; and which ever part the Allies took, the French would find their account; for, if they could be persuaded to give up that, which in appearance was but one article, but in effect was the substance of all, or at least of the most important ones, then it was in the power of the French to make peace, without obliging the Duke of Anjou to quit Spain: And if the Allies could not be brought to this, the point they should break upon was so specious, that the French Ministers hoped for a double good effect of it; that it would incense the populace in these provinces against the Ministers, and set the King right in the affections of his people, which, through the continued misfortunes of the war, he began to lose. And, in this last point they succeeded perfectly well: There were no efforts the French were not willing to make, to support a Prince, who seemed to prefer their safety to his own glory, and to think no sacrifice too great to procure his people a good peace: But their other point they were much mistaken in; and the breaking of the treaty had no other effect upon the subjects of the States, though it be a popular Government, than to fill them with the utmost indignation against the French, and loud resentments of their constant injustice and perfidiousness.

But to return to Monsieur Rouillé, when he had shewn his instructions to the Pensioner, which discovered so much more than he would own before, he took his leave of him, without proposing any accommodation or expedient in lieu of this important article; and whether the truth were all out, and there was not some secret instructions still behind, was more than any body could tell. And though this was his language the 8th in the morning, they did not know but he might alter it before night, when he found the Allies were not to be moved, or that he might make a longer stay; he and the Marquis de Torcy both having often fixed days for their departure; but, when the time came, thought fit to change their minds. And what 1709. two hours with him and the Lord Townshend. The 19th in the morning, the Marquis paid another visit to the Duke, and they both went together to Prince Eugene's apartment, where they likewise conferred for some time. In the evening, those two Princes went to the Pensionary, who acquainted them with the resolution of the States-General, not to accept the offers made by the French Ministers, nor to take one step farther, but in concert with all the Allies. This determination was very satisfactory to the Duke and Prince Eugene, and begat such an unanimity and good harmony among all the Confederate Ministers, as intirely baffled all the secret designs of France, notwithstanding the Marquis de Torcy managed his purpose very artfully, and did all he could to amuse them with half promises and faint denials.

On the 20th, in the morning, the Duke and Prince Eugene, together with the Lord Townshend, returned the visit they had received from Monsieur de Torcy, where Rouillé, who till then had been with no other Ministers but Byss and Vanderdussen, was presented to these great Generals and Ministers. This same day, the French Ministers carried the amusement so far, as to declare, that their Master consented to the demolition of Dunkirk; that he would abandon the Pretender, and send him out of his Dominions; that he would acknowledge the Queen's title, and the Succession established on the House of Hanover; that he would renounce all pretensions to the Spanish Monarchy, and yield up such places as the Dutch demanded for their barrier. With respect to the Empire, the French offered to restore all things, as they were settled by what made this the more probable was, that Monsieur Pethum, who had all along, without authority or character, gone between the Ministers of the Allies and France, did that morning propose to some of the Allies, that France should give to them two or three towns as an equivalent for the thirty-seventh article, to be kept by them till Spain should be quitted to King Charles. But since Monsieur Pethum made this motion, as of his own head, without any Commission from Monsieur Rouillé, who lodged with him, and the proposal was indeterminate, without either the names, or fixed numbers of the towns, that should be given, the Allies could not take any notice of it. Besides, had the offer been never so distinct, and made with full authority, to give two or three cautionary towns, was to evade and not to satisfy the intention of the article, and was in effect nothing else, but to offer a little better barrier to the Dutch, in exchange for Spain and the Indies. In the mean time, Monsieur Rouillé spent the day in making visits of leave, as designing to set out in earnest for Versailles next morning. When night was come, and there was no room to hope for any further step being made on his part, here the man, who is accused of prolonging the war, interposed, and shewed how little he deserves such a censure. The Duke of Marlborough sent to the Pensionary and the other Ministers, to desire a meeting, to try once more, if any thing could be done to save the treaty. But, this meeting being disappointed, there was an extraordinary Congress of all the Ministers the next morning, in which the Deputies of the States having acquainted them of what had passed, and assured them of their resolution to press the war with the utmost vigour, till France was forced to consent to a good peace, Count Zinzendorf thanked the States in the name of the Emperor and King Charles, for the firmness they had shewn on this occasion. The Duke of Marlborough did the same on the part of the Queen; which was followed with like expressions of satisfaction by all the other Ministers, that were present, with very particular marks of esteem to the Pensionary, whom I have often thought the Godolphin of the States, for his wife and prudent conduct through the whole negotiation. I need not say more, to let you know, that he is a plain, grave, wise man, of great judgment and abilities, quiet, unpopular, and uncorrupt.

All thoughts of peace being now in appearance over, and Monsieur Rouillé gone, the Duke of Marlborough, who was extremely mortified at this change of things, resolved to follow in the afternoon, and would not give over all hopes of having still one interview more with him; to which end he got to Brussels, as soon almost as Monsieur Rouillé, and sent word before to Prince Eugene (who had been there some days, to give the necessary orders for assembling the army) but Monsieur Rouillé was gone, before either the Duke or Prince could see him: And nothing was now left to the Generals, but to try to do by the sword what they could not do by treaty, and to make their way to peace by a good campaign.

This, I can assure you, from what I have observed myself in the progress of this affair, and the most exact information I could get from others, is a plain and true account of these negotiations thus far; in which one sees, on the part of France, violent suspicions of insincerity through the whole treaty, working its way by all the methods of address and artifice, which they are so great masters of: But in the Allies, plainness, unanimity, and an unshaken confidence; every thing is open and above-board, without any divisions in their Conferences with the French, or any violent heats among themselves; even in the great point of the barrier, which the French had hopes might make a breach between the Dutch and Imperial Ministers: But by the prudence of the contending parties themselves, and the firmness and temper, with which the Duke of Marlborough calmly interposed, this difficult point was amicably adjusted, and the disputes upon it produced no effects, that the French could take any advantage of. I believe you have not forgot, I am sure I have not, how people here in England reasoned upon these Conferences. While these preliminaries were like to take effect, some men were by no means satisfied; they thought care enough was not taken of England; which should make us hope, that they will some time or other obtain better terms for us; and that, in the next treaty, more regard will be had to the trading interest of Great-Britain, than the late Ministers have shewn. And yet no sooner were the preliminaries rejected, but the men, who thought but just before there was too little in them, would have persuaded us, that there was a great deal too much; and that it was unreasonable to insist on such demands, especially to oblige a great King, whom they have always admired, to dethrone his Grandson, though all such invidious expressions were purposely avoided in the articles; and no body, as I have observed before, doubted, but the King, if he were in earnest disposed to satisfy the Allies, could do it without difficulty.

Dr. Hare then proceeds to shew, in opposition to the clamours, which had been raised against the Duke of Marlborough in particular, or the conduct of the Allies in general, with relation to the preliminary articles, first, That, if to insist on the thirty-seventh article was a fault, the Duke of Marlborough was not to be blamed for it: And, secondly, That to insist on that article was in itself right and necessary, in order to a good peace.

First (says Dr. Hare, p. 30.) I say, That, if to insist on the thirty-seventh article was a fault, the Duke of Marlborough is not to be blamed for it. Secondly, Because, if he did insist, it was what he was obliged to: He had no authority to do otherwise. All the world knows, that both Houses of Parliament did, the beginning of that year 1709, address the Queen, that no peace should be made with France, without an in-by the treaty of Ryswick, and to demolish the fortifications of Straßburg. But the Allies insisting on some other articles, namely, the restitution of Upper and Lower Alsace to the Empire, Torcy declared he had no power to make any further concessions, broke up the Conference, and sent to the Pensionary to desire passes to return home. However, upon second thoughts, and as they pretended, at the desire of Monsieur Petrum, Resident of Holstein, the French Ministers consented to suspend their departure: And, on the 21st, Torcy went alone to the Pensionary, to agree about another Conference, which was held at six o'clock in the evening; and, notwithstanding the French Ministers had declared the day before, that they could not enlarge their offers, they now proposed to surrender Straßburg in its present condition. The Allies not being satisfied with the proposals made in this Conference, another was appointed for the 22d, in the morning, which proved likewise unsuccessful. Whereupon the French declared, that they were resolved to go away; and, the better to demonstrate their seriousness in this resolution, they sent again to the Pensionary for passes, and took their leave of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, and the Ministers of the neutral Princes; but the States having, the same evening, sent them passes, and the Pensionary intimated to them, that they were not hereafter to expect any passport for their return to the Hague; and, considering, on the other hand, how unconcerned the Ministers of the Allies were at the threats of their departure, they were easily persuaded to stay, at the desire (as they still pretended) of some neutral Ministers;

ture restitution of the Spanish Monarchy: And her Majesty was pleased to express herself very well pleased with their address, and that she was perfectly of the same opinion. This address being thus approved, no Minister had any power or authority to conclude a treaty upon other terms, without her Majesty's command; nor could such a command be expected from her, without advice of her Council: And I believe a Council will not easily be found, that will advise against the joint opinion of both Houses of Parliament. If therefore the thirty-seventh article was insisted on, the Duke is not to be blamed; he did but his duty, and could not justly his doing otherwise; which, if he had, would as certainly have been made a high crime and misdemeanor, as his not doing it is now made a matter of complaint against him. There is no room for any objection here, unless it could be pretended, that this address was of his procuring; the contrary to which is as well known, as the address itself. But though it is plain, that the Duke of Marlborough had no hand in making this address, it is as plain, that, when it was made, he was bound by it; and, since that required the restitution of the whole Spanish Monarchy, he was obliged to insist upon it. So the thirty-seventh article was unanimously adhered to as it is, by all the Ministers; and their doing so, I shall now shew you, was very right in itself, and necessary in order to a good peace. First, it is right in itself, that is, just and reasonable, not hard, or insolent, or inhuman, as these advocates of France would have it thought. For what is the point in dispute, but to restore to an injured person what has been unjustly taken from him? Is it not the injured party, by the fundamental laws of justice, a right to this? Or is not the party, that does the injury, obliged to restitution, where it is possible? And is not this the case of the Spanish Monarchy? I despair of ever proving any usurpation unjust, if this is not. But if it be unjust, does it alter the case, because the King of France has not usurped it for himself, but for his Grandson? Am I the less obliged to restore what I have unjustly seized, because I have given it to a third person, provided it be in my power? Does not the Duke of Anjou know, as well as his Grandfather, that it is a violent usurpation? Can he of right keep what the other had no right to give? Is it not kept plainly for the use and benefit of the giver? Has not the giver power to take it from him? Is it not plain, that his Grandson has not kept it thus long, but by the support he receives from him? And if it be thus manifestly unjust, and the Usurper has it in his power to make restitution, is it ill manners to demand it? Is the Spanish Monarchy such a trifle, as not to be worth insisting on? Shall we compliment the King of France, or his Grandson, with giving up what so many Princes and States have spent so much blood and treasure to regain? Can that now be thought consistent with the safety and commerce of Great-Britain, with the interest and welfare of our Allies, or with the liberty of Europe, which we ventured to begin a war for, under the most unpromising appearances of ever seeing a good end of it? But it was nonsense not to risk all, when all was at stake: There was no room left but to appeal to Heaven, and take arms; which gave us a chance for escaping the ruin; which was otherwise inevitable. This is the truth of the matter, this the point in dispute. What then do people mean by all their senseless clamour of the hardship and barbarity of the Allies, in obliging the King of France to recall his Grandson? They, who think the causes of this war such indifferent things, as not to be worth insisting on any longer, though we have so long struggled for them, that we have at last got fast hold; these men, I fear, will in a little time think the same of the causes of the Revolution too; nay, they already tell us so; they are grown so insensible to the fears they were once in, that they begin to think popery and arbitrary power innocent harmless things; they now plainly insinuate, that there was no danger of the Government in Church and State being overturned, and that therefore the Revolution was not necessary; and, in virtue of these foolish sentiments, when the Revolution is upon the point of being unalterably fixed, they truly are grown weary, and, after twenty years labour do not think it worth a little more pains to finish the work, and put an effectual stop to the return of those evils, which they were once, as well as their neighbours, so heartily frightened with. And it is no wonder if men, who have contracted such a stupid indolence, and are so indifferent for the civil and religious rights of their own country, cannot see what sense there is in insisting upon the restitution of the Spanish Monarchy, and are (supinely willing to think (if nonsense can be called thinking) that the demand of the Allies is either unjust, or at best very rude and unmannerly.

But further; this demand of theirs is not only right in itself, but necessary, in order to a good peace; and the best way to set this in a clear light, is to consider what would have been the consequence, supposing the Allies had not insisted on it. Now to shew what this would have been, I will suppose, for the present, that the French were in earnest; and that, if this article had been receded from, they would have signed the rest. Which way now, I would ask, should we have proposed to get Spain? Can we do it, unless the King of France intirely abandons his Grandson? No, certainly. But he has promised he will. But is his bare word a security, that may be depended upon? By no means. What then? Why, he gives you up so many great towns, which he would not do, if he did not intend to leave his Grandson to himself. Why so? How can the giving up these towns to the Allies be thought any security? Is it any more than giving the Allies a barrier, which barrier they would have insisted upon, whatever became of Spain? How now comes that to be a security, that the King of France would abandon his Grandson, which he must nevertheless have complied with, though he had not abandoned him? Is it the 1709. Ministers; and, the better to colour the matter, they sent, on the 23d of May, N. S. an express to the Court of France for new instructions. The same day, in the morning, another Conference was held from nine o'clock, till about two in the afternoon; wherein they begun to set down some articles in writing, and agreed to meet again about six in the evening. That afternoon Count Zinzendorf, the Emperor's Plenipotentiary, arrived at the Hague, and went immediately with Monsieur Heems, the Imperial Minister, to pay a visit to Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough; with whom, together with the Pensionary, Count Gallas, and the Lord Townshend, the French Ministers had another Conference in relation to the security of the execution, of the points agreed on. But, though this Conference lasted from six till eleven o'clock in the evening, yet nothing was concluded in it. The 24th, in the morning, the French Ministers had another interview with the Deputies of the States, who gave an account of what had passed in it to the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene; and, the same evening, there was another meeting, wherein they resumed the debate relating to the security of the performance of the articles agreed on, particularly the evacuation of the Spanish Dominions. For this the Allies demanded several cautionary towns; but the French refused to give any, insisting, 'That the engagement, which the most Christian King offered to enter into, to recall his troops from Spain, same thing to part with these towns, and keep Spain, as to part with them and Spain too? If not, then his agreeing to give up one is no proof he intends to part with the other. Ay, but when the Allies have these towns, they will force him to it. That I deny. Why so, say they? The towns are to be delivered in two months: That is, by the middle of August; and then the Allies will have time enough to enter France, if he sends any succour to his Grandson. But, first, the surrender, that is to be made in two months, is only of those towns, that are to make the barrier for the Netherlands: Those, that are to be restored to the Emperor and Empire, are not to be evacuated till the exchange of their ratifications, which is a tedious work. Besides, though it be stipulated, that the towns in the Netherlands, &c. shall be given up in two months, I believe no body wants to be told, that things are seldom so punctually executed, as to be performed nicely within the time agreed. But I will suppose for once, these articles had been effectually complied with within the time, and that the Allies consequently would have been at liberty to invade France, if they had openly sent any considerable succours to Spain; but what then? Could not they have sent money and jewels to the Duke of Anjou, without any danger of discovery? Or would they not have pretence enough for denying it? And would the Allies invade France, upon a bare suspicion of sending such an assistance to Spain? And for men, though a body of troops could not have been sent thither without being known, might not what number they pleased of the French troops, that were in Spain, have fled there, under a notion of desertion, or have been detained by the Duke of Anjou's order, upon some blind pretence or other; a trick the Grandfather has practised often enough for the Grandson to learn it from him? Well, but suppose France had neither openly, nor under-hand, given the Duke of Anjou any assistance for that summer (not that I can by any means grant it) how long would that have held? Or what use would the Allies have made of it? Could the troops we had then in Spain have over-run the Kingdom without further help, or have driven out the Duke of Anjou in one campaign? That, I presume, will not by any body be pretended. Or could a sufficient reinforcement have been sent time enough to them, either from Italy or England, to do any great matters that year? That, I suppose, will be pretended as little by those, that consider, it was June, when these preliminaries were finished. It is plain then, Spain could not have been gained that year, unless the Duke of Anjou had consented to relinquish it. Let us then, in the next place, suppose the summer spent, and the armies gone out of the field, and see what we are to expect then. A peace is made with France; the Allies have got each of them their respective shares, and have nothing more to hope for. They renew, perhaps, the Grand Alliance, with great expressions of mutual zeal; the Emperor at least, and the maritime powers; but some of the lesser Princes might possibly shew themselves disgusted, and think they have been neglected: For, as the preliminaries are now settled, it is certain more than one of them are not satisfied. Suppose the King of Prussia or Duke of Savoy, for example, had thought due care had not been taken of them, it is plain, in that case, their Alliance is no longer to be depended on; and either of these, falling off, would very much weaken the Confederacy; especially the last, whom the French would be very glad to draw into their interests. But suppose none of the Allies have any of these resentments, or at least stifle them, and all consent to renew the Grand Alliance; what becomes of the armies upon leaving the field? Is it not certain, that they will on all sides diminish great part of their forces? Will not the maritime powers send home the foreign troops in their pay, except such as Holland keeps for the defence of their new frontier? Shall we hear of any more armies upon the Rhine, or in Savoy, when they have made peace, when the articles of the treaty have been all executed, and there is no more any enemy to molest them, no cause of complaint, or pretence for a new campaign left? I think nothing can be surer, than that this would have been the case: The Allies would have thought no more of war in the places that have been hitherto the seats of it, nor have made any preparations for taking the field another year. All sides would have made what haste they could to have lessened the burthen, which, during the war, they had been oppressed with. Holland particularly would have had full work to take care of their new frontier, to provide so many towns with sufficient garrisons and magazines, and settle what foot the several parts of their new acquisitions should be put upon, with respect to war, trade, and subsidies; and, besides the great expence this would for the present put them to, they would be at a very great charge to pay the arrears due to the foreign troops, without which they could not be dismissed. Add to this the extraordinary allowance, which, upon their dismissing, is to be made to carry them home. This would put the States under a necessity of retrenching, as much as possible, the expences of the next year. And this last article England would be proportionably affected with. Now I would be glad to know, what should hinder the King of France, from the minute the Allies dismiss their troops, to give what assistance he will to Spain, provided it be not done too grossly, but gradually, by insensible steps; and by those many ways of artifice, which the French are masters of? If they make a peace, they may disband sixty or eighty thousand men, or more. And what should hinder these men from going into Spain to seek their bread? What shall hinder the King of France from giving secret orders for this? And, when it is complained of, from positively denying, and perhaps seemingly forbidding it? And may not the Duke of Anjou, by this means, against the next spring, have a greater army, than the Allies can bring against him? And how then are we to get Spain? Will the Allies raise new armies, and make a new war upon France in Flanders, upon the Rhine, and in Savoy, because some men have insensibly stole out of France into Spain, 1709. Spain, and his promise to give no manner of assistance to King Philip, was a sufficient security, since that Prince, being thus forsaken by his Grandfather, would be obliged to quit Spain; and the rather, because the Spaniards, in such a case, would certainly declare for King Charles.³ This occasioned warm debates; but at last it was agreed, that France should deliver up some places in the Netherlands, that were to be part of the barrier, before they entered upon the general negotiations of peace. On the 25th and 26th, there was no interview with the French Ministers; but the Duke of Marlborough, Prince Eugene, the Lord Townshend, and Count Zinzendorf had several Conferences with the Pensionary and the Deputies of the States, wherein they acquainted the new Imperial Plenipotentiary with what had been transacted since the beginning of this negotiation, and agreed on the further demands to be made to the French Ministers. A Conference being held on the 27th, in the morning, at which Count Zinzendorf assisted for the first time, those demands were communicated to Torcy and Rouillé, who desired some time to consider of them. But the Duke of Marlborough having sent them word, that he and Prince Eugene had determined to set out for Flanders within two days, they promised to return an answer at six in the evening in another Conference, which lasted till two o'clock in the morning. After many disputes, the French seemed to comply with all the preliminary articles insisted on by the Confederates.

The foundation of the whole treaty was, the restoring of the whole Spanish Monarchy to King Charles, within two months: Torcy said, the time was too short, and that, perhaps, it was not in the King of France's power to bring that about; for the Spaniards seemed resolved to stick to King Philip. It was, upon this, insisted on, that the King of France should be obliged to concur with the Allies, to force it by all proper methods: But this was not farther explained, for the Allies were well assured, that if it was sincerely intended by France, there would be no great difficulty in bringing it about. This, therefore, being laid down as the basis of the treaty, the other preliminaries related to the restoring all

Spain, against the express order of the King, which you are sure will be pretended? You do not know the sweets of peace, or how unwilling people are, who have once laid down their arms, to take them up again. If you think the Allies could be brought to this, or that any armies would take the field against France, after a peace was once made; what then is to be hoped for? Why, I think nothing more than this, that the Dutch and the Emperor would contribute for a little while, perhaps for one campaign, some money and troops, to act in conjunction with England against Spain; in which no great success can be expected, considering the numerous army, I have shewn you, the Duke of Anjou might and would have. Now if this, upon the trial of one campaign, were found to be the case, I am afraid Holland would not be very willing to continue the prosecution of so expensive a war; and the whole weight of it another year would lie upon England, except a very little, that might be expected from the Emperor. And what could this end in, but in the ruin of England, and the loss of Spain? For the most that could be expected from this war, would be, that the Duke of Anjou would offer a partition, such as I have mentioned in my first letter, but with no option in the case. He would certainly keep Spain and the Indies, and give the other part to his Competitor. And if that be accepted, what becomes of England, which is so much interested in the recovery of Spain? And if it be not accepted, what shall hinder the French King from assisting his Grandson after one year, more openly, and taking upon him to mediate a peace; that is, to force such a one as he pleases upon us? For how can we help ourselves? Shall we be in a condition to quarrel with him, when we have been exhausted two years more with such an expensive war, while he has been enjoying all the advantages of peace, to repair the breaches the war had made in his affairs; to restore commerce, retrieve the public credit, remedy the ill state of his finances, look into the condition of his fleet, and put himself into the best posture he can for a new war, if the support of the Duke of Anjou makes it necessary? No, sure; we shall never think ourselves in a condition to break with him; nor shall we be able to persuade our Allies to it. No part therefore will be left us, but to submit to such a peace with his Grandson, as he shall in his pleasure think fit to prescribe. I need not enlarge upon the difficulties of making war with Spain, after what I have said in my first letter. It is easy to see how the Duke of Anjou may find us weak enough for two or three years, if he do but avoid coming to an action. Sieges will cost time, as well as men and money; and many must be made before such a Kingdom can be reduced; and that will give the King of France opportunity enough to do what he will, to support his Grandson, or to prescribe a peace, or begin a new war, which it is always easy to find a pretence for; and we are sure he cannot want inclination to do whatever is in his power, which such a cause calls for. Nor is he to be known, as to leave us the least room to think, that any treaties or engagements can bind him, when inclination and power tempt him to break through them. His whole Reign is one continued proof of this. I have said somewhat of it already, and therefore shall add but one instance, which is a little parallel to the case before us; and that is, the manner in which he kept the promise he made the Spaniards at the Pyrenean treaty, not to assist the Portuguese, who were then at war with them. Never was treaty made with more solemnity; and yet what did those engagements signify? All the time the treaty was making, France was concerting measures to support the Portuguese; and the King, the present King, who was then but young in perfidy, had so little regard to cover or palliate what he did, that he sent, in the face of all the world, an army to the assistance of those, whose defence he had renounced, commanded by a Marshal of France. And can we, after such an instance, depend upon his word? Has he not much greater temptation to assist Spain against us, than he had then to support the Portuguese against Spain? Is not the honour of his Grandson, the interest of his family, and the acquisition of so great a Monarchy or infinitely more concern to him, than the defence of Portugal could be? A man must be blind, not to see there is no comparison between the two cases; and it is inexcusable, when we are sensible of this, to think, that a Prince, who has been so false in one instance, can be ever true in the other.

The sum of this argument is, that if a separate peace be made with France upon the foot of the preliminaries, without the 37th article, nothing can hinder France from assisting the Duke of Anjou: And, if he be assisted by France, we can never be able to drive him out of Spain: And consequently, if Spain be ever had, it must be by treaty. If therefore no peace can be a good one without Spain, then the 37th article is necessary in order to a good peace: Which is the point I was to prove.

I know but one thing can be said against what I have advanced upon this head; and that is, That the Allies, though they make peace with France, should 1709. all the places in the Netherlands, except Cambray and St. Omé; the demolishing or restoring of Dunkirk; the restoring of Strasbourg, Brisack, and Hunningen to the Empire; Newfoundland to England; and Savoy to that Duke, besides his continuing possessed of all, he then had in his hands; the acknowledging the King of Prussia's Royal dignity, and the Electorate in the House of Brunswick; the sending the Pretender out of France, and the owning the Succession to the Crown of England, as it was settled by law. As all the great interests were provided for, by these preliminaries; so all other matters were reserved to be considered, when the treaty of peace should be opened: A cessation of all hostilities was to begin, within two months, and to continue till all was concluded by a compleat treaty, and ratified: Provided the Spanish Monarchy was then intirely restored. The French Ministers seemed to be confounded at these demands: But, in conclusion, pretended to submit to them (1). Torcy told the Ministers, he would set out for Paris immediately, to lay the whole before his most Christian Majesty, and at parting desired the ratifications might be returned with all possible haste. He promised Prince Eugene, that the King of France's final answer should be sent, by the fourth of June; but spoke of their affairs as a man in despair: He said, he did not know but he might find King Philip at Paris, before he got thither, and said all that was possible, to assure them of the fincerity of the King of France, and to divert them from the thoughts of opening the campaign; but at the same time King Philip was getting his son, the Prince of Asturias, to be acknowledged, by all the towns and bodies of Spain, as the heir of that Monarchy. Rouillé, who had opened the first scene of this negotiation, was to continue at the Hague some time longer, in order to suspend the unravelling of the plot as long as possible. The whole artifice of France was at length discovered, and it appeared very visibly, ^{they are} rejected by ^{the French.} that the French had no other design in all this negotiation, but to try if they could beget an ill understanding among the Allies, or, by their seeming great concessions for the security of the States, to provoke the people of Holland against their Magistrates, if they should carry on the war, when they had such safe and honourable offers made them; and they reckoned, that if a suspension of arms could be once obtained upon any other terms than the restoring of Spain, they should then get out of the war, and the Allies would be left to try, how they could conquer Spain. Torcy was, however, punctual to his promise given to Prince Eugene; for, on the 4th of June, the Prince, being at Brussels, received a letter from the Marquis, importing, "That his most Christian Majesty, having examined the project of peace concluded at the Hague, found it impossible for him to accept it; and therefore had sent orders to the President de Rouillé to notify the same to the Potentates still keep up their armies, and then France will not dare to give the Duke of Anjou any great assistance. But, first, I have already shewn, that this is a very unreasonable supposition; the Allies most certainly would not continue to keep up their armies, were a peace with France once made. But let us now suppose they would, how would this mend the matter? If we keep on foot as great armies, as we have now, we should be no more at liberty to send men into Spain, than we are now. And, if we sent any considerable number to Spain, they would be wanted elsewhere; and the King of France would have nothing to fear from us, for want of a sufficient strength to act offensively, in case we should think ourselves sufficiently provoked to it by any thing he does in violation of the treaty; nay, considering the number of towns given up to the Allies, which all must have garrisons in them, and those not very small ones, to keep their new subjects in awe, we should want a greater army in Flanders than before, to be in a condition to act offensively. And, if such armies must be kept up, that is, why we may not as well continue the war, or to what purpose we should make peace. To me continuing the war seems much more eligible than such a peace, for this plain reason, that France would certainly make a great advantage of peace, while we must, under the name of peace, continue in a state of war, without the fruits of it. For example, all we have done, this campaign, would upon that supposition have been undone; and we should have been so much farther off than we are, from putting France under a necessity to give us Spain. For though the successes of this year [1710] have been so slighted, as to be thought not worth mentioning, where one would have most expected it; I can tell you, Dowry alone is in the opinion of France of that mighty consequence, that in all the negotiations, that have been carried on, since the refusal of the preliminaries, to find an expedient for the thirty-seventh article, Dowry has been always excepted out of the number of the towns, that they have pretended to give as an equivalent. Now this and the other conquests of this campaign have brought us much nearer to our end, Numb. LXI. Vol. IV.

than if our armies had gone out of the field, as they came in, and had done nothing. I must therefore still maintain, that upon all suppositions the thirty-seventh article is necessary to a good peace, unless some real expedient could be found out, which has hitherto been in vain looked for.

(1) The preliminary articles were as follows:

1. That a firm and lasting peace be forthwith treated of, &c.
2. That to that end preliminary articles be agreed on, &c.
3. That the most Christian King shall acknowledge King Charles III. King of Spain, &c.
4. The treaty shall be finished in two months, during which time Sicily shall be put into the hands of King Charles; and the Duke of Anjou shall evacuate Spain, which, if he refuses to consent to, the French King and the Allies shall enter into proper measures, that this article may have intire effect.
5. That the French King shall, within that time, withdraw his troops out of Spain, &c. and not assist the Duke of Anjou for the future with troops, artillery, ammunition, or money.
6. The Monarchy of Spain shall remain intire in the House of Austria, and no Prince of the House of France ever become Sovereign of any part thereof.
7. France shall never possess the Spanish West-Indies, or trade thither.
- 8, 9. The French King shall deliver up Strasbourg, Fort Kehl, and Brisack to the Emperor.
10. The French King shall possess Alsace in the literal sense of the treaty of Münster, except Landsau, which shall belong to the Emperor.
11. He shall demolish New Brisack, Fort Lewis, and Hunningen.
12. Rheinfels shall be possessed by the Landgrave of Hesse, till otherwise agreed.
13. The clause concerning Religion in the treaty of Ryswick shall be referred to the negotiation.
- 14, 15. The French shall acknowledge the Queen of Great-Britain, and the Protestant Succession.
16. The French King shall restore to Great-Britain

1709. "tates engaged in the war; and that it was to be hoped, that more favourable terms would present for the establishing of a peace so necessary for all Europe, and consequently so much desired by every body." The Messenger, who brought this letter to Prince Eugene, arrived the next morning at the Hague, where people were in the height of expectation of the French King's ratification of the preliminaries; but, to their great disappointment, Rouillé having the same day had a Conference at the Pensionary's, with the Imperial and British Plenipotentiaries, and the Deputies of the States, he acquainted them, That the most Christian King could not ratify some articles agreed to in the Conference held with Monsieur de Torcy, and concluded the 28th past. He excepted to the articles relating to the Emperor and the Duke of Savoy; but chiefly on that of not beginning the suspension of arms, till the Spanish Monarchy should be restored, which, he said, was not in his power to execute (1).

These difficulties started by the French King having been communicated by Rouillé, Count Zinzendorf, the Duke of Marlborough, the Lord Townshend, and the Pensionary Heinsius, immediately held a Conference among themselves, in which it was resolved, "That no alteration ought to be admitted in the preliminary articles, especially in those excepted against by France, which were the most essential." And it was agreed at the same time to signify to Rouillé, to depart in four and twenty hours.

The 6th of June, N. S. in the morning, 1709. Rouillé made a visit to the Duke of Marlborough, and proposed another Conference, which was held that night; but nothing material was transacted in it, except that the Allies declared to Rouillé, "That they would not recede from any of the articles agreed to; and that, if his Master did not think fit to comply therewith, the Allies would not think themselves bound by the articles, or refrain their pretensions to the contents thereof, after the 15th of that month, the time allowed by the articles." The French Minister said, He had no orders to make any further declaration; whereupon he received a second intimation to depart the Hague immediately. The same evening, Mr. Walpole, Secretary to the British Plenipotentiaries, returned to the Hague with the Queen of Great Britain's ratification of the preliminaries. On the 8th, the Pensionary reported Rouillé's declaration to the Assembly of the States; upon which they considered, "That the articles were concerted with the Marquis de Torcy and Monsieur de Rouillé, put into writing with their assent, and by the Marquis de Torcy himself carried to the King of France, in order to be signed and ratified; that they were actually signed on the part of the Emperor, Great-Britain, and Holland, and had been ratified by her Britannic Majesty; and that nothing short of these preliminaries could obtain and secure the general peace, and prevent a dangerous, expensive, " and what he is possessed of in Newfoundland; and whatever either party has taken in the Indies shall be restored.

17. Dunkirk shall be demolished.

18. The Pretender shall retire out of France.

19. A treaty of commerce shall be settled with Great-Britain.

20. The King of Portugal shall enjoy all that is stipulated for him by the Allies.

21. The French King shall acknowledge the King of Prussia, and not disturb him in the enjoyment of Neuchâtel.

22. The French King shall deliver up Furnes, Menin, Ypres, Warneton, Commines, Werwick, Poperingen, Liège, Condé, and Maubeuge, for the barrier of the States.

23. He shall restore all the towns and forts he has taken in the Netherlands, with the artillery and stores, provided the Catholic Religion shall still be professed there.

24. None of the cannon or stores to be removed from this time.

25. The States, as to their commerce, shall have what was stipulated at the treaty of Ryswick, and the tariff of 1664 only shall be in force.

26. The French King shall acknowledge the ninth Electorate.

27. The Duke of Savoy shall enjoy all that has been yielded to him by the Emperor, and whatever has been taken from him shall be restored.

28. The French King shall make over to that Duke Exilles, Fensbrilles, and Chémont, with the valley of Pragelas, and all on this side the mountains, for a barrier.

29. The pretensions of the Elector of Bavaria and Cologne shall be referred to the general negotiation; but the Elector Palatine to remain in possession of the Upper Palatinate, &c. the garrisons of the States to remain in Huy, Liège, and Bonne, till otherwise agreed with the Emperor and Empire.

30, 31, 32. The farther demands on either side shall not interrupt the cessation of arms; the other Allies being allowed to make farther demands at the general congress.

33, 34. The negotiation shall be finished in two months, and in the mean time a cessation of arms be made.

35. Upon the ratification of these articles the French King shall evacuate Namur, Mont, Charleroy, Luxembourg, Condé, Tournay, Maubeuge, Newport, Tournes, and Ypres, and raze the fortifications of Dunkirk.

36. The French to execute what has been stipulated, with respect to the other Allies, within two months after the conclusion of the treaty.

37. And if he executes all that is abovementioned, and the whole Monarchy of Spain shall be delivered up to Charles III. as is stipulated within the limited time, then the cessation of arms shall continue till the ratification of the peace.

38. All this shall serve as the foundation and basis of the ensuing treaties of peace.

39. The ratification of the preliminary articles to be performed by the French King, the Queen of Great-Britain, and the States, before the 15th of June, and by the Emperor by the 1st of July, and what is stipulated in favour of each of the Allies respectively, to be set down as soon as they have settled the preliminaries.

40. The congress to begin the 20th of June at the Hague, and, to prevent disputes about the ceremonial, no Ambassador shall take upon him his character till the day of the signing of the peace. Lamberti, Vol. V.

(1) Rouillé said, That the French King in particular excepted against the tenth, eleventh, twentieth, twenty-ninth, and thirty-seventh. That as to the tenth his most Christian Majesty agreed to the same, as far as it concerned the possession of Alsatia, according to the literal sense of the treaty of Münster; but insisted, that Landau should be restored to him; and, as an equivalent, offered Old Brissac; both which places were yielded up to France by that treaty. That the most Christian King could not consent to the de-

1709: "and lingering war in Spain." Whereupon the necessary resolutions for the continuance of the war were taken with equal firmness and wisdom.

The same night, Rouillé being pressed to declare if he had any secret orders tending to peace, made answer, "That if the Allies would content themselves with the fifth article of the preliminaries in relation to Spain, without insisting on the others relating to the delivering up of the Spanish Monarchy, he thought the King, his Master, would be induced to depart from the other exceptions about Alsatia, the Duke of Savoy, &c." But the recovery of the Spanish Monarchy from the House of Bourbon being the chief end of the war, and the only means to restore and preserve the balance of Europe, the Ministers of the Allies did not think fit to depart from any one of the articles to secure the evacuation of Spain; and so, the same evening, a passport was sent Rouillé, for his safe return home. On the 9th of June he set out from the Hague, to embark at Rotterdam for Antwerp, from whence he continued his journey to Paris. The same morning, all the Ministers of the Allies being desired to meet in a Congress, Monsieur Van Essen, President of the secret affairs, and the Pensionary, communicated to them the resolution of the States-General, gave them a full account of all the steps that had been made in the negotiations, particularly since the French King had refused to agree to the preliminaries; and desired them to acquaint their Principals with these unfair proceedings of France, and exhort them to join their best efforts against an enemy, who could never be brought to reason but by force. Count Zinzendorf took this opportunity to tell the Deputies of the States, "That the Empire, the Emperor, and King Charles III. would doubtless express their satisfaction for the great firmness and constancy, which their High Mightinesses had manifested in the course of these negotiations." The Duke of Marlborough gave the same assurances on the part of the Queen of Great Britain; as did also the rest of the Ministers, on the part of their respective Masters; and all signified to the Pensionary, how much the Allies were obliged to him, and satisfied with the prudence and wisdom he had expressed in the negotiations, which, contrary to the expectation of the enemy, would prove a new cement to the Grand Alliance, and an argument to convince the Allies, that the war was to be prosecuted till France was reduced to the necessity of submitting to any terms that the Allies should prescribe.

Thus these negotiations came soon to an end, without producing any ill effect among the Allies; and it now plainly appeared, that the easiness with which the French Ministers yielded to the preliminaries, was only an artifice to slacken the zeal of the Confederates in advancing the campaign, as the least effect it would have: But in that their hopes failed them, for there was no time lost in preparing to take the field (1). The States of Holland and West-Friesland having met on the 13th of June, N. S. ratified the preliminary articles, without regard to that King's refusal to sign them; after which, the Assembly unanimously resolved to carry on the war with the utmost vigour. But, while the generality of people in Great Britain, Holland, and Germany, expressed their resentment against the insincerity of France, that Court made a politic use of the very preliminary articles, which were made public in several languages by the Allies. For, in order to raise among his people an indignation against those exorbitant demands, and encourage them to bear, with less impatience, the burden and calamities of war, the French King caused circular letters to be sent to all the Governors of his provinces, the Archbishop of Paris, and other Prelates of France, wherein he insisted upon the unreasonableness of the Allies, in requiring his assistance to dethrone his Grandson (2).

mollifying Humingen, New Brisac, and Fort Lewis, but agreed to all the other parts of the eleventh article. That the eight and twentieth, relating to the places yielded to the Duke of Savoy, was intirely excepted against, and referred to a farther discussion. That his Majesty also disliked the whole nine and twentieth article, whereby the Emperor's proceedings against the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria were approved, but would have the same referred to the negotiations of a general peace, with this proviso, that the Upper Palatinate, and the dignity annexed thereto, should not be confirmed to the Elector Palatine; and that the interests of the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria should be settled in the preliminaries; and, in the last place, that his most Christian Majesty excepted also against the seven and thirtieth article, whereby two months only were allowed for the delivering up of the Spanish Monarchy, which term he would have enlarged, but consented to recall his own troops from Spain within that time.

(1) Burnet observes on this occasion, France had so perfidiously broke all their treaties, during this King's Reign, that it was a piece of inexcusable folly to expect any other from them. In the peace of the Pyrenees, where the interest of France was not so deeply engaged, to preserve Portugal from falling under the yoke of Castile, as it was now to preserve Spain in the hands of a grandson; after the King had sworn to give no assistance to Portugal, yet, under the pretence of breaking some bodies, he suffered them to be entertained by the Portuguese Ambassador, and sent Schemberg to command that army; pretending he could not hinder one, that was a German by birth, to go and serve where he pleased: Under these pretences, he had broke his faith, where the consideration was not so strong, as in the present case. Thus it was visible no faith that King could give was to be relied on, and that unless Spain was restored, all would prove a fatal delusion: Besides, it came afterwards to be known, that the places in Brabant and Hainault, commanded by the Elector of Bavaria, would not have been evacuated by him, unless he had orders for it from the King of Spain, under whom he governed in them; and that was not to be expected. Burnet, Vol. II. 529.

(2) These letters were as follow:

Cousin,

The hopes of an approaching peace were so generally spread in my Kingdom, that, out of regard to the loyalty my people have expressed during the whole course of my Reign, I think myself obliged to give them the comfort of acquainting them with the reasons, which still hinder their enjoying the repose I designed to procure them.

In order to restore the same, I would have accepted conditions very opposite to the security of my frontier provinces; but the more facility and desire I have shewn to dissipate the umbrages, which my enemies affect

The people in France were much wrought on, by this pretended indignity offered to their Monarch, to oblige him to force his Grandson to abandon Spain; and even here in England, there wanted not many, who said it was a cruel hardship put on the French King, to force him into such an unnatural war: But if he was guilty of the injustice, of putting him in possession of that Kingdom, it was but a reasonable piece of justice, to undo what he himself had done: And it was so visible, that King Philip was maintained on that Throne by the Councils and Assistance of France, that no doubt was made, but that, if the King of France had really designed it, he could easily have obliged him to relinquish all pretensions to that Crown.

Endeavour of France to draw off the Duke of Savoy from the French Court and the Pope were using all imwas soon attended with the disgrace of Monsieur de Chamillard, the French King's prime Minister, and even with some coldness towards Madame de Maintenon, who were both said to have given larger instructions to Rouillé and Torcy, than either the King intended, or were thought proper by the young Princes of the blood (1). On the other hand, it is observable, that while the terms of peace were debating, both the French Court and the Pope were using all imginable endeavours to draw off the Duke of Savoy from the Grand Alliance; the discovery of which was owing to the Duke's Minister at the Hague, and came very opportunely to expose the double-dealing of the Court of France, who had the modesty to reject the very article of the preliminaries, by which the Allies stipulated a barrier for the Duke of Savoy, and, at the same time, were offering him much greater advantages to induce him to leave the peace of Europe to their mercy. But these artifices were defeated by the penetration and firmness of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, who treated the peace, as they managed the war, and, by their cool temper and open conduct, baffled the stratagems both of the French Ministers and Generals. And it is certain, that the French, who proposed to divide the Allies, by setting on foot a negotiation of peace, were themselves caught in the preliminaries, which were so wisely contrived for the particular satisfaction of each of the Confederates, for their common security, that they became the more firmly united by this very transaction; and, being justly incensed at the unfair proceedings of France, resolved to improve their late advantages, by a vigorous prosecution of the war.

affect to entertain of my power and designs, the more they have multiplied their pretensions; inasmuch that by degrees, adding new demands to the first, and making use, either of the Duke of Savoy's name, or of the interest of the Princes of the Empire, they have at once let me see, that they had no other intention, than to increase, at the expence of my Crown, the States bordering upon France, and to open to themselves easy ways to penetrate into the heart of my Kingdom, as often as it would suit with their interest to begin a new war. Nor would the war I now maintain, and was willing to have ended, have ceased, had I consented to the proposals they have made to me. For they fixed within two months the term, wherein I was, on my part, to execute the treaty; and, during that interval, they pretended to oblige me to deliver up to them the places they demanded of me in the Low-Countries and Alsace, and to raze those, on the demolishing whereof they insisted; refusing, on their part, to enter into any other engagements, than the suspension of all acts of hostility, till the first day of August, and reserving to themselves the liberty of acting then by force of arms, in case the King of Spain, my Grandson, persisted in the resolution of defending the Crown God has given him, and rather to perish, than abandon faithful people, who, for nine years, have acknowledged him as their lawful King. Such a suspension (more dangerous than war itself) would rather put off than forward peace. For it would not only have been necessary to continue the same expence for the maintaining of my armies, but, as soon as the term of the suspension of arms would have expired, my enemies would have attacked me with the new advantages they would have taken from the towns, into which I should have introduced them myself, at the same time that I should have demolished those that are a bulwark to some of my frontier provinces. I pass over in silence the proposals they have insinuated to me, of joining my forces with those of the Confederates, and to compel my Grandson to descend the Throne, if he did not voluntarily consent to live, for the future, without Dominions, and to reduce himself to the condition of a private man. It is against humanity to believe, that they had even the thought of engaging me in such an Alliance with them; but although the tenderness I have for my people be as hearty as for my own children; although I bear a part in all the ills, which the war makes such faithful subjects undergo; and I have shewn to all Europe, that I sincerely desired to make them enjoy peace; I am persuaded they would themselves oppose the acceptance of it on conditions equally opposite to justice, and to the honour of the French name.

It is therefore my intention, that all those, who, for so many years past, have given me demonstrations of their zeal, by contributing with their labours, fortunes, and blood, towards the maintaining so heavy a war, may know, that the only value my enemies pretended to set on the offers, I was willing to make to them, was a suspension of arms; which, being stinted to the space of two months, would have procured to them more considerable advantages, than they may expect from the confidence they put in their troops. As I repose mine in the protection of God, hoping that the purity of my intentions will draw the divine blessing upon my arms, I write to the Archbishops and Bishops of my Kingdom, to excite more and more the fervency of prayer in their respective dioceses: And at the same time I order you to acquaint my people, within the extent of your Government, that they should enjoy peace, if it had been in my power, as it was in my will, to procure them a Good they wish for with reason, but which must be obtained by new efforts, since the immense conditions I would have granted, are useless towards the restoring of the public tranquillity. I therefore leave it to your prudence to make my intentions known in such a manner, as you shall judge convenient. And so I pray God to have you in his holy keeping. Lambert, Vol. IV.

(1) It was reported, That the Duke of Burgundy pressed the making a peace, as necessary to prevent the ruin of France, while the Dauphin pressed more vehemently the continuance of the war, and the supporting of the King of Spain: It was said, that Madame Maintenon appeared less at Court; Chamillard, who had lost of her favour, was dismissed; But it is not certain, what influence that had on the public Councils; and the conduct of this whole negotiation shewed plainly, that there was nothing designed in it, but to divide, or to deceive the Confederates; and, if possible, to gain a separate peace for France, and then to let the Allies conquer Spain as they could. But the Allies kept firm to one another, and the treachery of the French appeared so visible, even to the people in Holland, that all the hopes they had, of inflaming them against their Magistrates, likewise failed. Burnet, Vol. II. 530.

1709. Campaign in Flanders. Brodick. Cond. of the D. of Marlborough. Hist. of Eur. Burnet.

The Duke of Marlborough set out from the Hague soon after Rouillé, to put himself at the head of his army. Prince Eugene had absolutely refused to go into Spain. There was nothing to fear in Italy. The army, on the Rhine, was formed with great difficulty, and very late. So the Prince chose to remain in Flanders, and second the Duke of Marlborough's designs. On the other hand, Villars was sent to command the French army in Flanders, of whom the King of France said, He was never beaten; Harcourt commanded on the Rhine, and the Duke of Berwick in Dauphiné. As the Duke of Marlborough had trusted little to the shews of peace, he had taken care to have every thing in readiness to open the campaign, as soon as he saw what might be expected from the Court of France. By the 21st of June, the Confederate troops formed an army of a hundred and ten thousand men near Menin; and, two days after, the right wing under Prince Eugene, and the left under the Duke of Marlborough, marched and incamped in the plain of Lisle, on both sides the Upper-Deule. About the same time, the enemy's forces were marching from all quarters to form their army, under Marshal Villars, in the plain of Lens, where he began to cast up intrenchments to cover his troops. Upon advice from Arras that Villars had positive orders to venture a battle, the Lieutenant-Generals Doff and Cadogan were sent out with detachments, to take a near view of the enemy; and, upon their report of the almost insuperable difficulties that must attend the attacking the French troops in their advantageous and fortified camp, the Confederate Generals resolved to lay siege to Tournay (1). The conquest of this place, notwithstanding the strong fortifications, appeared the more easy, because Villars, at the approach of the Confederate army, had unadvisedly weakened the garrison. It seems, the train of artillery was by a feint brought up the Lys to Courtray; and therefore it was believed, the Duke of Marlborough's design was upon Ypres, and, there being no apprehension of any attempt upon Tournay, no particular care was taken of it; so that, on the 27th of June, it was suddenly invested, and the train was sent back to Ghent, and brought up the Scheld to Tournay. This enterprize was managed with so much secrecy, that the enemy could not have notice of the designs of the Allies, nor time to reinforce the garrison, which consisted only of twelve weak battalions, and four squadrons of dragoons, under the command of Lieutenant-General de Surville. Upon the Confederate army's coming up to the town, the Duke of Marlborough made a detachment, under the Prince of Nassau, to surprize St. Amand, a post very necessary to cover the siege, and another to take possession of Mortagne, a post, where the Scarpe falls into the Scheld; both which were soon effected, the French troops retiring upon the approach of our men. The Governor of Tournay, not a little surprized to see the town invested, which was unprovided with necessaries for a long siege, rifled great part of the corn of the inhabitants, and sent out a party of French dragoons to bring in the cattle of the neighbourhood, who were most of them cut off, or taken prisoners, and the cattle, to the number of above seven hundred, were generously restored to the peasants. At the same time, Villars, being sensible of his mistake, in weakening the garrison of Tournay, ordered seven or eight thousand horse from Mons and Condé to advance, and endeavour to throw themselves into the town; but such measures were taken to prevent them, that they were forced to retire, without attempting any thing.

On the 3d of July, all the troops appointed for the siege had taken their posts round the town, from Cerque above the town, to the castle of Constantine below it; and, the next day, the line of circumvallation was begun on this side the Scheld. In the mean while, upon advice, that a detachment of ten thousand men from the enemy's army was marched towards Warneton, Lieutenant-General Wilks was detached thither, with two thousand five hundred grenadiers, and thirty squadrons. But, before he could arrive, a Lieutenant-Colonel, a Major, and about seven hundred men had yielded themselves prisoners of War. All the necessary dispositions being made for opening the trenches, and the bridges of communication being laid over the Scheld, the Generals made the following dispositions for the attacks of the city and citadel: That there should be three attacks; one against the citadel, and one on each side of the river against the town, of which the principal was to be commanded by General Lottum, against the citadel, on the side of the gate of Valenciennes: The second by General Fagel, against the gate of Marville; and the third by General Schuylenburgh, against the horn-work of the gate of the seven fountains. Sixty battalions were appointed for the trenches; three Imperialists, seven English, three Danes, seven Prussians, three Saxons, twenty-three Dutch, five Hanoverians, three Palatines, four Hessians, two Wirtemburghers; and six squadrons of the troops of the several nations were to attend the usual services of horse in a siege.

On the 4th of July, the enemy endeavoured to possess themselves of Commines and Fort Rouge, in the former of which places was a Major with a hundred and fifty men, and in the latter a Captain with fifty, who were twice attacked with great vigour; but they defended themselves so bravely, that, the Confederate troops coming up in time to their relief, the enemy not only retired with precipitation, but abandoned the post of Warneton. On the 7th, at night, the trenches were opened before Tournay at the three attacks, with the loss of about thirty

(1) Tournay is one of the most antient Cities of Flanders. It had belonged time out of mind to France, till in 1513 it was taken by King Henry VIII. of England. It was soon after restored by the intrigues of Cardinal Wolsey. The Spaniards took it in 1618, and kept it till 1667, when it was retaken by Lewis XIV. This Prince had spared no cost to fortify it, and had made it one of the strongest places in the Netherlands: It is very advantageously situated, of a great No. 61. Vol. IV.

compass, and divided by the Scheld, as the army, that besieges it, must also be, which is always very incommo- dious and dangerous: See the plan of the Town and Citadel, which, for the Reader's satisfaction, is here annexed. thirty men killed, and as many wounded. The next day the trenches were relieved about four in the afternoon; but the violent rains, which fell in the night, very much incommoded the Besiegers, and retarded their works. On the 9th the Besiegers began to erect a battery. The same day two French Officers, who attempted to get into the town, were taken prisoners; and, in the night, the trenches were carried on (notwithstanding the wet weather, and the continual fire of the Besieged) with the loss of thirty men killed or wounded. The 10th thirty vessels, laden with artillery and ammunition, arrived near the bridges of communication. The same day the Besieged made a sally with five hundred men, but immediately retired at the approach of the Confederates. The 12th they made another sally by the Valenciennes gate; but General Lotum had disposed all things at his attack with such regularity, that the enemy were immediately repulsed with the loss of near twenty men. On the 13th the Besiegers began at the attack of Count Lotum, and fired from two batteries of twelve pieces of cannon each with so much success, that they soon dismounted the guns of the enemy on that side, and beat down a wind-mill, from which they had very much disturbed the Allies in their trenches. The 14th they began at the same attack to fire from another battery to break open sluices, and the same day the batteries, at the attack of General Fagel, began to fire; as did, on the 15th, those at the attack of General Schuylenburgh. The rest of the cannon and mortars were mounting on several batteries, and were in a condition to fire the 16th. The same day the Besiegers at Count Lotum's attack began to batter the wall, which made the communication between the Town and Citadel. On the 19th they fired from a battery of eleven pieces of cannon at General Fagel's attack, in order to enlarge the breach at the attack of Count Lotum, and into the covered way, on the same side from the Scheld to the Citadel, which would very much facilitate the success of that attack: And, on the 21st, they made themselves masters of the whole counterescarp, at General Fagel's attack, and fired into the covered way on the other side of the Scheld before the attack of Count Lotum, with so much success, that the Besieged were forced to quit that post. The attack of General Schuylenburgh was likewise by this time very forward; for they made such an incessant fire from their batteries, that, on the 22d, the breaches in the horn-work, the ravelin, and the wall of the town, were almost in a condition to be mounted, and, at the same time, the saps were carried to the wall of the ditch. However they continued to fire from all the batteries to enlarge the breaches, inasmuch, that General Schuylenburgh, on the 27th, caused the ravelin and half-moon at his attack to be stormed; and, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance of the enemy, and their great fire, the Allies lodged themselves thereon, and perfected their lodgment, by favour of the continual fire they made from the cannon and mortars. On the 28th, in the morning, the Besieged made a vigorous sally, in order to retake the works they had lost the night before, but met with so warm a reception, that they were forced to retire with considerable loss: And, in the evening, the Besiegers having made the necessary dispositions for a general storm; and, the enemy fearing to be taken sword in hand, they beat a parley, and desired to capitulate for the town. Whereupon hostages were exchanged, and, after some debates, the capitulation was agreed to.

Thus, after twenty-one days of open trenches, the Allies reduced a place, which the French thought impregnable, and that in the sight of a numerous army of the enemy, who made no attempt to relieve it. And the conquest was so much the more advantageous, that the loss of the Allies was less than could have been expected, considering the strength and importance of the place.

The French, according to the capitulation, surrendered one gate the 30th of July. The next day Surville, the French Governor, was entertained at dinner by Prince Eugene; and, in the afternoon, retired into the Citadel, which his garrison of about four thousand men had already entered, and the Earl of Albermarle, who was appointed Governor of Tournay, took possession of the town. The time agreed on for evacuating the place expiring that night, the Allies began to work on the approaches to the Citadel. On the 1st of August, in the evening, the French began the first act of hostility, and fired from the Citadel with cannon and small shot upon Count Lotum's trenches and batteries; from whence they were immediately answered, and the fire continued very hot on both sides the whole night. The same day the dispositions were made for an attack, the new lines of circumvallation about the Citadel almost finished, and orders given for levelling those about the town.

In the mean time, Surville having proposed to the Confederate Generals the appointing two persons to treat about the surrender of the Citadel, Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough nominated de Lalo (a Brigadier in the British troops) on their parts; and Surville named the Marquis de Ravignan (a Brigadier in the French service) who, having conferred, drew up and subscribed articles for settling the time of surrendering the Citadel.

These articles were sent to the French Court for their approbation, and an answer was to be returned in seven days. But upon this occasion the French gave a fresh instance of their insincerity, and manifested to the world, that their proposals for delivering up the Citadel of Tournay was but an artifice to gain time, and amuse the Allies. For the French King would not ratify these articles, but upon condition, that there should be a cessation of arms in general in the Netherlands till the 5th of September, which the Allies would not consent to; and therefore the siege was carried on with all possible vigour, notwithstanding the great disadvantages, which the Confederate troops lay under, by reason of the great number of the enemies' mines. From the 8th of August, the day on which the Marquis de Ravignan returned from the French Court, to the 20th of the same month, the enemy sprung sixteen mines, which cost the Besiegers a great number of men, and very much retarded their approaches. On the 20th the Besieged sprung a mine with so great execution, that part of the wall from the town to the Citadel, two branches of the trenches, a parallel, two saps, and two of the Besiegers' mines were ruined; and a Captain, two En-signs,

1709. signs, and nineteen soldiers killed. The 22d the miners of the Allies discovered the branch of another mine; and as they were busy in finding out the mine itself, they heard the enemy working on a great gallery. Whereupon a Lieutenant and sixteen Grenadiers was ordered to dislodge them; but the Lieutenant being killed at the first onset, his men were disheartened and retired. Immediately after another Officer, with a fresh detachment, was ordered to go upon that service; but, the enemy throwing a great number of grenades, and making a terrible smoke, the besiegers were forced to retire, to prevent being suffocated. The 23d the Miners, supported by a Lieutenant and twelve Grenadiers, were at work to pierce through a traverse cross the gallery they had discovered; but the enemy threw in a great quantity of straw, hemp, and powder, which being set on fire, occasioned such a smoke, that the Officer and eight Grenadiers were stifled. All this while the miners of the Besiegers frequently met with those of the enemy, and engaged them with pistol and bayonet. On the 26th the enemy sprung a mine, which killed above four hundred of the Confederate troops, who, notwithstanding that loss, and the great fire of the Besieged, lodged themselves that night near the palisadoes at General Schuylenburg's attack. On the 29th Monsieur Du Mey, the chief Director of the attacks, was mortally wounded. That day and the next the Besiegers made a fierce fire upon the Citadel, and threw abundance of bombs, which did great execution.

The citadel offers to capitulate. On the 30th, at six in the morning, the enemy beat a parley, desiring to capitulate; and, hostages being exchanged, Monsieur Dolet and the Maquis de Ravignan, both Major-Generals, and four other Officers came out of the Citadel; and Major-General Hondorff, with five Officers more on the Besiegers side, were sent in. Dolet, and his company were brought to the Earl of Albemarle's House, where the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene were met to receive their proposals. They offered to surrender the place, and delivered a project of a capitulation, consisting of eleven articles, the chief whereof were: "That the Chapel should not be made use of for the exercise of any other religion but the Roman Catholic, upon any pretext whatsoever: That they should have twelve pieces of cannon and six mortars, with ammunition for twenty charges, and horses and waggons, and other necessaries for that purpose, to be furnished by the Besiegers: That the garrison should march out, drums beating, and colours flying, with the other usual marks of honour: That they should have four covered waggons; and that the prisoners should be returned on either side, and no deserters stopped."

The articles rejected. Dolet and the other French hostages having made these offers, they were told by the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, that they could not allow of any other conditions, but that the garrison should surrender themselves prisoners of war. Upon this they returned into the Citadel; and, about three o'clock in the afternoon, the hostilities were renewed. The Confederate Generals insisted upon having the garrison made prisoners of war, as well for the honour of the arms of the Allies, as in return for the King's having refused to agree to the former capitulation, which was declared to the French Officers. Besides, during the cessation, the Allies had confirmed accounts, that the enemy owned they were obliged to surrender for want of provisions; which they did in less than three days, upon the following conditions: "That all the officers and soldiers should retain only their swords and baggage, and, leaving their colours and arms behind, were permitted to return to France, upon condition that they should not serve, until they were actually exchanged against the like number of officers and soldiers of the Allies; and those taken at Warneton were immediately to be sent back as part of that exchange." After this conquest, the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene resolved to leave nothing unattempted, that might tend to the improvement of their late successes; and therefore concerted the necessary measures for besieging of Mons. The army, on the 3d of September, passed the Seld, and incamped the next day at Breffeuil, the Hereditary Prince of Hesse-Cassel (who was detached the day before with four thousand foot and sixty squadrons) incamping at some distance. The 5th, the troops continued their march, notwithstanding a violent rain. The Prince of Hesse passed the Haijne in the afternoon, and the grand army incamped at Straut, within a league of that river. The 6th in the morning, the army was again in motion; and, in the march, the Duke of Marlborough received advice, that, the Prince of Hesse having made the dispositions for attacking the French lines from the Haijne to the Sambre, three regiments of dragoons had abandoned the same. The French designed to defend those lines; for the Chevalier de Luxembourg, with a great detachment arrived soon after to sustain the regiments of dragoons, and was followed by Marshal Villars in person. But, seeing that their troops had quitted their post, they marched back to Quievrain, whither the whole French army marched from their lines behind the Scarpe. On the other hand, the Prince of Hesse having taken possession of the other lines already mentioned, incamped with his right at Jenappe, and his left to Tremiers, whereby Mons was in a manner blocked up, and the army under the Duke of Marlborough incamped at Havre, and that under Prince Eugene, at St. Denis.

On the 7th of September, Boufflers arrived in the French camp, and joined Villars. The same day the Duke of Marlborough received advice, about noon, that the French were marching to attack the body under the command of the Prince of Hesse. Whereupon, orders were given to the army to decamp from Havre, and leave their baggage behind, and their tents standing. The army having made a halt on the hills of Belian (where the Prince of Hesse had his quarters) the Generals received farther intelligence, that the French had not passed the desiles of Wafne, but were incamped near Quievrain; whereupon the Confederate army continued in the camp the following night, but in order of battle. The Duke of Marlborough being informed, that the garrison of Mons consisted only of nine weak Spanish, and two Bavarian battalions, besides the dragoons of Pasleur, conjectured, that Villars's chief design was to oblige the Confederates to draw all their forces into the plain between Belian and Tremiers, that he might 1709. might have an opportunity to throw reinforcements into Mons: To prevent which, the Duke sent some troops towards St. Guislain. The 8th, Prince Eugene and the Duke spent the whole day in viewing the ground between the two armies; and, the 9th in the morning, the French made a motion, as if they would march towards Bessu, but, the Duke of Marlborough being advanced with some other Generals to take a narrow view of their army, they soon perceived, that the motion of their left was only a feint to cover the march of their right, which filed off at the same time. The Duke, being unwilling to lose a moment, ordered his army to march by his left; by which motion the two armies came so near, a little after two, that they cannonaded each other till the evening. They continued all the night in the same situation; the French being posted behind the woods of la Merte and Taisniere, near Malplacquet, where they intrenched themselves the 10th. And the Confederate troops lay with their right near Sart and Bléron, and the left on the edge of the wood of Lagniere, the head-quarters being near the center of Blaregnies.

The Duke of Marlborough, Prince Eugene, and the Prince Royal of Prussia passed the night with Monsieur Goslinga, that they might be ready, if the enemy should make any attempt. But though they were much superior in number, and more especially in infantry, yet they were so far from designing to attack the Allies, that on the contrary, they began to fortify their camp (though it was by nature very strong and advantageous) with all the industry and application imaginable. Besides the thick hedges, which, like a chain, ran along their whole camp, they made deep lines to cover their foot; and, on the right, cast up three intrenchments one behind the other, though the access was otherwise very difficult, because of a marshy ground, which lay before them. Their center, which was in a little plain, was likewise secured by several intrenchments, defended in convenient places with good artillery; and, besides all this, they cut down a great number of trees, which they laid across the ways, to obstruct the passage of the Confederate horse. They also cut down the hedges behind their lines, for the more easy march of their cavalry to support their infantry, as occasion might require; so that their camp might not be very improperly called a regular fortified Citadel.

Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, who had, in concert with Monsieur Goslinga, taken the resolution to attack the French, finding, on the 10th, that they had made use of the preceding night to improve the advantage of their situation, resolved only, without altering their design, to put off the execution of it, till they were reinforced by eighteen battalions, which had been employed in the siege of Tournay. To these orders were immediately dispatched, that they should march, with all possible expedition, to join the grand army; which they did that very night, under the command of Count Lottum and Baron Schuylenburgh. The same evening also a detachment from the blockade from Mons, under the command of Lieutenant-General Dedem, took St. Guislain sword in hand, and made the garrison, which consisted of two hundred men, prisoners of war.

The troops, that came from Tournay, having, on the 11th of September, in the morning, 1709. joined the right wing, over-against the wood by Sart, where the enemy's left was posted, Prince Eugene, the Duke of Marlborough, and the Field-deputies, rode together along the line between the two armies, and several men were in their presence killed by the enemy's cannon.

The Confederates had begun to work on their batteries at break of day. They raised one of Blaregnies or M. Blaquet twenty-eight pieces of cannon on the left, another of forty in the center, and the rest of the artillery was distributed on the right. A very thick fog, which lasted till half an hour past seven, had very much facilitated their work; but then it cleared up, and gave the two armies a perfect view of each other.

This being the posture of the French and Confederate forces, a little after eight o'clock, the signal for the attack being given by a discharge of fifty pieces of cannon, and the cannonading continuing very brisk on both sides, Prince Eugene advanced with his right into the wood of Sart, and eighty-six battalions of that wing, commanded by General Schuylenburgh, the Duke of Argyle, and other Generals, and twenty two other battalions, under the command of Count Lottum, attacked the enemy with such bravery, that, notwithstanding the barricades of felled trees, and other impediments they met in their way, after an hour's resistance, they drove the French out of their intrenchments in the woods of Sart and Taisniere. The design of the attack was to drive the enemy out of the wood, and then to attack them in the flank of their intrenchments on the plain; which succeeded, and all the enemy's infantry of the left wing were ruined. General Witbers, with nineteen battalions, attacked the enemy in another intrenchment beyond the woods of Taisniere and Great Lagniere with the like vigour and good success. Thirty-six Dutch battalions, commanded by the Prince of Nassau Friesland (or Orange) and Baron Fagel, who attacked the enemy's right, posted in the wood of La Merte, and in that opening, covered with three intrenchments, met with greater resistance, and lost abundance of men, before they could penetrate into the intrenchments. The fight was here desperate; but the Dutch soon drove the enemy from off their advantageous ground into their intrenchments, taking their colours. They likewise drove them out of their first intrenchment; but, as they were marching on to the second, they were charged with great vivacity by the enemy, and obliged to retire to their former posts. The Duke of Marlborough then ordered Witbers to march with the body under his immediate direction to sustain them; but upon notice, that Witbers was actually engaged with the enemy, and that all things went well on the right, the Duke thought fit rather to press the advantages there, than to hazard a new motion towards the left in the heat of the action. As soon as the enemy's left went to retire and draw off their cannon, the Duke of Marlborough commanded the Earl of Orkney, with fifteen battalions, to attack them, and force them from their intrenchments in the plain between the woods of Sart and Taisniere, with directions, if he succeeded, to post himself there, and cover the horse, as they should file off through the woods into the plain, in order to charge the enemy's cavalry, which were there drawn up.

1709. This was executed with such resolution and success, that, after a short dispute, the enemy quitted those intrenchments, which gave the horse an opportunity to enter them. And though the first squadrons, led by the Prince of Hesse, had great difficulty to form themselves, and were put into some disorder by the French King's household troops; yet being immediately rallied by the Duke of Marlborough, and seconded by the squadrons of Prince Eugene's army, they advanced together into the plain. Being there covered by their own foot, and having formed themselves into very good order, they charged the enemy's cavalry, who being soon broke and defeated, their whole army fell into disorder, and retired towards the plains of Bavay, leaving some of their cannon behind them. The Allies made a good use of the beginning of the victory, and all the troops moved on with fresh resolution. General Vink having, with the horse, surrounded several battalions of the enemy's right, summoned them to surrender themselves prisoners of war; but the French, being covered by a morass, made their retreat along the edge of a wood: Three regiments of Danish cavalry, falling at the same time on the enemy, made a terrible slaughter among them, till, having gained a second wood, they found means to escape. Eighteen squadrons, being detached to endeavour to disperse them in their retreat towards Quievrain, met their whole left wing on this side the little river Quaisna, consisting of about an hundred squadrons, commanded by Boufflers in person; and perceiving only at first the enemy's rear, posted at the corner of a wood, the dragoons made up to them, and drove them without resistance; but Colonel Lippe, and a Cornet, advancing too far, were taken, without being perceived by their own men. The wood being forced, the eighteen squadrons advanced into the plain; but, perceiving before them the enemy's whole left wing in three columns, one of which retreated in good order, the other two in some confusion, they made a short halt, and were somewhat surprized to see the enemy face about, and draw up in order of battle. However, this small body of the Confederate horse kept their ground, and posted themselves upon an eminence, with the wood of Elonge on their right, expecting to be attacked; but they immediately perceived, that the enemy made a stand, with no other design than to pass a rivulet, that was in their way to a defile, leading them to Bavay, which they gained, before the Allies, who pursued them full gallop, could come up with them. However, the Allies followed the chase as far as the village of Quievrain, where the French had a brigade of foot, who obliged them to slacken their pace. Upon which they thought fit to give over the pursuit, and the enemy marched unmolested to Bavay. The rest of their broken army retired in great confusion, some to Maubeuge and Valenciennes, and others to Condé, leaving the Allies in possession of the field of battle, sixteen of their cannon, twenty colours, twenty-six standards, and other indisputable marks of a victory; not to mention a great number of prisoners. Some of these were taken in the action, others in the pursuit, and the far greater number the next morning in Bavay, and other neighbouring places, either weariness or wounds not permitting them to follow the grofs of their army; which, having that night passed the rivulet of Renelle, incamped with their right at Quefroy, extending their left towards Valenciennes.

The Confederate Generals, upon viewing, after the battle, the advantageous posts, from whence they had driven the enemy, were themselves astonished to see what difficulties they had surmounted. And, indeed, all the troops, as well officers as soldiers, shewed as great resolution, bravery, and firmness in this obstinate action, as ever was known. The enemy, whether encouraged by their intrenchments, or animated by the flame of their former defeats, fought with a bravery beyond what was expected from them, from half an hour past eight in the morning, till half an hour past two in the afternoon. They were, however, at length, forced to yield to the superior courage of the Allies, whose Generals, the Duke of Marlborough, Prince Eugene, Count Tilly, and the Prince of Nassau, were, during the whole fight, continually at the head of their troops in the hottest of the fire. And Monsieur Gollinga, one of the Field-deputies of the States, was not wanting to animate the soldiers by his example. Great numbers fell in this bloody action; and the Allies owned, that they had above eighteen thousand killed or wounded (1). Amongst the slain were several Officers of distinction, particularly General Count Lottum, General Tettau, of the Prussians; Count Oxenstiern, Lieutenant-General; the Lord Tullibardine, eldest son of the Duke of Arbol, and Colonel of a regiment of foot in the service of the States. Among the wounded were Prince Eugene of Savoy slightly on the head, as was also Brigadier May on the same place; Lieutenant-Generals Spar, Wakerbaert, and Hamilton, and the first mortally; Brigadier Cronstrom, Count Oxenstiern's Adjutant, dangerously; and Monsieur Duyts, Adjutant to the Prince of Orange. His Highness himself had two horses killed under him, but escaped unhurt; hurt; as did also the Duke of Argyle, though he received several musket-shots through his clothes and periwig. Brigadier Lala, a French Refugee, in great favour and esteem with the Generals; Sir Thomas Pendergast, Colonel of a regiment of foot; Colonel Rivett, of the guards; Colonel Granjone, Lieutenant-Colonel Arundel, and Lieutenant-Colonel Betbel, were also reckoned among the slain; Lieutenant General Webb, in the beginning of the action, received a very dangerous wound by a musket-ball, that lodged itself near the groin; Lieutenant-Colonel Ramsey, Major Laffley, and Major Row died of their wounds; but Lieutenant-Colonel Farmer, Major Chivers, and several others of inferior rank, survived theirs.

The French were very industrious in lessening and concealing their loss from the public. But some private accounts from their army owned, that they had about five hundred and forty Officers killed on the spot, and one thousand and sixty-eight wounded, besides three hundred and one taken prisoners; and the number of their private men killed, wounded, or taken, was modestly computed at fifteen thousand (1).

This was the most desperate and bloody attack, that had been fought in the memory of man; and both our Generals were very much blamed for throwing away so many brave men's lives, when there was no occasion. It was the only rash thing the Duke of Marlborough was ever guilty of, who, it was generally believed, was pressed to it by Prince Eugene (2).

The action being over, the Confederate army was ordered to incamp a little beyond the field of battle; and, on the 12th of September, they returned

(1) Among their slain were Messieurs de Courfillon, de Crenneville, Pons de la Riviere, de Gruborget, de Moret, and Sheldon, Lieutenant-Generals; Count de Beuil, Messieurs de Rouleau, de Rochbonne, and de Tournesart, Major-Generals; Count d'Agennes, Messieurs de Courjan and de St. Aubert, Brigadiers; the Duke de St. Agnan, and Messieurs de Schaufstein, de Sals, de Seignelay, the Chevalier de Gray, de Teleconde, de Molezum, Fitzgerald, de Barentin, St. Laurent, and the Duke of Chareff. Amongst the wounded was the Marshal de Villars himself, who, in the heat of the battle receiving a shot in the knee, was obliged to leave the command of the French army to Marshal de Boufflers; the Duke of Guiche, the Chevalier de St. Toris; Messieurs de Goguel, de la Fosse, de St. Gues, de Crunfuit, de Mansieux, de Opides, de Refuge, d'Allergetti, the Princes de Lambesse and de Montbasen, Messieurs de Brillac, de Tournemine, de Renty, de Berville, d'Astel, and de St. Eulaine.

(2) Bishop Burnet observes, That military men have always talked of this, as the sharpest action in the whole war, not without reflecting on the Generals for beginning to desperate an attempt. The French thought it a sort of victory, that they had animated their men to fight so well behind the intrenchments, and to repulse our men so often, and with so great loss. They retired to Valenciennes, and secured themselves by casting up strong lines, while they left our army to carry on the siege of Mons, without giving them the least disturbance. Monsieur Rouffet's remarks are as follow: 'In the opinion of the whole world (says he) our Generals were guilty of an irreparable fault in not attacking on the 9th, but delaying it, in expectation of six and twenty battalions, and some squadrons; while, by giving the enemy time to intrench themselves (which was what we had infallibly to expect from a General so accustomed to it as the Marshal de Villars) we weakened ourselves, in proportion as the enemy grew more formidable. Besides, we thereby gave him all the time he could wish to penetrate into our disposition, to recall several detachments, which did not join him till the 10th, and in short to render all those places impenetrable, through which only our troops could break into the plains. In the Council of war, which was held the 9th, the Deputies of the States-General were of opinion, that the siege of Mons should be immediately undertaken, without giving the enemy battle; but that, if they should come to attack us, in that case, we should retreat from them; and of this opinion were most of the Generals. Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough were of opinion to attack the enemy, before they began the siege, and they brought over the Deputies to be of the same mind; but then, as well they, as the Duke of Marlborough, insisted, that the attack ought to be made immediately, not to give the Marshal de Villars time to fortify his camp. Prince Eugene was not, however, to be dissuaded from the resolution he had taken, to wait for the detachment from

Tournay. A fatal delay, which occasioned the ruin of the whole body of the Dutch infantry, which alone lost ten thousand men, more than seven hundred of whom were Officers, at the attack of the intrenchments.'

Monsieur Du Mont likewise says, 'That it was a misfortune to the Allies, that they did not fight on the 9th, for then probably the victory would have been more complete, and have been obtained with less loss of blood. The enemy was then on the other side of the wood in the plain; there was room to come at them through the intervals. They had not time to intrench themselves; and the advantage of the ground would have been pretty near equal.'

Father Daniel asserts, that the field of battle cost the Allies thirty thousand men killed or wounded, while the loss, which the French army suffered, was not two thirds of that number.

Dr. Hare, in his second letter to a Tory Member upon the management of the war, p. 24, observes, That in this battle the enemy were so defeated, that they, who had hazarded a battle to prevent the siege of Mons, did not dare to venture any thing for the relief of it, towards which they did not make the least step, though the Allies had neither river nor intrenchment to cover them. He afterwards, p. 32, takes notice of a question asked by the Author of a piece, intitled, Arilus and Odisphus viz. If the bloody battle of Taniers or Malplaquet was so well concerted, as it might have been; and if there was an absolute necessity to wait two days without light of the enemy for a few troops, that never engaged when they came, and give them so much time to throw up such unequal fortresses before we attacked them? In answer to which Dr. Hare writes: 'I little thought to have seen the battle of Taniers instanced for a counter-step designed to hinder the effect of our former successes, when it was itself so great a one: But it shews the absurdity of their cause, when victory itself is made a crime; and they attempt to prove a General's design to prolong the war, because he has endeavoured to force the enemy to put an end to it by a new defeat. This is a strange way of arguing indeed, peculiar to the cause, and its worthy Defenders. It is a known saying, Victoria rati non reditur: But, it seems, it now must not be allowed. A General has been often called to give an account, how he came to lose a battle; but to be accountable for winning one is something new; and, if victories had not been so common, we should hardly have been so difficult; we should have understood the value of a single victory, and been thankful for it. But the number, it seems, has made us so nice, that we had rather not have them, if they are not just to our minds; if they are not of as much consequence as Blenheim, or as cheap as Romilies or Quadrant. I would be glad to know, if ever any one French Writer treated the battle of London with that contempt; that these Gentlemen do that of Taniers; or thought the fighting it a crime in a General, because it was dear bought, and had little other consequence than the returned to their old camp at Belian. The same day, the Allies were employed in burying their dead; and, there having been a great number of French officers and soldiers left wounded in the field of battle, and in the adjacent villages, the Duke of Marlborough signified to the Marshals Boufflers and Villars, that those persons might have leave to retire upon their parole, to return when they were cured; and that he would send Lieutenant Cadogan with two hundred horse to Bavay, to make an agreement about that matter, with any General they would send with the like number of men. The enemy accepted this proposal, and they ordered the Chevalier de Luxemburg to meet General

Cadogan at Bavay, in order to concert every thing for the relief of the wounded, and burying of the dead.

The French, being retired to Valenciennes, left the Confederate Generals at liberty to besiege Mons (1), the capital of Hainault, and the place, for the preservation of which the enemy had hazarded the late battle. In this City the Elector of Bavaria had lately kept his fugitive Court, and from thence the Count Bergbieck and the Duke of Alva by order of King Philip their Master, wrote a joint letter to the Duke of Marlborough, to which the Count added a note, importing, "That, if the Queen of Great-Britain, by means of his Highness's good offices, should think gaining what Arlus calls unprofitable honour. On the contrary, never victory was so much magnified, the tongues and pens of that Nation were for many years full of nothing else; and yet those, who were at that battle, will tell you, that the French did not only lose as many men as the Confederates, but double or treble their number; and the Allies recovered that defeat so soon, that in six weeks time they had a better army than before the battle; and all the use the French made of their victory was to take Charleroy, though the battle was fought in June; a conquest one may easily suppose they might have made without the purchase of so dear a victory, as they made those of Mons and Namur, places of much more importance. Now let us see, whether the victory of Taniers be on any account inferior to that of Landen. That it exceeded it in honour, Arlus himself allows; for he grants, That in all the wars of immemorial time, there never was a battle fought, where mortal men gained such immortal honour. And, whether he will allow it or not, it is as certain, that it was more valuable also in its consequence, and the advantage the common cause reaped from it; for Mons was evidently a greater conquest in itself, and of more use to us, when Brabant had no other cover, than Charleroy could be to them. Besides Charleroy might have been had without Landen; but Mons could not have been had without Taniers; and, though that battle was not fought till the last of August, Mons had not been the only fruits of it, if the weather would have permitted the Allies to keep the field longer; and the success of the siege was a plain discovery, that the loss of the enemy was not only as great as that of the Allies, but much greater. Why else should they venture a battle to prevent the siege; and yet did not move a step to disturb it, when it was formed? Is not this a confession, that they, who thought themselves a match for our army before the battle, did not think so after it, though so many troops were employed and weakened in the siege? Did they not spend the time the Allies were making the siege, in throwing up lines, and drawing all the troops together, that possibly they could? And was not the Duke of Berwick sent for post from Dauphiné, to join with Marshal Boufflers in the command of them? What, I would fain know, was all this for? Why such strong lines, so vast an army, so many Generals, so much concern, in the middle of October, when the ways were impassable, and the Confederate army was intirely ruined by their victory? If their loss was so unequal, as Arlus thinks it was, the French might have done what they would; they might not only have lain still in great tranquillity, without any apprehension of being disturbed by the Allies, but might have advanced to them, given them battle, and not only saved Mons, but ruined their army, if they were so much superior to them, as their Writers would make the world believe. But, if we will allow the French to be better judges of these matters than our paper-politicians, the difference, that was made by the battle between the two armies, was to their disadvantage intirely; and the impression, which the loss of that battle gave them, made them think themselves never safe; as if neither weather, nor intrenchments, nor numbers, could effectually stop the progress of this victorious army; though weakened by three sieges, and a battle equal to three more. They shewed plainly by all their motions; they thought nothing impossible to such an army, that could beat an hundred thousand men; the best troops of France, through such intrenchments, or, in the language of the learned Arlus, through such unequal fortresses. Dr. Hare, afterwards, p. 36, observes, "That without this battle, the rest of that campaign must have been spent without action, and perhaps this last [of 1710] also. For we could not have carried our arms into the Ardens, while Brabant was so much exposed, as it was before the taking of Mons, which would consequently have thrust the work of this year one campaign at least backward. But, if the necessity, the glory, and advantage of this victory cannot keep off these examiners, you may be well assured it will bear examination. I have heard a good deal of it, and, by all I can find, there never was a battle, for which there was a more unanimous concurrence of all parties, than there was here. And the delay that happened, was not only to wait for a few troops, but for bread, which men, who had been continually marching for seven days together, were not very fit to fight without. Besides, the troops they stayed for were not a few; and there was a great number of Officers with them. And it is most ridiculous to fancy troops were not worth staying for, because they did not engage. At that rate all Corps de Reserve are very foolish and unnecessary things. Might there not have been occasion for troops, because there was not? Or is it no encouragement to men, that do engage, to know there are others ready to sustain them upon occasion? But it is endless to argue with the real or affected ignorance of these men. It is no great compliment to our Generals to suppose they understand their business; and we ought always to presume they concert their matters well, unless we are sure of the contrary; which we may easily believe, neither these Writers, nor their Masters, are in the case before us, since they were neither at the consultations of the Generals themselves, nor pretend to any correspondence with those that were. And therefore to insinuate, that they did not consider things so maturely as they should have done, is extreme impudence. Those unequal fortresses indeed, which the enemy had thrown up, were, I have heard, more and greater than they were thought to be. Our Generals knew they were intrenching, but neither believed so much work could have been done in so little time, nor that the fears of the enemy could make them think so much was necessary. But this served only to make the victory more glorious. And, notwithstanding all their fortresses, had the orders, which to prevent all mistakes, were given in writing, been rightly executed, the price of it had been much cheaper than it was. But there is no need of entering farther into the particulars of this battle, to shew the folly and malice of this most profligate Libeller, and the rest of his Companions."

(1) Mons, a very large, fine, strong, and rich City, of the Low-Countries, the Marquisate of the Earldom of 1709. "it for the interest of the Nation to have regard to it, he was provided with powers from the King his Master, to explain himself more particularly, to such person, and in such a place, as his Highness would please to appoint." The Duke of Marlborough did not think fit to have, at that time, any private Conference with that Minister; but, as the latter happened to be in Mons, when the Allies invested the town, he was, on the 21st of September, allowed to have an interview with his Grace, who granted him passports for himself, and several Ladies and Persons of distinction, who went out of the place. As soon as the train of artillery was brought from Brussels, the siege, under the command of the Prince of Orange, was carried on with great vigour, tho' the season was both cold and rainy. The outworks were carried with little resistance, and Mons capitulated about the end of October. With the taking of Mons ended the campaign, both armies retiring into winter-quarters.

Campaign
on the Rhine inconsiderable.

The Confederate arms were not this year attended with the same success every where as in Flanders. Little was expected on the Rhine. The Germans were so weak, so ill furnished, and so ill paid, that it was not easy for the Court of Vienna to prevail on the Elector of Brunswick to undertake the command of the army there, yet he came at last; and, upon his coming, the French, who had passed the Rhine, thought it the safest for them to repass that river, and keep within their lines. The Elector sent Count Merci with a considerable body of troops to pass the Rhine, and break into Franch Comte; but, a detached body of the French, under the command of Count de Borgh, lying in their way, there followed a very sharp engagement on the 26th of August, N. S. Two thousand men were reckoned to be killed on each side; but, though the loss of men was thought equal, yet the design miscarried, and the Germans were obliged to repass the Rhine, and retire to Friburg. The Germans having passed through the territories of Basil, in order to make their intended irruption into the territories of France, the French Ambassador in Switzerland expostulated with the diet of the Cantons assembled at Baden, about the violation of their neutrality, and even threatened those of Basil with the effects of his Master's resentments. But the Helvetic body took such effectual measures for the security of that Canton and of their frontiers, that the French did not think this a proper juncture to increase the number of their enemies, and so contented themselves with seizing upon the corn and revenues belonging to those of Basil and Alsatia.

Campaign
in Piedmont and Dauphiné.

The campaign in Piedmont and Dauphiné fell also this year much short of expectation. The Duke of Savoy refusing to go into the field, by reason the Imperial Court started some difficulties about Vigeovano and other dependencies of the Milanese, which, by agreement, were made over to him. The Court of Vienna insisted to have the controversy adjudged by Commissioners; but this was opposed by the Duke of Savoy, who pretended, there was no need of such a dilatory negotiation, to find out the literal sense of the treaty concluded with him by the Emperor; and made pressing instances with the Queen of Great-Britain and the States-General, who stood Guarantees of that treaty for the punctual performance of it. The maritime powers, considering with what firmness the Duke had adhered to the Grand Alliance, espoused his interest with warmth. But the Emperor insisting on a reference to Commissioners, the Duke persisted in his resolution not to go into the field, and left the command of the army to Veldt-Marshal Thaun, who, on the 7th of August, went from Turin to Susa, and made the necessary dispositions to march over Mount Cenis. On the other hand, the Duke of Berwick, who commanded the French army in Dauphiné, had, by this time, caused strong intrenchments to be cast up to cover Briançon, the place most threatened by the Confederates, and to defend some other important posts. So all that Count Thaun was able to do, was only to oblige the French to abandon their lines at St. Maurice, drive them from those at Fessons, defeat a small body at Conflans, and make himself master of the inconsiderable town and castle of Annci; after which, for want of provisions, he was forced to repass the Alps, and march into Piedmont towards the end of September. The glory which the Duke of Berwick gained in thus disappointing the designs of the Allies, was the greater, as part of his troops were at that very time employed in suppressing, in the Vivarez, an insurrection of the Camisars, and other malecontents, who on the 19th of August, N. S. maintained a sharp encounter with the French King's troops. But, on the 23d of the same month, they were entirely defeated within some leagues of Vernoux, and about fifty of them taken prisoners, with their chief leader Abraham, who was broke alive upon the wheel; and twenty-three others hanged at several places, six or seven sent to the galleys, and the rest committed to prison.

The most important thing relating to Italy this year, was, that the Pope delayed acknowledging King Charles, by several pretended difficulties; his design being to stay and see the issue of the campaign; but when he was threatened towards the end of it, that, if it was not done, the Imperial army should come and take up their winter-quarters in the Ecclesiastical State, he submitted, and acknowledged him. He sent also his nephew Albano, first to Vienna, and then to Poland; he furnished him with a magnificent retinue, and seemed to hope, that, by the services he should do to the Papal interests there, he should be pressed to make him a Cardinal, notwithstanding the bull against Nepotism.

Caya.
Hist. of Eur.

The Spanish and Portuguese armies having taken the field towards the end of April, they soon came to an engagement; for, on the 7th of May, N. S. being both incamped on the Caya, and the Spaniards making a motion, with a design either to forage the adjacent country, or to insult the Confederates; the Portuguese General, contrary to the Earl of Galway's opinion, passed the river with all their horse, most of the foot, and some field-pieces, which they fired with good execution on the enemy. The Marshall de Bay, who commanded the Spaniards, charged the Portuguese horse of the right wing, who immediately wheeled about, and fled, without firing a shot, which gave the Spaniards an opportunity of seizing the Portuguese cannon. In order to recover these, and to favour the retreat of the body of foot, which had repulsed the enemy three times with great firmness and resolution, the Earl of Galway brought up himself Pearce's brigade, consisting of two British battalions of Barrymore and Starvoix, and one of the Spaniards lately raised. But these troops not being sustained by the Portuguese horse of the left, who fled like those of the right, they were intercepted, and obliged to surrender prisoners of war, and with them Major-General Sankey, the Earl of Barrymore, Brigadier Pearce, and the Comde de San Juan, a Portuguese General. The rest of the British foot, under the command of the Marquis de Montandre, performed wonders, and, with the Portuguese infantry, made an orderly retreat, with the loss of about an hundred and fifty men; so that, except the prisoners, and other marks of honour, the Spaniards had no reason to boast of their victory. The Earl of Galway, who had a horse shot under him, very narrowly escaped being taken; but having found means to get away from the enemy with Major Bladen his Secretary, and a few other Officers, he rid about four or five miles, and at last reached the Confederate army, which that night came to Aronches; and the next day incamped at Elevas. The Marquis de Bay, having refreshed his troops, advanced towards the Confederates; but the Earl of Galway took such advantageous posts along the Guadiana, that the Spaniards durst not attempt, either to pass that river, or besiege Olivrenza, into which place the British General found means to introduce supplies of provisions; and, the heats coming on, both armies went into quarters of refreshment; nor did any thing worth notice happen on that side in the autumn campaign. For the Spaniards apprehending, that our fleet might have a design upon some part of their Southern coast, were forced to draw their troops from the frontiers of Portugal to defend their own coast, though they had no disturbance given them on that side.

taken.

The castle of Alicant had now been blocked up ever since the month of December 1708. The garrison, consisting only of Holbam's and Syburg's regiments (which were not above half compleat, when left there two years before) held out with great resolution all the winter, notwithstanding the severity of the weather, the scarcity of provisions, and the disturbance they met with from the enemy's bombs. The Spaniards, finding all other means ineffectual to reduce that important fortress, resolved at last to blow up the rock, on which the castle stands, by a great mine; the several chambers whereof being prepared, with incredible labour and industry, the Chevalier d'Asfeldt caused fifteen hundred barrels of powder to be lodged in them, summoned Colonel Syburg the Governor to surrender; and, the better to determine him to it, gave him leave to send out two of his Officers to see the condition of the mine. This was readily accepted. Asfeldt went himself with the Officers to the mine, and told them he could not bear to let so many brave men perish under the ruins of a place they had so gallantly defended and gave them twenty-four hours to consider of it. But the Governor being immovable in his resolution, the mine was ordered the next day to be fired, which the centinels, posted on the side of the hill to give notice of it, perceiving, they made the appointed signal. Upon which the Governor, with several Officers, walked to the parade, and ordered the guard to retire; which was no sooner done, but the mine was blown up, and with little or no noise made an opening in the rock on the very parade, of some yards in length, and about three feet wide, into which the Governor, Lieutenant-Colonel Thornicroft, Major Vignales, and other Officers fell, and the opening instantly closing upon them, they all perished, though their bodies were not entirely sunk in. Notwithstanding this accident, Lieutenant-Colonel d'Albon of Syburg's regiment, being the surviving Commander, resolved to hold out as long as he had any provisions; and, to make these last the longer, he reduced his men to half allowance. By this time King Charles being informed, that the garrison was reduced to great extremities, a Council of war was held at Barcelona, to consider of the most proper means to relieve that place, the result whereof was, that Lieutenant-General Stanbope should embark for Port-Mabon, to confer with Sir George Byng on that subject. The General, being returned the 12th of March, N. S. to Barcelona, embarked again, on the 18th, on board Sir Edward Whitaker, who was arrived there with three thousand five hundred men from Naples. These troops were ordered upon this expedition; and then, sailing for Port-Mabon, they took there on board four hundred men more; and, on the 11th of April, sailed for Alicant. But, a strong easterly wind forcing them to anchor in the bay of Denia, the enemy suspected their design, and made the necessary preparations to prevent its execution. On the 15th the fleet arrived in sight of Alicant; but the weather continuing so tempestuous, that the ships could not come near the shore; and besides, Don Pedro de Ronquillo had by that time assembled seven thousand men, cast up intrenchments, and erected batteries, to oppose the landing of the Confederate troops. However, some men of war were ordered to get as near the shore as possible, and fire upon the enemy's intrenchments, which they did with some execution, but were much annoyed by the enemy's batteries. The General and Admirals, seeing the impossibility of relieving the castle, resolved, in a Council of war, to endeavour to save so brave a garrison from being made prisoners of war; and accordingly General Stanbope sent a boat on shore with a flag of truce, and an Officer, with a letter for Don Pedro de Ronquillo, offering to surrender the castle of Alicant upon honourable terms. This proposal being accepted, several 1709. articles were demanded, and most of them granted. Pursuant to the capitulation, the garrison marched out, on the 18th of April, with two pieces of cannon, and all other marks of honour, embarked on board the fleet, and were landed in Minorca to refresh themselves.

No. 61. Vol. IV.

General Stanhope having laid a design to surprize Cadiz, either by means of a secret correspondence he had in the place, or merely upon the encouragement of the weakness of the garrison, concerted measures for that purpose with Sir George Byng, on board whose Squadron he embarked at Port-Mabon with two regiments of foot; and, about the middle of August, sailed for Gibraltar. Here he expected to be joined by the forces, which, about the same time, embarked at Portsmouth on board a Squadron, commanded by Rear-Admiral Baker, consisting of one battalion of Scots Guards, the regiments of foot of the Lord Tyrasley, Brigadier Whetbam, Colonel Gore, Colonel Boles, Colonel Capel, Colonel Munden, Colonel Dormer, and the Earl of Rechford's dragoons. But this Squadron being long detained on the coast of England by contrary winds, so that they did not make the coast of Portugal till the beginning of October, the Spaniards, in the mean time, being apprehensive of General Stanhope's design, made detachments from Estremaçura for the security of the coast of Andalusia; and the season being too far advanced to undertake any thing on that side, that General returned to Port-Mabon, thence to Barcelona, and not long after sailed for Italy, from whence he came over to England by the way of Germany and Holland. On the other hand, Rear-Admiral Baker having, on the 10th of October, sent a man of war to Lisbon for orders, Lord Galway gave him directions to sail directly for Barcelona with the forces he had on board. The Court of Portugal (who expected that these troops would have staid in that Kingdom) having expostulated with Lord Galway about their being sent to Catalonia, he took that opportunity to complain of the ill provision that was made for the subsistence and accommodation of the British regiments in Portugal; and said, that nevertheless, her Britannic Majesty would take care to recruit these forces, and, if the Court of Portugal would be as diligent in raising the men for six regiments of dragoons in the pay of Great-Britain (which levies were at last resolved upon) the Portuguese army would then be in a condition to act offensively. He added, that the forces on board Rear-Admiral Baker would be of far greater service in Catalonia, even with respect to Portugal itself, by giving a strong diversion to the enemy; which argument had certainly great weight in it; for the Portuguese were sensible, that General Stanhope's bare coming to Gibraltar with two regiments, had occasioned the weakening of the Spanish forces in Estremaçura, and disabled them from undertaking any thing on that side, in the autumn campaign.

The rejoicings made at the Court of Madrid, upon the easy and inconsiderable victory gained by the Marquis de Bay in Estremaçura, and on the birth of a second son to King Philip, were soon damped, both by the death of that young Prince, and their misfortunes on the frontiers of Catalonia. For General Staremburg, after he received the reinforcements from Italy, having passed the Sagra without opposition, made himself master of Balaguer, and took nine hundred men prisoners; the Marshal de Bezons having refused to second the Condé d'Aguilar, who was for attacking the Allies. Upon notice of these transactions, King Philip thought it necessary to leave Madrid, and go to the army. When he came there, Bezons justified himself, by producing the French King's orders for avoiding all engagements. King Philip seemed much mortified at this, and not thinking it advisable to attempt the attacking of Staremburg, in his advantageous post near Balaguer, returned to Madrid, where Cardinal Portocarrero died some days before, to the great Regret of that Prince, and his Partizans. Not long after, Staremburg, having put a strong garrison into Balaguer, repassed the Sagra, and so both armies went into winter-quarters.

This summer brought a catastrophe on the The King affairs of the King of Sweden. He resolved to invade Muscovy, and engaged himself so far in the Ukraine, that there was no possibility of his retreating, or of having reinforcements brought to him. He engaged a great body of Cossacks to join him, who were easily drawn to revolt from the Czar. He met with great misfortunes in the end of the former year; but nothing could divert him from his designs against Muscovy. He passed the Nieper, and besieged Pultoway. The Czar marched to raise the siege, with an army much superior to the Swedes; but the King of Sweden resolved to venture on a battle, in which he received such a total defeat, that he lost his camp, his artillery, and baggage. A great part of his army got off, but being closely pursued by the Muscovites, and having neither bread nor ammunition, they were all made prisoners of war. The King himself, with a small number about him, passed the Nieper, and got into the Turkish Dominions, and settled at Bender, a town in Moldavia. Upon this great reverse of his affairs, King Augustus pretended, that the resignation of the Crown of Poland was extorted from him by force, and that it was not in his power to resign the Crown, by which he was tied to the Republic of Poland, without their consent. He marched therefore into Poland, and Stanislaus was not able to make any resistance, but continued under the protection of the Swedes, waiting for another reverse of fortune. A project was formed to engage the Kings of Denmark and Prussia, with King Augustus and the Czar, to attack the Swedes in so many different places, that the extravagant humour of their King was like now to draw a heavy storm upon them, if England and the States-General, with the Court of Vienna, had not crushed all this, and entered into a guaranty, for preserving the peace of the Empire, and by consequence of the Swedish Dominions in Germany.

Dantzick was at this time severely visited with a plague, which swept away almost one half of their inhabitants, though few of the better sort died of the infection. This put their neighbours under great apprehensions, who feared the spreading of the contagion; but it went no further (1). The

Denmark.

The King of Denmark spent a great part of this summer in a very expensive course of travelling through the Courts of Germany and Italy; and it was believed, that he intended to go to Rome, where great preparations were making for giving him a splendid reception; for it was given out, that he intended to change his Religion. But whether these reports were altogether groundless, or whether, being so commonly believed, was like to produce some disorders in his own Kingdom, is not certainly known; but thus much is certain, that he stopped at Florence, and went no farther, but returned home, and, upon the King of Sweden's misfortunes, entered into measures to attack Sweden with King Augustus, who had called a diet in Poland, in which he was acknowledged their King, and all things were settled there according to his wishes. The King of Denmark, upon his return home, sent an army over the Sound to Schonen, about the middle of November, having first published a manifesto, wherein he set forth his reasons for declaring war against Sweden. Finding no resistance at his landing at Helsingburg, he fixed there his head-quarters; but, the cold season not permitting him to undertake the siege of Landercroon, he disposed his troops into winter-quarters, and, on the 4th of December, N. S. returned to Copenhagen. Some time after, the Danes having taken the field, made some progress in Schonen; but the Regency of Stockholm having, by this time, sent a good body of troops into that province, the Swedes obliged the enemy to retire under the cannon of Helsingburg; where, on the 10th of March, N. S. 1709-10, they attacked them with so much bravery and fierceness, that the Danes were almost totally defeated; and, not being able to maintain themselves at Helsingburg, abandoned that City on the night, between the 15th and 16th of that month, went on board their ships, and sailed for Elsinore, leaving behind them their horses, and some provision and baggage, which they had not either time or conveniences to carry off.

The Swedish army, that was in Poland, having got into Pomerania, the French studied to engage them to fall into Saxony, to imbroil the affairs of Germany, and, by that means oblige the neighbouring Princes to recall the troops, that were in her Britannic Majesty's service, and that of the other Allies in Flanders. But the Queen and the States-General interposed effectually in this matter; and the Swedes were so sensible, how much they might need their protection, that they acquiesced in the propositions that were made to them; by which means the peace of the northern parts of the Empire was secured. A peace was likewise made up between the Grand Signior and the Czar. The King of Sweden continued at Bender. The war in Hungary still went on. The Court of Vienna published ample relations of the great successes they had there; but these were said to be given out, to make the malecontents seem an inconsiderable and ruined party. There were secret negotiations still on foot, but without effect.

Nothing of importance passed at sea. The French sent out no fleet; and our convoys were so well ordered, and so successful, that the Merchants made no complaints. Towards the end of the year, the Earl of Pembroke, finding the care of the fleet a load too heavy for him to bear, desired to lay it down. It was offered to the Earl of Orford; but though he was willing to serve at the head of a Commission, he refused to accept of it singly; so it was put in Commission, in which he was the first, the other Commissioners being Sir John Leake, Sir George Byng, Mr. George Dodington, and Mr. Paul Methuen. The Queen gave the Earl of Pembroke a pension of three thousand Pounds a year, payable out of the revenue of the Post-Office, in consideration of his eminent services (1). As lived above thirty years in that Court, and is now Bishop of Bristol, for a particular character of that King. I shall set it down in his own words:

He is now in the twenty-eighth year of his age, tall and slender, stoops a little, and in his walking discovers, tho' in no great degree, the effect of breaking his thigh-bone about eight years ago: He is of a very vigorous and healthy constitution, takes a pleasure in enduring the greatest fatigues, and is little curious about his repose: His chief and almost only exercise has been riding, in which he has been extremely excessive. He usually eats with a good appetite, especially in the morning, which is the best of his three meals: He never drinks any thing but small beer, and is not much concerned whether it be good or bad: He speaks little, is very thoughtful, and is observed to mind nothing so much as his own affairs, laying his designs, and contriving the ways of acting, without communicating them to any, till they are to be put in execution: He holds few or no Councils of war; and though in civil affairs his Ministers have leave to explain their thoughts, and are heard very patiently; yet he relies more on his own judgment than on theirs, and frequently falls on such methods, as are farthest from their thoughts: So that both his Ministers and Generals have had hitherto the glory of obedience, without either the praise or blame of having advised prudently or otherwise. The reason of his reservedness in consulting others may be thus accounted for; he came, at the age of fifteen, to succeed in an absolute Monarchy, and, by the forward zeal of the States of the Kingdom, was in a few months declared to be of age: There were those about him, that magnified his understanding as much as his authority, and insinuated, that he neither needed advice, nor could submit his affairs to the deliberation of others, without some diminution of his own supreme power. These impressions had not all their effect, till after the war was begun, in course of which he surmounted so many impossibilities (as those about him thought them) that he came to have less value for their judgments, and more for his own, and at last to think nothing impossible. So it may be truly said, that, under God, as well as all his glorious successes, as the late fatal reverse of them, have been owing solely to his own conduct. As to his piety, it cannot be said, but that the outward appearances have highly recommended it, only it is not very easy to account for the excess of his revenge against King Augustus, and some other instances; but he is not suspected of any bodily indulgences. It is most certain, he has along wished well to the Allies, and not at all to France, which he never intended to serve by any steps he has made. We hear the Turks use him well, but time must shew what use they will make of him, and how he will get back into his own Kingdom. If this misfortune does not quite ruin him, it may temper his fire, and then he may become one of the greatest Princes of the age.

overtures of peace.
Harc.
Burnet.

As soon as the campaign in the Netherlands was ended, the French Court thought fit to make new advances towards a negotiation of peace. In order to which, Signior Foscarini, the Venetian Ambassador, who, about this time, came to Holland, took a turn incognito to Amsterdam, to found the Burgomasters of that City. On the other hand, Monsieur Petkum, Resident of the Duke of Holslein, at the Hague, who had been secretly employed the last winter in the negotiations there, kept up a correspondence by letters with Monsieur de Torcy, to try, if an expedient could be found out for the 37th article in the preliminaries, the difficulty in that article being the only point, for which the Conferences, in appearance at least, were broke off. The point they offered to satisfy the Allies in, was, that the French King should not directly nor indirectly assist his Grandson King Philip; and, with regard to the expedient proposed to secure this point, all went upon the same foot with that which Petkum had proposed, as from himself, the day before Rouillé left the Hague. That three towns should be put into the hands of the Allies, to be restored to France, when the affairs of Spain, &c. should be decided. The meaning of which seemed to be no other, than that France was willing to lose three more towns, in case King Philip should keep Spain and the West-Indies. The places therefore ought to have borne some equality to that, for which they were to be given in pawn; but the answers, which the French made to every proposition, shewed they meant nothing but to amule and distract the Allies. The first demand made by the Allies was of the places in Spain, then in the hands of the French King; for the delivering up of these might have been a good step to the reduction of the whole. But this was flatly refused; and, that the King of France might put it out of his power to treat about it, he ordered his troops to be drawn out of all the strong places in Spain, and been after out of the Kingdom, pretending that he was thereby evacuating it, though the French forces were kept still in the neighbourhood. Thus a flaw was made of leaving Spain to defend itself; and upon that King Philip revolved on the Spaniards to make great efforts, before it was ever expected of them. This was done by the French King to deceive both the Allies and his own Subjects, who were calling loudly for a peace; and it likewise enabled him of a great part of the charge, that Spain had put him to. But while his troops were called out of that Kingdom, as many deserted, by a visible connivance, as made up several battalions and the Moor regiments, as being subjects of Spain, were sent thither; so that King Philip was not weakened by the recalling the French troops; and by this means the place in Spain could not be any more demanded. The next demand, as most important towards the reduction of Spain, was that Bayonne and Poitou might be put into the hands of the Allies, with Tenacities on the side of the Empire. By the two former all communication betwixt France and Spain would be cut off, and the Allies would be enabled to send forces thither with less expense and trouble. But it was said, these were the keys of France which the King could not part with; and therefore it remained to treat of towns on the frontier of the Netherlands, and even there they expected Doway, Arras, and Cambray; so that all the offers appeared illusory, and the intercourse by letters was for some time let fall (1). After some time Torcy wrote to Petkum to desire, since the point in dispute could not be adjusted by letters, that passes might be granted for some Ministers from France to come to Holland, and

(1) Dr. Harc, in his fourth letter to a Tory-Member, sets forth this affair more at large: 'This, says he, was the nature of the expedient in agitation; and nothing can shew better the readiness of the Allies to put an end to the war, and the insincerity of France, than what passed between them on this subject. The towns to be given up for this purpose must have been either in Spain, or on the borders of it, or on the side of Alsace, or in Flanders. Whatever could have been done of this kind, was but a poor expedient for an article of so much consequence; and, had the King of France been in earnest, one cannot think he would have made any difficulty to give the Allies what they were willing to accept. But, as he meant nothing less than what he was so forward to promise, there was no security of this sort the Allies could ask, which he did not think too much to grant.

As for towns in Spain, which was the best security, and most to the purpose, that expedient had been proposed during the conferences at the Hague, and was by the French Ministers refused: And to prevent the Allies from persisting in this demand, the King soon after put it out of his power to comply with it; otherwise his people, as blind as they are, could not have had any great opinion of his sincerity in the desires he expressed for peace, while he rejected a condition, that was so natural for the Allies to ask; and not only possible, but easy for him to grant; and which the safety and interest of France, as distinct from Spain, were no way concerned in. That the negotiations therefore might not continue to rest upon this point, he took care immediately, that there should be no room left for the Allies to insist on this demand; and to that end withdrew his troops out of all the Spanish fortresses, as he did afterwards out of the Kingdom, upon pretence indeed of evacuating Spain, according to the preliminary articles. But that was only a pretence; for he kept them there all the summer, to be at hand to assist the Duke of Alva, in case his army should be attacked, or an invasion should be made into Arragon; though otherwise the General, that commanded them, had orders not to venture a battle, but to be on the defensive; as appeared upon the Duke of Alva's coming to his army upon the surprise of Badajoz by the Allies, and expulating with Marshal Beaumont for not joining upon that occasion the Spanish army; for which he justified himself by producing the King's orders. By this middle way, the King thought he could deceive the Allies, without abandoning the Spaniards; and, in the mean time, the Duke of Anjou, according to the direction of French Councils, made his utmost efforts to put Spain into a condition to defend itself, as if they were in earnest to expect no farther assistance from France; which had so good an effect on the Spaniards, that they exerted themselves, beyond what could be expected of them. They completed in a little time their old regiments, and raised besides a great many new ones; and the most vigorous measures were taken to find money, and erect magazines, as if they were to stand for the future, on their own bottom, though the King of France was far from intending they should want his assistance, when their affairs called for it. And that his Grandson might not want a General for his army, it was publicly talked at Paris, before Monsieur Rouillé's return, that, in case of a peace, the Duke of Berwick had desired

1709. and renew the Conferences; or that Petkum might be permitted to go to France, to try if his presence could help to find out an expedient, that had hitherto been in vain endeavoured by letters. The first the States refused, till they knew precisely what they were to come for, since, under the appearance of some good, the presence of French ministers in Holland gave them an opportunity to do a great deal of harm, by sowing seeds of jealousy among the Allies, poisoning the minds of the people against their Governors, and retarding the great preparations for another campaign, which can never be pushed with the vigour they should, while the people are amused with the specious appearances of an approaching peace: For so the French endeavoured to make it every where thought, when they meant nothing less. For these reasons the States refused to give passes for any Ministers to come from France, till they knew more of their intentions. But, to shew their readiness to hearken to any reasonable proposal, they consented, that Petkum should go to France, which he did about the latter end of November.

While these negotiations were carrying on by letters with France, King Philip did not only take all the proper measures he could to maintain himself in the Monarchy, which his Grandfather was, in appearance, treating to give up, but published a notable manifesto, wherein he protested against all that should be transacted at the Hague in his prejudice, as void and null, and declared his resolution to adhere to his faithful Spaniards, as long as there was a man of them that would stand by him; and was so far from quitting Spain and the Indies to his Competitor, that he would not consent he should have those parts of the Monarchy which he was then possessed off; and, in pursuance of this manifesto, he named the Duke of Alba and Count Bergheyc for his Plenipotentiaries, with orders to notify it to the Maritime Powers; which Count Bergheyc did in a letter to the Duke of Mariborough, dated from Mons, Aug. 21, with a copy of their instructions; and they sent another, at the same time, to the Deputy of the States; which were accordingly transmitted to their Principals. But no answer was thought fit, either by England or Holland, to be returned to them. And to admit Plenipotentiaries from him now, would undo all that had been hitherto agreed on; and, instead of seeking for an expedient for the 37th article of the preliminaries, the whole of them would have been destroyed, and the treaty must have been begun intirely anew.

In Count Bergheyc's letter there was also broad intimations, how grateful King Philip would be, if, by means of the Duke of Mariborough's good offices, his just and reasonable desires might be complied with; and there was nothing he would not do to content England in general, or that might be to his satisfaction in particular.

desired leave to resign his Baton of Marshal of France, that he might go and command in Spain: Which shews us, how the Duke of Anjou might have Officers as well as men from France, if he had any want of them. If therefore the King of France withdrew his troops, it was not with a design to leave his Grandson to himself, but upon very different views: It was to make the Allies, and his own people believe he was sincere, and that he was willing to remove, as far as he could, all the difficulties in the way of peace; and yet, at the same time, and by the same action, increase the difficulties he would seem to remove, by rendering by this means the most reasonable demand of the Allies impracticable: Besides that he really wanted these troops himself against another year, the danger he was threatened with in Flanders obliging him to have a more numerous army on that side. This was all he meant by withdrawing his troops from Spain, and therefore he did not do it, till he had put the Duke of Anjou's affairs upon a pretty good foot, and he was sure there could be no immediate want of them, the campaign there being at an end. And, that this removal of his troops might be of the least prejudice possible to his Grandson, he contrived, that as many of his own troops should desert as would make seven or eight battalions; and, to supply the place of the rest as far as he could, he sent his Grandson all the Walloon regiments from Flanders; from whence they began their march for Spain the beginning of the February following, which was as soon as money, arms, and clothes could be provided for them. And not content with giving the Duke of Anjou this assistance, and supplying him with great stores of ammunition, because new-raised troops could not be much depended on, the King kept many of the troops he withdrew in Rouffillon upon the borders of Spain, to be ready to return, when his Grandson's affairs should make it necessary. And is not this very like the conduct of one, who means in earnest to abandon Spain, and would restore it to the House of Austria, if he could? But poor man! He cannot do impossibilities. It is a pretty way to facilitate the reduction of a Kingdom, to make it as difficult as possible; a great sign of sincerity to put things out of our power, which we cannot, without discovering our insincerity, keep in it; and mighty reasonable to create impossibilities, and then complain of them. Who can help believing such a man, when he tells you, he would with all his heart, to procure a peace, give up the Spanish monarchy, if he could, but that he really cannot; and that this is the only hindrance? Or what pledge of his good will is there, one may not expect from him, as a caution, that he will not, directly or indirectly, hinder your doing what he cannot possibly himself do for you? To expect a valuable pledge from a man, to be returned to him when that is done, which he intends never shall be done, is a great jest. And therefore, since the French King has so plainly discovered his intention, you must not wonder he makes such difficulties in settling an expedient, as you could not expect in a man, who means one word of what he says.

The first and only good expedient, you see, is made impracticable, on purpose, that it may not be insisted on. The next best was to put into the hands of the Allies some French towns on the frontier of Spain, such as Bayonne and Perpignan, which would have enabled the Allies to send forces to Spain with infinitely less expence and trouble, and in a quarter of the time they can now; and, at the same time, have obliged the French pretty effectually to keep their promise not to assist the Duke of Anjou, by cutting off in great measure the communication between France and Spain. This was an expedient, which the King could not say it was not in his power to comply with. But, when one has not a mind to do a thing, nothing is so easy as to find out a reason for not doing it. If this could not be said to be an impossible expedient, it was easy to pretend, that it did not suit either with the safety or dignity of France to put the keys of his Kingdom into the hands of the Allies, since he could not be sure what use they might make of them, or when he should get them again. And this was very right arguing for a man, who never intended that should be done, which is made the condition, on which the caution he deposits shall be restored. If the King does not design Spain should be quitted by his Grandson, it must

1709. particular. Torcy was likewise said to write very unnecessarily, and with great officiousness, two or three very civil letters to the Duke, till he found his civilities were lost upon him. Petkum, after a stay at Paris of about ten days, and several fruitless interviews with the Marquis de Torcy, returned to the Hague on the 7th of December, without having been able to make the least progress in the business he went upon, or bringing so much as the pretence of an expedient along with him; but, instead of that, he brought the sense of the French Court, in a paper drawn up by Torcy, and importing in substance, "That it would be impossible for the King of France to execute the 37th article of the preliminaries, even though his Majesty could resolve to sign it. That the other articles were proposed by the Allies six months since, in order to prevent, by a suspension of arms, the events of the campaign, which might change the dispositions towards peace: And that reason now ceasing, because the winter-season naturally produced a cessation of arms, without any agreement in writing, that therefore, without farther mention of the preliminaries, the three winter months might be spent in treating and concluding a peace. That, though the form of the preliminaries were suppressed, yet the King of France would preserve the substance, and treat on the foundation of the conditions, to which he had consented, for the satisfaction of the Emperor, England, and Holland, and their Allies, though he had declared, that those conditions should be void, if they were not accepted during the negotiation at the Hague. That his Majesty was ready to resume the negotiations on the same foot, and send his Plenipotentiaries to such a place as should be agreed on, to begin the Conferences with those of the Allies, on the first day of January. And, if this proposal were accepted, the Sieur Petkum might forthwith return, for settling the passes, and other formalities, for

must be owned it would not be very prudent in him to give the Allies such important places under the notion of cautionary towns, which must either defeat his design of supporting his Grandson; or, if that design succeed, could never of right be demanded back of them; nor but that a Prince of his known abilities would, we may be sure, soon find a pretence to ask for them, and that pretence he would justify, if not readily submitted to, the same way he has so many others no less groundless, by force and arms, which with him have always been the measures of right and wrong. But if he were sincere, if he really meant that Spain should be restored, what inconvenience could there be in complying with this expedient? What ill use could the Allies make of it? Could they, by the help of these towns, hurt France, before they had reduced Spain? Can it be imagined, that would not find them work enough? Or is there any room to fear an invasion from Spain afterward? No sure; however significant Spain may be in French hands, it will not in haste be very formidable out of them. They would have themselves too much business in looking to themselves, to think of disturbing so powerful a neighbour. And there would be a thousand times more reason for them to be afraid of France, than for France to apprehend any thing from them. Nor can there be the least pretence for a suspicion, that the Allies, if these towns were once in their hands, would never part with them, supposing the end answered for which they were intrusted with them; for, besides that such a breach of faith is without example on the side of the Allies, they cannot, for the reasons I gave you in my last, act a false part in this matter, if they would, especially not on this side of France; where, if the Allies had ever so much justice on their side, they could not long support themselves under the mighty disadvantages with which they must make war on this frontier. But there is no need of saying more, to shew you how ridiculous it is to pretend any fear of the Allies, if these towns should be put into their hands. The supporting of Spain has cost France too dear, not to know the low condition it is in; and that nothing could be greater madness in King Charles, or his Allies, than not to sit down quietly in peace the minute that Kingdom is reduced to his obedience, without seeking for new pretences to continue the war needlessly.

Nothing therefore can be thought to be the true reason, why the king of France rejected this expedient, but that he never intended the Allies should obtain the end, for which it was asked, as you will see more plainly in what follows. On the side of Alsace, nothing was proposed, that I know of, but Thionville, a place of great consequence to France, were they in any danger from the Empire. But, considering the feeble low condition of that enervated exhausted body, one cannot but think the strong places on that side are of no other use but to enable the French to invade the Empire, and not to secure them against invasions from it. And what should be deposited as a pledge, would be to be restored long before the Empire could be in a condition to make any use of it, that would be either unjust in itself, or troublesome to France. But France never intending to fulfil the condition on which the town should be restored, this proposal was rejected upon the same pretence as the former.

Nothing now was left, but to seek for an expedient in Flanders, which was what the French offered from the first, and all along pressed, as if they were very much in earnest. But, had they been so, it is very hard to give a good reason, why an expedient should be looked for here, rather than in any other part. The Allies, though they were sensible whatever could be given on this side, was but a poor expedient at best; yet they were so sincerely disposed to put an end to the war, that they would not absolutely reject it. Whatever towns France could put into the hands of the Allies on this side, if they were not such, as lie nearest to those, that are to be given up by the preliminaries, their tenure would be very precarious; and it would be very difficult to keep them, when France had a mind to have them again. This you may easily judge of by the impossibility the Allies were under last campaign to make the siege of Arras, while they left Doway behind them; and the difficulty Upres gave them in the siege of Aire. But if these cautionary towns were to be of those that lie nearest, they could not be of so much importance to France, as that they should not be willing to part with them to keep Spain, since this would only be making a little farther addition to the barrier of the Netherlands; which would secure them more from France. But, as bad an equivalent as this was at the best, the French refused to make it as good as they could, by excepting such towns as were of most consequence, such as Doway, Arras, and Cambray, which would lay them open to an invasion from the Allies; which, if the Allies were able to make, they knew their own designs would give but too just a handle for; besides, they were unwilling to part with, under the name of a caution, what they could not be willing to part with for good and all, since they intended to forfeit the condition, and not do themselves, or rather not suffer that to be done, which would give them a right to ask for it again.

This being the design of France, all these negotiations by letters came to nothing; and one side would never offer what the other could accept, unless the Allies would be content with the name of an expedient

1709. "the place and manner of meeting (1)." The States-General, having considered both the answer and the report of their Deputies, came to the unanimous resolution, "That the Sieur Petkum, who, at the desire, and, upon the repeated instances of France, was permitted, with the consent and knowledge of the high Allies, to go for France, to see if any expedient could be found out, for removing the difficulties about the 37th article of the preliminaries, was, contrary to all expectation, returned, not only without bringing any such expedient with him, but with an answer, in which France intirely receded from the foundations agreed to with common consent, and with a proposal to enter into a formal negotiation of peace, without settling and adjusting any thing beforehand; a proposal in all times judged dangerous, and contrary to the declaration made on the part of France, That all the preliminary articles should remain firm, as they were settled, only with such alterations in the terms of the execution, which the course of time had rendered necessary, except only the 37th article. That from this way of proceeding, nothing could be expected, but that the enemy was not sincerely disposed to agree to a safe peace; and that little regard was to be had to the assurances of their good intentions, seeing the effects agreed to little with their professions; but rather, that all was concerted and designed to sow, if possible, distrusts and jealousies between the Allies and that State, while the French were resolved to continue the war. That therefore it was absolutely necessary, that the Allies in general, and every one of them in particular, should, in an extraordinary manner, exert themselves, and make early preparations for prosecuting with vigour, in the next campaign, the advantages obtained in the last. That a letter to that purpose should be written to the Emperor and Diet of the Empire at Ratisbon; the confederated Circles, the Electors and Princes of the Empire, the Queen of Great-Britain, and

"the Duke of Savoy, And that their Imperial and Britannic Majesties should be desired, that Prince Eugene of Savoy, and the Prince and Duke of Marlborough, might come to the Hague very early in the spring, before the end of February, to concert the necessary measures for the campaign." The Queen of Great-Britain not only returned a favourable answer to the letter of the States-General, but resolved also to exhort all the Allies to a vigorous prosecution of the war; and, in particular, wrote a very pressing letter to the General Diet of the Empire.

About the time Petkum returned to the Hague, the French King wrote to King Philip, to acquaint him with what had passed, and to assure him, that, though he was obliged to recall his troops, he need not be alarmed at it, for that he would never abandon him; and that he had ordered twelve regiments, that were then in Spain, to join the Spaniards, in case King Charles should make an irruption into Aragon. And a little after Monsieur Ibheville was sent to Madrid; but both his journey and business were made so great a secret, that it was not for some time known whither he was gone; and when he came to Madrid, where he arrived on the 26th of December, his instructions were to communicate his business to nobody but the King himself. He did not make a long stay, nor was he in appearance well received; but no judgment could be made from thence what his errand was; there was no way to distinguish between what was real and what disguise. But to judge from other steps, it is most reasonable to think his business was to learn the state in which King Philip's affairs were, and to give him his lesson, how he should manage in so nice a juncture; with assurances, that in spite of all appearances to the contrary, which the necessity of his affairs might oblige the French King to make, he would never desert him, much less agree with the Allies, upon any terms, to turn his arms against him. But this journey was made a great mystery of, to make the Allies believe, that

dient instead of the thing, which they were beforehand sure could by no means answer the end it was given for; which the Allies were too wise to do.

(1) Dr Hare, in his fourth letter to a Tory Member, p. 19, observes, that "this answer was short even of their expectations, who hoped least from it; for this overthrew all the preliminaries at once, while the King pretended to agree to all but one; and by promising to keep the substance of them, while they destroy the form, they effectually defeat all that had been done, and recover to themselves an intire liberty to dispute all points afresh, and to lay hold of all the occasions, which that would give them, to create divisions and jealousies between the States and their Allies; which is plainly the great point they have all along aimed at; which though they have been so terribly disappointed in, they are unwilling to give over, in hopes their constancy and firmness to the common cause would in time be wearied out, and yield to the importunate solicitations with which they tempted them."

Though to prevent a new campaign might be a reason for hastening the preliminaries, it was not the only or chief design of them. Whenever a treaty should commence, the Allies had declared long before, in answer to the Elector of Bavaria's letters at the end of the Ramilles campaign, they would not enter on it, till some fundamental points were first settled, the necessity of which they were convinced of by the dear-bought experience of former treaties: And the same experience has taught the Allies, that no treaty with France can be effectual, if the fundamental articles are not executed as well as agreed on, before the general treaty is concluded; which security the Marquis would intirely take away, by deferring the execution till after ratification. Thus the two great ends of a preliminary treaty, which are to agree on some fundamental points, and secure the execution of them, are by this answer intirely destroyed; and the Allies are not only where they were before that treaty was begun, but are really the worse for it; it being of greater advantage to the French to know beforehand what are the particular demands, which the Emperor and Maritime Powers insist on for themselves, and in behalf of the Allies. As for solving all now by two words, Form and Substance, two other words, the Letter and Spirit of the Partition-treaty, are still too well remembered for the Allies to be again deceived by the French distinctions, which, if they could now pass upon them, it is easy to see, that the form of these articles would have been found to be the substance of them, and the pretended substance would have proved a shadow only. Here then Dutch bluntness and plain-dealing proved too hard for the Finess of the French; a word not more peculiar to them, than the thing meant by it.

1709. that the business of it was to persuade King Philip to retire out of Spain, since it would be impossible for the French King to support him any longer.

come to England.

About the beginning of May happened an extraordinary event, which raised much discourse and argument in England, namely, the coming over of great numbers of Palatines, Swabians, and other Germans, most of them Lutherans, being driven from their habitations, either by the oppressive exactions of the French, or the desolation of their native country, occasioned by the calamities of the war; so that, by the middle of June, they were increased to six thousand five hundred and twenty men, women, and children; among whom were schoolmasters, husbandmen, vine-dressers, herdsmen, wheel-wrights, smiths, weavers, carpenters, masons, bakers, coopers, brewers, and other handicrafts-men. It was never certainly known upon what motives, and with what views, these people were brought over; but it is certain, that, being come into Holland, with design to go for the English Plantations in America, upon an invitation of some of their countrymen, who were reported to be there in a thriving condition, they were furnished with shipping to come over to England by Mr d'Ayrelles, the British Secretary at the Hague, by direction from those in the Administration. Being destitute of all necessaries, they must inevitably have perished, had not the Queen first ordered a daily allowance to be distributed to them, and, at the same time, a sufficient number of tents to be delivered out of the Tower, for their incamping on Black-Heath near Greenwich, and in a large field near Camberwell; and afterwards, upon the petition of the Justices of Peace for the County of Middlesex, granted a Brief for the collection of charity-money within that County; which Brief was shortly after made to extend through the whole Kingdom of Great-Britain; and, at the same time, were appointed several persons, in the most eminent stations, to be Trustees and Commissioners, for receiving and disposing of the monies so collected. The kind reception and entertainment which these distressed fugitives found here, having been reported abroad, encouraged many other Germans to leave their desolate habitations, and to follow their countrymen, inasmuch that their numbers increased so fast, that the Secretary at the Hague was directed to put a stop to their coming over. As a considerable number of German Roman Catholics had come along with the Protestants, such of them as did not voluntarily change their Religion, were, at the Queen's expence, sent back to Holland, where she ordered a sum of money to be distributed to them, towards the charges of their journey home. As for the Palatines, who staid behind in Great-Britain, some were entertained in private families, some sent to Ireland, others to Carolina, and the greatest part to New York, under the direction of Commissary Du Pré, who failed with them for that country about the beginning of April 1710, together with Colonel Hunter, governor of that country.

A Parliament
in Ireland.

The Earl of Wharton having been made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, arrived there the 2d of April 1709. A fortnight after his landing, he opened a Session of Parliament, and made a speech to both Houses, part of which was as follows:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I Am obliged and directed to lay before you another consideration of infinite consequence; and that is, to put you in mind of the great inequality there is, with respect to numbers, between the Protestants and Papists of this Kingdom, and of the melancholy experience you have had of this sort of men, whenever they had it in their power to distress or destroy you.

These reflections must necessarily lead you to think of two things; the first is, seriously to consider, whether any new bills are wanting to enforce or explain those good laws, which you have already, for preventing the growth of Popery. And, in the next place, it makes evident the necessity there is of inculcating and preserving a good understanding amongst all the Protestants of this Kingdom. What the most proper methods are to compleat so desirable and necessary an end, yourselves, who have the opportunities of knowing the uneasiness that any of your Fellow-subjects may lie under, are the fittest to judge.

I will only add, That the Queen, who is all goodness, never had any thing so much at her Royal heart, as the bringing to pass, and perfecting the Union of her Subjects of Great-Britain: And I may venture to say, that she looks upon her success in this great undertaking to equal, if not to exceed, any other of the glories of her Reign."

In this speech the Lord Wharton recommended a good understanding between the Churchmen and Dissenters, as the surest means to weaken the Popish interest, by strengthening the Protestant. The Irish Papists doubted not, by dividing the Protestants, to find an opportunity to destroy them. The Lord Wharton was resolved to let the Papists know, at his first coming, they were to expect no favour from him. As Popery had increased under the late Administration, he procured a bill to prevent the growth of it, by enacting, "That the estates of the Irish Papists should descend to their Protestant heirs." But his care to discourage Popery did not hinder his being represented by the Tories, in England, as a persecutor of the Church in Ireland. He had not only made Dr Lambert Dean of Downe, and Dr Lloyd Dean of Connor, but it was also reported, that he had sent a Bishop to prison. This matter was thus: The House of Peers having (on the 28th of June) adjourned to the next day, the feast of St Peter and St Paul, Dr John Pooley, Bishop of Raphoe, took upon him to protest against it. His reason was, "Because he conceived it against the laws of the Church to do business upon a Holiday, which might hinder Divine Service, Prayers and Sacraments, Sermons or Homilies, and Catechisms, lest it should be a robbery of God, as well as Tythes and Offerings." The Lords, the next day, reformed this protest, and signified to the Bishop, that, unless he withdrew it, they must send him to the Castle. But he being obstinate, and adhering to his protest, the House ordered him to be taken into the custody of the Black-Rod, and adjourning for a month, the Usher had him so long in durance, which, by the Lord Wharton's Union recommended, and Popery discouraged, by the Earl of Wharton.

The Bishop of Raphoe taken into custody.

1709. Wharton's direction, was made as easy to him, as was consistent with the orders of the House.

A Fellow of Trinity College near Dublin, having lately expelled Edward Forbes for aspersing the memory of King William, and they having shewn a steady adherence to the Revolution; a motion was made in the House of Commons for an address to the Lord-Lieutenant, that he would lay before the Queen the desire of the House, that five thousand pounds might be given for erecting a public Library in the College.

Notes about the Palatines. The Commissioners appointed in England for the settlement of the Palatines, having sent into Ireland five hundred families of these Refugees; the Commons took their distressed condition into consideration, and agreed, that the sending a proportion of these Palatines into Ireland was a strengthening the Protestant interest, and the encouraging them to settle there would greatly contribute to the security of the Kingdom, and therefore that the Queen be addressed to allow five thousand pounds annually for three years towards their support and settlement, which should be made good to her in the next aids granted by Parliament.

Proceedings of the Irish Convocation. The Convocation of the Clergy of Ireland sat with the Parliament, and by this time the same ill temper, that had prevailed in the English Convocation, began to ferment and spread itself among the Clergy of Ireland. None of the disputes about the power of proroguing had been thought of formerly in that Church, as they had no records or minutes of former Convocations. The faction in England found out proper instruments, to set the same humour on foot, during the Earl of Rochester's Government, and, as was said, by his directions: And, it being once raised, it continued by reason of the indolence of the succeeding Governors. So that the Clergy were making the same bold claim in Ireland, that had caused such disputes in England. Accordingly, on the 5th of August, the power of proroguing was by the Lower-House contested in a very high and warm debate. The Lord-Lieutenant (who was resolved to put a stop to these matters) being informed of it by Dr Brown, Chairman of the Committee, sent orders in the midst of the debate to prorogue the Convocation to the 5th of October next, to their great surprize and mortification. Dr Brown, for giving this intelligence, was some time after, by the procurement of the Lord Wharton, promoted to the See of Cork; yet upon the change of the Ministry he became the most violent of all the Irish Prelates against the Earl of Wharton, the Archbishop of Canterbury (who was his friend) and indeed against the whole Whig-party, to whom he rendered himself still more obnoxious, by discountenancing the drinking to the glorious memory of King William. Against which he wrote and preached some tracts and sermons, but so little answering the purpose, that King William's memory was afterwards more frequently drunk than before, with an additional mark of contempt to the Bishop, and the sacredness, which he weakly imagined to be tacked to Commemoration-beauties, became universally exploded.

When the bill to prevent the further growth of Popery, with those for the supply, were ready for the Royal assent; the Earl of Wharton came, on the 30th of August, to the House of Peers, and concluded the Session with a speech to both Houses, in which were these paragraphs:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I Make no question but that you understand too well the true interest of the Protestant Religion in this Kingdom, not to endeavour to make all such Protestants as easy as you can, who are willing to contribute what they can to defend the whole against the common enemy.
" It is not the law now past, nor any other law, that the wit of man can frame, will secure you from Popery, whilst you continue divided among yourselves; it being demonstrable, that, unless there be a firm friendship and confidence among the Protestants of this Kingdom, it is impossible for you either to be happy, or to be safe.
" And I am directed to declare it to you, as her Majesty's fixed resolution, That as her Majesty will always maintain and support the Church, as by law established, so it is her Royal will and intentions, that Dissenters shall not be persecuted, or molested in the exercise of their Religion."

Lord Lieutenant's speech at the close of the Session.

The Parliament being prorogued to the 13th of March, the Lord-Lieutenant, attended by Mr Addison Secretary of State, embarked for England, where he arrived the 9th of September. The great business of the Session of Parliament this winter related to Dr Sacheverel. This affair not only took up most of their time, but, in conclusion, had also great effects. As it was one of the most extraordinary transactions of the time, it will deserve a particular notice. Dr Sacheverel was a bold, insolent man, with a very small share of religion, virtue, learning, or good sense; but he resolved to force himself into popularity and preferment by the most petulant railings at Dissenters, and Low-Churchmen, in several sermons and libels, penned without either chastness of stile, or liveliness of expression, and full of indecent and scurrilous language (1). When

(1) He was grandson of John Sacheverel, the Presbyterian Minister of Wincainton in Somersetshire, who was bred in St John's College Oxford, and silenced soon after the Restoration. This John, being taken at a Conventicle, suffered three years imprisonment, which occasioned his death. John's eldest son (father of Dr Henry Sacheverel) was bred in King's College Cambridge, and entertained notions very opposite to his father's principles, and died Minister of St Peter's Church in Marlborough, leaving a numerous family in very low circumstances. His son Henry was put to school at Marlborough at the charge of Edward Hoarff an Apothecary, who, being his godfather, adopted him for his son. Hoarff's widow sent him afterwards to Oxford, where he became Fellow of Maudlin College. His mother, by procurement of Bishop Burnet, was admitted into the hospital for distressed widows at Salisbury. He had not been long at Oxford, before he discovered his turbulent spirit. When he came to be ordained by Bishop Lloyd, he was by the Bishop charged with false Latin, but he confidently defended it, till the Bishop sent for books to convince him. The 1709. When he had pursued this method for several years without effect, he was at last brought up from the country by a popular election to St Saviour's in Southwark, where he began to make great reflections on the Ministry, representing, that the Church was in danger, being neglected by those who governed, while they favoured her most inveterate enemies. At the Summer Assizes in Derby, where he preached before the Judges, and this winter, on the 5th of November, at St Paul's, he gave a full vent to his fury, in the most violent declamation, that he could contrive, upon these words of St Paul, Perils among false brethren, in which, after some short reflections upon Popery, he let himself loose into such indecencies, that both the man and the sermon were universally condemned. He asserted the doctrine of Non-resistance in the highest strain possible; and said, that to charge the Revolution with resistance, was to cast black and odious imputations on it; pretending, that the late King had disowned it, and cited for proof some words in his declaration, by which he vindicated himself from a design of conquest. He poured out much scorn and scurrility on the Dissenters, and reflected severely on the Toleration; and said, the Church was violently attacked by her enemies, and loosely defended by her pretended friends. He animated the people to stand up for the defence of the Church, for which, he said, he sounded the trumpet, and desired them to put on the whole armour of God. After the preaching of this sermon, the Lord-Mayor, Sir Samuel Garrard, invited the Doctor to dinner, took him in his coach, carried him to his house, gave him thanks for his good sermon, and told him, that he hoped to see it in print. The Doctor answered, that he was apprehensive he had spoken some bold truths, which might displease some people. Notwithstanding which, the Lord-Mayor undertook to propose to the Court of Aldermen, that they should return the Doctor thanks for his sermon, and desire him to print it. But, though that motion was rejected by the Court of Aldermen, yet the Doctor, looking upon the encouragement already given him by the Lord-Mayor as a tacit command, ventured to publish his sermon, with a dedication to his Lordship. The party, who opposed the Ministry, magnified this sermon so highly, that, as was generally reckoned, about forty thousand of them were printed and dispersed over the Nation. The Queen seemed highly offended at it, and the Ministry looked on it as an attack upon them, that was not to be despised. The Lord-Treasurer was so described, that it was next to the naming him. A Parliamentary impeachment was resolved on; but Eyre, then Solicitor-General, and others, thought the short way of burning the sermon, and keeping him in prison during the Session of parliament, was the better method; but the more solemn method was unhappily chosen.

- There had been, ever since the Queen came to the Crown, an open revival of the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, by Mr. Charles Lesley, who was the first man that began the war in Ireland, saying, in a speech solemnly made, that King James, by declaring himself a Papist, could no longer be our King, since he could not be the defender of our Faith, nor the head of our Church, dignities so inherent in the Crown, that he, who was incapable of these, could not hold it (1). As he animated the people with this speech, so some actions followed under his conduct, in which several men were killed; yet he changed sides quickly, and became the most violent Jacobite in the Nation, and was engaged in many plots, and in writing many books against the Revolution, and the present Government. Soon after the Queen's accession to the Throne, he, or his son, as some said, published a series of weekly papers, under the title of the Rehearsal, pursuing a thread of arguments in them, all against the lawfulness of resistance in any case whatsoever; deriving Government wholly from God, denying all right in the People, either to confer or to coerce it. The Ministers connived at this, but with what intention is not known.
- While these seditious papers had a free course for many years, and were much spread and applauded, Mr. Benjamin Hoadly, the present Bishop of Worcester, being called to preach before the Lord-Mayor, chose for his text the two first verses of the thirteenth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, and fairly explained the words there, that they were to be understood only against resisting good Governors, upon Jewish principles; but that these words had no relation to bad and cruel Governors; and he asserted, that it was not only lawful, but a duty incumbent on all men, to resist such; concluding all with a vindication of the Revolution and the present Government. Upon this a great clamour was raised, as if he had preached up rebellion; several books were wrote against him; and he justified himself with a visible superiority of argument to them all, and so boldly overthrew the conceit of Sir Robert Filmer (at this time espoused by Mr. Lesley), that Government was derived by primogeniture from the first Patriarchs, that for some time he silenced his adversaries; but it was easier to keep up a clamour, than to write a solid answer. Dr. Sacheverell reflected with great virulence upon him and on Bishop Burnet, and other of the Bishops, carrying his venom as far back as to Archbishop Grindal, whom, for his moderation, he

Bishop, finding him very ignorant in Divinity, refused to ordain him at that time, but did it afterwards on the Bishop of Oxford's recommendation, with particular marks of favour; yet he ungenerously traduced that learned Prelate in a libel, called, The character of a Low Church man. Nor was he less virulent against Bishop Burnet, his mother's benefactor. Being presented to a small living in Staffordshire, he fell in, both there and at Oxford, with the most furious of the High-Church and Jacobite party, made scurrilous relections on the death of King William and the Honour Succession, and, when the Queen appeared against the High-Church Memorial, he called her a waxen Queen, alluding to the jest passed upon her at Oxford by those, who put her motto Semper eadem upon a weather-cock. He was proceeding in this manner, when his friends got him preferment in London.

(1) Bishop Burnet says, Dr. King, Archbishop of Dublin, told him, He had seen Lesley's speech under his own hand.

1709. called a perfidious Prelate, and a false son of the Church.

The Parliament meets, Nov. 15. On the 15th of November the Parliament of Great-Britain being met, the Queen, who had not been in person there during the last Session, came and made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Queen's Speech. Pr. H. C. "IT is a great satisfaction to me, that I am able to give you so good an account of the progress of the war since the last Session of Parliament.

"In the beginning of this year, our enemies made use of all their artifices to amuse us with false appearances and deceitful insinuations of their desire of peace, in hopes, that from thence means might be found to create some divisions or jealousies among the Allies. But they were intirely disappointed in their expectation; and such measures were taken upon that occasion, as made it impossible for them long to disguise their insincerity. The operations of the war were not delayed; and the campaign, which, notwithstanding the backwardness of the season, immediately followed, has been at least as glorious for the Allies as any of those which have preceded it.

"God Almighty has been pleased to bless us with a most remarkable victory, and with such other great and important successes, both before and after it, that France is thereby become much more exposed and open to the impression of our arms, and consequently more in need of a peace than it was at the beginning of this campaign.

"However, the war still continuing, I find myself obliged again to desire you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, to grant me such supplies as you shall judge necessary for the assisting our Allies in all parts, and the vigorous prosecution of our advantages, that we may put the last hand to this great work, of reducing that exorbitant and oppressive power which has so long threatened the liberties of Europe.

"I assure you, that all you give shall be carefully applied to the uses of the war, if it continues, or to the lessening of the debts it has necessarily occasioned, in case of a peace; which, though the wants and distresses of our enemies may naturally lead us to expect, yet, our own late experience may fully convince us, is not to be depended upon any other way, than by being in a condition to compel them to such terms as may be safe and honourable for all the Allies.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I think it proper to take notice to you, that the great dearth and scarcity, under which our neighbours abroad have suffered this year, begins to affect us in some measure at home, by the temptation of profit in carrying out too much of our corn, while it bears so high a price in foreign parts.

"This occasions many complaints from the poor; for whose sake I earnestly recommend to you, to take this growing evil into your consideration; having not neglected any thing

"on my part towards the remedying of it, 1709. that the law would allow.

"I cannot conclude, without observing to you, of what great advantage it will be at this time, to the end we all propose to ourselves, that the greatest dispatch be given to the necessary preparations for carrying on the war."

The Lords, in their address, expressed "their joy to see her Majesty's Royal Person upon the Throne, after the great misfortune, which deprived them of her presence during the last Session of Parliament; as also their thanks for her speech, whereby it appeared, how readily her tenderness for her people inclined her to hearken to proposals of peace; how wisely and steadily she proceeded in the first steps of the treaty; and how justly she repented the artifices and insincerity of the enemy by the vigorous prosecution of the war; which soon made it appear, that peace was the choice of her moderation, and must prove the only refuge of her enemies." Concluding with congratulations "on the continued success of her arms, and those of her Allies, under her General, the Duke of Marlborough, whose conduct was worthy of the chief command in so just a war, and his valour equal to the bravery of her troops." And assuring "her Majesty of their utmost support to carry on the war, till France was compelled to submit to the terms of a safe and lasting peace."

The Lord-Chancellor, by order of the Peers, returned the Duke of Marlborough the thanks of that House, for his continued and eminent services during the last campaign. The Commons also, after an address to the Queen, upon her continued successes, with assurances of granting speedy and effectual supplies for carrying on the war, unanimously voted him the thanks of their House, for the late victory, from which, and his other successes, the Kingdom, and the whole Confederacy, had received such honour and advantage. The thanks of both Houses served to silence the Duke of Marlborough's enemies, who reproached him with having wantonly and unnecessarily sacrificed the lives of many thousands, to raise his own reputation.

The Commons made good their assurances to the Queen, for in less than a month they granted all the necessary supplies for the next year's service, amounting to 6,184,466*l.* 7*s.* Of this sum, fifteen hundred thousand pounds were raised by way of lottery, and the rest put on good funds. Pursuant to the Queen's speech, the Commons ordered a bill to be brought in against the exportation of the corn, and, at their request, an embargo was laid on all ships laden therewith.

By this time the affair of Dr Sacheverel was Sacheverel before the Commons. Mr Dolben, son to the late Archbishop of York, moved with indignation that the Lord-Treasurer should be re-elected on by the Doctor under the nick-name of Volpone, complained, on the 13th of December, of the two sermons before-mentioned. Several paragraphs were read out of each, and Sir Peter King and others having made speeches against the audaciousness of the Doctor, who had advanced positions directly opposite to Revolution-Principles, Principles, to the present Government, and to the Protestant Succession, and consequently tending to cherish factions, and stir up rebellion. Those, who favoured the Doctor's cause, were surprized at this sudden attack, and, no Member offering to speak in his defence, it was resolved, that the two sermons were malicious, scandalous, and seditious libels, highly reflecting on the Queen, the late Revolution, and the Protestant Succession, tending to alienate the affections of her Majesty's subjects, and to create jealousies and divisions among them. The Doctor was ordered to attend at the bar of the House the next day, and, being examined, owned the two sermons. He likewise told them, what encouragement he had from the Lord-Mayor to print the perils of false brethren. Sir Samuel Garrard, being a Member of the House, was asked, Whether the sermon was printed at his desire or order? If he had owned it, he would have been expelled the House: But he denied, that ever he desired, or ordered, or encouraged, the printing thereof. Though the Doctor offered to prove it, and brought witnesses for that purpose, yet the House would not enter upon that examination, but it was thought more decent to seem to give credit to their own Member, though few indeed believed him.

Doctor.

The Doctor standing to what he had said, without expressing the least consciousness of having done amiss, he was directed to withdraw; and it was resolved, that he should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors, and Mr Dolben was ordered to do it at the bar of the House of Lords, in the name of all the Commons of Great-Britain. At the same time, a Committee was appointed to draw up the articles against him, and the Doctor was taken into custody of the Serjeant at Arms.

Fate in favour of
ly.

The Commons having proceeded thus far, some Members took occasion to speak in favour of Mr Hoadly, whose principles were more agreeable to the sense of the majority of that House; and who, in several writings, had vindicated the Revolution (1). Upon which it was resolved, "That the Reverend Mr Benjamin Hoadly, Rector of St Peter's Poor, London, for having often justified the Principles, on which her Majesty and the Nation proceeded in the late happy Revolution, had justly merited the favour and recommendation of this House. 2. That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, that she would be graciously pleased to bestow some dignity in the Church on Mr Hoadly, for his eminent services both to the Church and State." This address having been presented to the Queen, she answered, "That she would take a proper opportunity to comply with their desires." Which, however, she never did.

When Mr Dolben carried up the impeachment against Dr Sacheverel, the Lord Haverham made a short speech, importing, "That it seemed somewhat strange to see a Divine impeached for preaching a doctrine, for which he would heretofore have been rewarded, and might, if times changed, be made a Bishop. However, added his Lordship, since he is impeached, I hope a day will come for the calling to account other criminals; for, which way soever I cast my Eyes, I see matter for impeachments."

Dr Sacheverel having petitioned the Commons to admit him to bail, that he might have an opportunity of making his defence, the committee, who were to draw up the articles of impeachment, were ordered to search for precedents concerning the taking bail in case of persons committed for high crimes and misdemeanors, and Mr Dolben reporting they could find none, it was put to the vote, whether he should be admitted to bail, and carried in the negative by a majority of an hundred and fourteen against sixty-four.

The Proceedings against Dr Sacheverel occasioned great jealousies and animosities between the two parties of High-Church and Low-Church; the former gave it out boldly, and in all places, that a design was formed by the Whigs to pull down the Church; and that this prosecution was only set on foot to try their strength; and that, upon their success in it, they would proceed more openly. Though this was all falshood and forgery, yet it was propagated with so much application and zeal, and the tools employed in it were so well supplied with money (from whom, was not then known) that it is scarce credible how generally it was believed.

Some things concurred to put the vulgar in an ill humour; it was a time of dearth and scarcity, so that the poor were much distressed. The coming over of the Palatines, and the relieving of them, both by the Queen, and by the voluntary Contributions of private people, filled our poor likewise with indignation, who thought those charities, to which they had a better right, were thus intercepted by strangers. And all, who were ill affected, studied to heighten these their resentments. The Clergy generally espoused Dr Sacheverel as their Champion, who had stood in the breach, and reckoned his cause as their own. Many sermons were preached, both in London and other places, to provoke the people, in which they succeeded beyond expectation.

In the mean time the Committee sat several times at Sir Joseph Jekyll's house, in order to draw up the articles of impeachment; so that, the Parliament being met again after Christmas, Mr Dolben reported, that the articles were ready, which were read paragraph by paragraph. The preamble to the articles being read, a motion was made by the Doctor's friends, that the report should be recommitted, which occasioned a very warm debate, wherein Mr Robert Harding, Mr Bromley, Mr Ward, and some others, made several exceptions to the matter and form of Exeter's answer, in which the considerations lately offered to his Lordship are vindicated, and an apology is added for defending the foundation of the present Government.

(1) Particularly in two books lately published, the one intitled, Some considerations humbly offered to the Lord Bishop of Exeter, occasioned by his Lordship's sermon preached before her Majesty, March 8, 1708: The other intitled, An humble reply to the Lord Bishop

1709-10. of the articles, Mr Harley, in particular, insisted on the leaving out the word seditious, alleging a precedent in the Reign of King Charles the First in the prosecution of Prynne, Bastwick, and Barton. But all objections were answered by Mr Secretary Boyle, Mr Smith Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lieutenant-General Mordaunt, Mr Lechmere, Mr Thompson, and some others: So, the question for re-committing being put, it passed in the negative by a majority of two hundred and thirty-two against an hundred and thirty-one; and the articles of impeachment were agreed to, and ordered to be carried up to the Lords. Then the last paragraph or recapitulation were also read and agreed to, and the whole ordered to be ingrossed. The next day, January 12, the ingrossed articles being read, Mr Dolben was ordered to carry the same to the Lords; which he did accordingly, accompanied by a great number of Members. The said articles imported in substance, That Dr Henry Sacheverell, in his sermons and books, did fallily and maliciously suggest and maintain, "1. That the necessary means used to bring about the happy Revolution were odious and unjustifiable: That his late Majesty, in his Declaration, disclaimed the least imputation of resistance; and that to impute resistance to the said Revolution, was to cast black and odious colours upon his late Majesty and the said Revolution. 2. That the Toleration, granted by law to Dissenters, was unreasonable, and the allowance of it unwarrantable: And that he was a false Brother with relation to God, Religion, or the Church, who defended the Toleration or Liberty of Conscience. That Queen Elizabeth was deluded by Archbishop Grindal (whom he scurrilously called a false son of the Church, and a perfidious Prelate) to the Toleration of the Genevian Discipline: And that it was the duty of superior Pastors to thunder out their Ecclesiastical anathema's against persons intitled to the benefit of the Toleration, and insolently dared or defied any power on earth to reverse such sentence. 3. That the Church of England was in a condition of great peril and adversity, under her Majesty's Administration; and, in order to arraign and blacken the vote or resolution of both Houses of Parliament, approved by her Majesty (mentioned in the preamble, and importing, that the Church of England was in a safe and flourishing condition under the Queen's Administration) he did suggest the Church to be in danger; and, as a parallel, mentioned, that the person of King Charles was voted to be out of danger, at the same time that his murderers were conspiring his death; thereby wickedly and maliciously insinuating, that the Members of both Houses, who passed the said vote, were then conspiring the ruin of the Church. 4. That her Majesty's Administration, both in Ecclesiastical and Civil affairs, tended to the destruction of the Constitution; and that there were men of characters and stations, in Church and State, who were false Brethren,

"and did themselves weaken, undermine, betray, and did encourage and put it in the power of others, who were professed enemies, to overturn and destroy the Constitution and Establishment: And charged her Majesty, and those in authority under her, both in Church and State, with a general Male-administration: And, as a public incendiary, he persuaded her Majesty's subjects to keep up a distinction of factions and parties; instilled groundless jealousies, fomented destructive distinctions among them, and excited and stirred them up to arms and violence. And, that his malicious and seditious suggestions might make the stronger impressions upon the minds of her Majesty's subjects, he did wickedly wrest and pervert divers texts and passages of Holy Scripture."

After the exhibiting of these articles, the Serjeant at Arms attending the Commons delivered Dr Sacheverell to the Deputy-Usher of the Black-Rod; and the Lords, having read the articles, ordered, that a copy of them should be given to the Doctor, who was admitted to bail, Dr Lancaster, Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, and Dr Bovues being his sureties; and, being now at liberty, he consulted some eminent Lawyers and Divines, and, with their assistance, drew up an answer, wherein he either denied the false, malicious, and seditious positions and suggestions, charged upon him in the articles, or endeavoured to justify, palliate, and extenuate what he had advanced in his sermons; concluding with the expressions: "Hard is the lot of the Ministers of the Gospel, if, when they cite the word of God, in their general exhortations to piety and virtue, or in their reproofs of men's transgressions, or where they are lamenting the difficulty and conflicts, with which the Church of Christ, whilst militant here on earth, must always struggle; the several passages, by them cited, shall be said to have been by them meant of particular persons and things, and shall be construed in the most criminal sense, and made, by such construction, one ground of an impeachment of high crimes and misdemeanors."

This answer being sent from the Lords to the Commons, and referred to the Committee, Mr Dolben, in a few days reported, that it was in many things foreign to the charge, unbecoming a person impeached, and plainly designed to reflect upon the honour of the House. A replication being ordered to be drawn, a debate arose at the second reading, wherein the Doctor's friends insinuated, "That it was advisable to leave the Offender to the ordinary course of justice." But this was rejected by a great majority, and the replication sent up to the Lords, averring their charge, and declaring, they would be ready to prove it, at such convenient time, as should be appointed for that purpose.

The Lords appointed the 9th of March for the trial at the bar of their House, and the Commons ordered, that the Committee, who had drawn up the articles, should be the Managers to make good the impeachment (1). Then it was debated, whether the House should attend in a body, or in a Committee of the whole House, and it was carried for a Committee by a majority of an hundred and ninety-two against an hundred and eighty. This was done by the Doctor's friends, who found, that, by gaining more time, the People were still more inflamed; and therefore it was, they moved, that the trial might be public in Westminster-hall, where the whole House of Commons might be present. They knew the preparing of that place would be a work of some weeks. Unthinking people were so taken with this, that it could not be withstood, though the effects it would have were well foreseen. Accordingly upon the Commons request, which was brought up by Mr Bromley, one of the Doctor's chief friends, the Lords addressed the Queen for a place to be prepared in Westminster-Hall for the trial. In the mean time the Doctor's friends in town and country were extremely busy, and in their private meetings drank to his happy deliverance.

At length the Lords sent a message to the Commons to acquaint them, they had appointed the 27th of February for the trial. On that day (all things being prepared) the Lords, in their formalities, went down to the Court in Westminster-hall, where vast numbers of spectators had been admitted. The Managers of the Commons, and the Committee of the whole House, having taken their respective places, and Dr Sacheverell, who was lodged in the Temple, and came every day with great solemnity in a coach to the hall, being brought to the bar, the trial began, and lasted three weeks, in which all other business was at a stand, for this took up all men's thoughts. The Queen herself was present every day of the trial in a private manner. The Managers for the Commons opened the matter very solemnly. Their performances were very much and justly commended. Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr Solicitor-General Eyre, Lieutenant-General Stanhope, Sir Peter King, but above all Sir Thomas Parker, distinguished themselves in a very particular manner. They copiously justified both the Revolution and the present Government. There was no need of witnesses; for, the sermon being owned by the Doctor, all the evidence was brought from it by laying the words together, and by shewing his intent and meaning in them, which appeared from comparing one place with another. When his Counsel, Sir Simon Harcourt, Mr Dodd, Mr Phipps, Mr Dee, and Dr Henebriem, came to plead for him, they very freely acknowledged the lawfulness of resistance in extreme cases, and plainly justified the Revolution and our Deliverance by King William. But they said, it was not fit in a sermon to name such an exception. That the duties of morality ought to be delivered in their full extent, without supposing an extraordinary case. And therefore the Doctor had followed precedents set by our greatest Divines ever since the Reformation, 1709-10. and ever since the Revolution. Upon this they opened a great field; they began with the declarations made in King Henry the Eighth's time; they insisted next upon the homilies; and from thence instanced, in a large series of bishops and divines, who had preached the duty of submission and non-resistance in very full terms, without supposing any exception; some excluding all exceptions in as positive a manner as the Doctor had done. They explained the word Revolution, as belonging to the new settlement upon King James's withdrawing; though, in the common acceptation, it was understood of the whole transaction, from the landing of the Dutch army, till the settlement made by the Convention. So that, they understanding the Revolution in that sense, there was indeed no resistance there. That, if the passage quoted from the declaration of King William, while he was Prince of Orange, did not come up to that, for which the Doctor quoted it, he ought not to be censured, because his quotation did not fully prove his point. As for his invective against the Dissenters and Toleration, they laboured to turn that off, by saying, that he did not reflect on what was allowed by law, but on the permission of, or the not punishing many, who published impious and blasphemous books. And a collection was made of passages in books, full of crude impiety and bold opinions. This gave great offence to many, who thought, that this was a solemn publishing of so much in piety to the Nation, by which more mischief would be done than by the books themselves; for most of them had been neglected, and known only to a small number of those, who encouraged them; and the Authors of many of those books had been prosecuted and punished for them. As to those parts of the sermon, which set out the danger the Church was in, though both Houses had some years ago voted it a great offence to say it was in danger; the Doctor's Counsel said it might have been in none ten years ago, when their votes passed, and yet be now in danger: The greatest of all dangers was to be apprehended from the wrath of God for such impieties. They said, the reflections on the administration were not meant of those employed immediately by the Queen, but of Men in inferior posts. If the Doctor's words seemed capable of a bad sense, they were also capable of a more innocent one; and every man was allowed to put any construction on his words, that they could bear.

When the Doctor's Counsel had ended their defence, he concluded it himself with a speech, which he read with much solemnity: in which, with many solemn affirmations, he justified his intentions towards the Queen and her Government. He spoke with respect both of the Revolution and the Protestant Succession. He insisted most on condemning all resistance under any pretence whatsoever, without mentioning the

He said it was a Doctrine of the Church, in which he was educated; and added many pathetic expressions, to move the audience to compassion. This had a great effect on the weaker sort, while it possessed those, who knew the man and his ordinary discourses, with horror, when they heard him affirm so many falsehoods with such solemn appeals to God. It was very plain, that the speech was made for him by others, for the style was more correct and far different from his own; and it was thought to be the joint work of Dr Atterbury, Dr Smalridge, and Dr Freind, supervised and corrected by Sir Simon Harcourt and Mr Phipps (1).

During the trial, the multitudes, that followed him all the way as he came, and as he went back, shewed a great concern for him, pressing about him, and striving to kiss his hand. And when the Queen went, in the afternoon of the day, on which the trial began, to the House of Lords, to give the Royal assent to some bills, a great multitude of people gathered about her sedan, crying out, God bless your Majesty and the Church: We hope your Majesty is for Dr Sacheverel. The next day, the mob was still more numerous and louder about Dr Sacheverel's coach, and obliged all persons they met to pull off their hats to him, and abused those who refused to comply; among whom were some Members of both Houses of Parliament. The same evening, the rioters went to Mr Daniel Burgess's Meeting-House, in a court near Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, of which they broke the windows, and committed several other outrages and disorders. Their fury increasing with their numbers, they advanced to greater enormities, and even to overt-acts of rebellion. For, after they had attended upon Dr Sacheverel, as usual, they repaired to that Meeting-House again, broke it open, pulled down the pulpit, pews, benches, in short, all that was combustible; and, having carried these materials into Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, made a bonfire of them, with repeated cries of Higg-Church and Sacheverel. About the same time, other parties of the mob demolished and destroyed several other Meeting-Houses (2). They also battered and plundered the Houses of several Dissenters; threatened to pull down the Houses of the Lord-Chancellor, Earl of Wharton, Bishop of Sarum, Mr Dolben, and other Managers for the Commons, against Dr Sacheverel; and talked of destroying Mr Hoadly's Church and House, Salter's-Hall, Mr Shower's, and other Meeting-Houses in the City; and even of attacking the Bank of England, of which the Directors being apprehensive, they took the necessary precautions for its security, and sent to Whitehall for assistance. These disorders were directed by some of better fashion, who followed the mob in hackney-coaches, and were seen sending messages to them. Upon the first notice of these tumults, the Earl of Sunderland made his report to the Queen, who commanded him to send her horse and foot-guards to disperse the mob; and the Earl representing the danger of leaving her person unguarded at that time (it being between ten and eleven o'clock at night) she answered, God would be her guard. The Earl being returned to his Office at the Cock-pit, where were also the Lord-Chancellor, the Duke of Newcastle, and some other Noblemen, he sent for Captain Horsey, an exempt, who then commanded the Guard, and ordered him to mount immediately, and disperse the mob. And, as the Captain was going out, the Earl whispered him, and bid him send a party

(1) Mr Maynwaring, in his letters to a friend in North-Britain, thus remarks on the Doctor's speech: "But now comes the great scope of the Doctor's performance, his own harangue at the bar of the House of Lords; and here, without entering into a particular examination of the whole piece, I cannot help professing, with some sorrow, that I think he was too hardly dealt with by those that made it for him, when they obliged him to aver, in the face of God and the Queen, that he had neither suggested, nor did in his conscience believe, that the Church is in the least peril from her Majesty's administration. If those men, he means Atterbury, Smalridge, Freind, Mof, &c. had been endowed with the least mercy, conscience, or humanity, they would never have put into his mouth such a choking provocation as this; and I cannot help taking his part against them upon this occasion, as abandoned a Priest as he is. When this holy man had, in his sermon at St Paul's, plainly shewn, How obvious it were to draw a parallel between the sad circumstances of the Church of England formerly, and of the Church of England at present, whose walls and inclosures are pulled down, and this pure spouse of Christ prostituted to more Adulterers than the scarlet whore in the Revelations. What could enter into the heads of these penmen of the speech, to make the poor wretch swear, that he had never suggested the church was in danger? With what indignation must every one hear such solemn appeals made to heaven, for the truth of a fact, which the whole assembly knew to be directly contrary? What excuse shall we find out for this most hardened sinner? Will it acquit him to say, that he did not compose his speech, and only performed his part like an actor: Indeed, it may be said to resemble a play in one respect, because it was a farce very well wrought, and had a wonderful effect on the weak part of his audience; the rest were amazed, continues Mr Maynwaring, they trembled at his oaths, when he called the Searcher of hearts to witness, in the most solemn and religious manner, as he expected to be acquitted before God and his Holy Angels, at that dreadful Tribunal, before which, not only he, but even their Lordships must appear, that he was far from designing to defame her Majesty's administration. Good God! And is this the man for whom the people have made an insurrection? Is this the man for whom their zeal has flamed out in all manner of appearance? Is this the man, whose effigies is sold about, curiously done in Mexa tinto, whose health is drank before the Queen's, and next in the same glass with that of the Church? What can he have to do with any Church, who is a shame to Christianity itself? And is this the man, for whom tears were shed, when, by his insolent behaviour, he had made that compassion ridiculous, which would otherwise have been due to one in his circumstances? How offensive was his assurance; how nauseous his presumption; and how atheistical was his purpose, in wickedly perverting divers texts of Scripture, instead of preaching the truths. He said, He had no intention to asperse the memory of his late Majesty; and he has been often heard to say, he ought to be De witied, of which I have myself seen an Affidavit, under the hand of Mr Eberal."

party to the Bank. Before the horse and foot-guards could reach Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, the Officers had notice, that the mob, which had gathered there, was returned to Drury-Lane, where they were making another bone-fire, with the furniture of Mr Earle's Meeting-House; whereupon the guards bent their march that way. At their approach most of the mob fled before them; and only one of their ring-leaders, George Purchase, a Bailiff (who had before been a Life-guard-man, but was dismissed for some misdemeanor) offered to make a stand, with a few of the most resolute of his followers, crying out for High-Church and Dr Sacheverel. From Drury-Lane the Guards marched towards the City, and met with some opposition near Fleet-Ditch from the mob, that were rising the Meeting-House in Black-Fryars; but having wounded some of the most daring, and secured others, the rest were soon scattered; and the Guards, patrolling all night, prevented any farther mischief. On the 2d of March, the horse and foot-guards at Whitehall and St James's were doubled; and the trained-bands at Woolminster under arms in divers posts, where they continued as long as Dr Sacheverel's trial was depending; which both lessened the number of the Mutineers (many of the trained-bands being men of low circumstances, hired by substantial house-keepers) and kept the rest in awe. The same day, the Commons resolved to address the Queen, to take effectual measures to suppress the present tumults, set on foot and fomented by Papists, Nonjurors, and other enemies to her Title and Government; and to issue out a Proclamation, promising a reward to such as should discover and seize those incendiaries, who had been the occasions of the late tumults and disorders. To this address the Queen answered, "That she was extremely sensible of the great care and concern of the House of Commons for the public peace upon this occasion; and, as she had a just resentment at these tumultuous and violent proceedings, so she would take immediate care for suppressing them, and would lose no time in endeavouring to find out the authors and abettors, in order to bring them to punishment, according to the desire of this House." The Commons, upon this answer, unanimously resolved to present an address, importing, "That they begged leave to return their most hearty thanks for her most gracious answer to their address, and for her effectual care in suppressing those rebellious tumults, which were set on foot and fomented by Papists, Nonjurors, and other enemies to her Title and Government, in defiance of the just prosecution of the Commons against Dr Henry Sacheverel. And they humbly besought her to believe, that as this prosecution proceeded only from the indispensable obligation, which her faithful Commons looked upon themselves to lie under, not to sit still, and patiently see the justice of the late happy Revolution, and the glory of their late Royal Deliverer reflected upon; her Majesty's undoubted Title struck at; her Administration, by which so many blessings were derived upon them, endeavoured to be rendered odious to the people, and represented as destructive of the Church and Constitution; that the present Establishment and Protestant Succession undermined; the resolutions of the Parliament treated with contempt; the Governors of the Church, and her Majesty, as supreme, asperfed and vilified; the Toleration exposed, as wicked; and sedition insolently invading the Pulpit: So the maintenance of her Majesty's Right, the safety of her Person, the quiet of her Government, the continuance of their happiness under her excellent Administration, the succession in the Protestant line, the support and honour of the Church of England, as established by law, with that Toleration, which was by act of Parliament allowed to Protestant Dissenters, should be their constant care and concern. And they would, upon all occasions, venture all that was dear to them, in defence of such inestimable blessings." It was moved, that in the first paragraph it might be suggested, that the rebellious tumults were set on foot and fomented by Republicans, as well as by Papists and Nonjurors; but the motion was rejected. The day before March 3, this address was presented, a proclamation was published for suppressing the tumults, pursuant to which several persons, who had been active, in the late riots, were apprehended, and committed to divers prisons, particularly George Purchase, the Bailiff; Daniel Damarce, one of the Queen's Watermen; and Francis Willis, a Footman; which three were some time after tried for high-treason; but, though the two first were sentenced to die, yet neither of them suffered. The remissness, in punishing so great a disorder, was looked on as the preparing and encouraging men to new tumults; and there was a secret management in the whole affair, that amazed all people.

When Dr Sacheverel had ended his defence, the Managers for the House of Commons replied, and shewed very evidently, that the words of his sermon could not reasonably bear any other sense, but that, for which they charged him. This was an easy performance, and they managed it with great strength and vivacity. But the humour of the town was turned against them, and all the Clergy appeared for the Doctor. Many of the Queen's Chaplains stood about him, encouraging and magnifying him; and it was given out, that the Queen herself favoured him, though upon Bishop Burnet's first coming to town, which was after the impeachment was brought up to the Lords, she said to him, that it was a bad sermon, and that he deserved well to be punished for it.

Sir John Holt, Lord-Chief-Justice of the Queen's Bench, died during the trial of the Doctor, upon the 6th of March. He was very learned in the law, and had, upon great occasions, shewed an intrepid zeal in asserting its authority; for he ventured on the indignation of both houses of Parliament by turns, when he thought the law was with him. He was a man of good judgment and great integrity, and set himself with great application to the functions of that important post. Sir Thomas Parker was immediately made Lord-Chief-Justice in his room. This great promotion seemed an evident demonstration of the Queen's approving the prosecution; for none of the Managers had treated the Doctor so severely as he had done; yet secret whippers were very confidently set about, that though the Queen's affairs put her upon 1709-10. upon acting the part of one, who was pleased with this scene, yet he disliked it all, and would take the first occasion to shew it.

On the 10th of March the Earl of Nottingham said, that he had something to propose; and the Lords being adjourned to their House, he started an unexpected question, "Whether in prosecutions by impeachments for high-crimes and misdemeanors, by writing or speaking, the particular words, supposed to be criminal, are necessary to be expressly specified in such impeachments?" After some debate, the Lords resolved to consult the Judges, who very readily delivered their unanimous opinions, "That, according to law, the grounds of an indictment or impeachment ought to be expressly mentioned in both." Those, who were for punishing Dr Sacheverel, were not a little surprised at this unforeseen difficulty, which was of no less consequence, than to annul the whole prosecution, and to make it necessary for the Commons to begin anew, which they could not expect to have time to do. But it being suggested, that the Judges had delivered their opinion according to the rules of Westminster-hall, and not according to the usage of Parliament, the Lords at last resolved, "That in impeachments they were to proceed according to the laws of the land, and the law and usage of Parliaments;" and, upon searching the journals of the House for precedents, they found a parallel instance to that of Dr Sacheverel's impeachment, which was that of Dr Maynwaring in King Charles I's Reign, wherein the words, for which he was impeached, were not expressly mentioned in the articles. Whereupon it was voted, after some debate, "That by the law and usage of Parliaments in prosecutions by impeachments for high-crimes and misdemeanors, by writing or speaking, the particular words, supposed to be criminal, are not necessary to be expressly specified in such impeachments." Against which resolution many Lords entered their protest.

On the 16th of March, the Queen went incognito to the House of Lords, where a motion being made to declare, "That the Commons had made good the first article against Dr Sacheverel," a warm debate arose. The Earl of Wharton, who spoke first, said, "There is a different strain between the Doctor's sermon and his speech; the speech is a full confutation and condemnation of the sermon. All he has advanced about non-resistance and unlimited obedience, is ridiculous and false; as is also his distinguishing in the affair of the Revolution, in which there was notorious resistance in the association begun at Exeter, and in the seizing of York and Oxford gates, and breaking the bridge. The doctrine of passive obedience, as pressed by the Doctor, is not reconcilable to the practice of Churchmen. If the Revolution is not lawful, many in that House, and vast numbers without, were guilty of blood, murder, rapine, and injustice; and the Queen herself is no lawful Queen, since the best title she had to the Crown, was her Parliamentary title, founded on the Revolution." The Lord Haversham made a long speech in answer to this; and the Lord Ferrers endeavoured likewise to excuse the Doctor, alledging, "That the Revolution was not mentioned in his sermon: That nothing but plain matter of fact should ground such a solemn accusation: That, if the Doctor were guilty of some foolish unguarded expressions, he ought to have been tried in Westminster-hall: But he doubted, whether even in the inferior Courts there would be sufficient matter to convict him." He was supported by the Earl of Scarborough, who said, the Revolution was a nice point, and above the law; and moved, that they should adjourn the debate, and take time to consider, before they gave their judgment.

The Lord Haversham having reflected on some Bishops voting contrary to their doctrines, Dr Talbot, Bishop of Oxford, took from thence occasion to speak on the other side. But Dr Hooper, Bishop of Bath and Wells, endeavoured to excuse Dr Sacheverel; "he allowed, indeed, of what the Bishop of Oxford had advanced, about the necessity and legality of resistance in some extraordinary cases; but was of opinion, that this ought to be kept from the knowledge of the people, who are naturally too apt to resist; and that the opposite doctrine ought rather to be maintained and enforced. That the Revolution was not to be boasted of, and made a precedent; but we ought to throw a mantle over it, and rather call it a Vacancy or Abdication: And the Original Compact were two very dangerous words, not to be mentioned without a great deal of caution. That they, who examined the Revolution too nicely, were no friends to it; for, at that rate, the Crown would roll like a ball, and never be fixed." He concluded, "That there seemed to be a necessity to preach up Non-resistance and Passive Obedience at that time, when resistance was justified." The Duke of Argyle, who spoke on the other side, said, among other things, "That the Clergy, in all ages, have delivered up the rights and liberties of the People, and preached up the King's power, in order to govern him; and therefore they ought not to be suffered to meddle with politics." The Earl of Anglesey answered to this, "That political sermons were sometimes necessary, and allowed on the 30th of January, and other occasions. As to the Revolution, which was the chief matter now in debate (he said) the vacancy of the Throne was properly the thing; and therefore the mentioning necessary means, was mere nonsense in the Doctor; and he would not find him guilty for nonsense; the rather, because the doctrine of resistance, which the Doctor had confuted, justifies rebellion, murder, and all manner of crimes." The Duke of Leeds who spoke on the same side, made a very long speech, wherein he owned, "he had a great share in the late Revolution, but said, he never thought, that things would have gone so far, as to settle the Crown on the Prince of Orange, whom he had often heard say, that he had no such thoughts himself. That they ought to distinguish between Resistance and Revolution; for Vacancy or Abdication was the thing they went upon, and therefore Resistance was to be forgot; for, had it not succeeded, it had certainly been rebellion; since he knew of no other but hereditary right." Upon this the Bishop of Salisbury made a speech, "wherein he shewed the falshood of an opinion too commonly received, that the Church of Eng-

1709-10. "land had always condemned Resistance, even in the cases of extreme tyranny. The books of the Maccabees, bound up in our bibles, and approved by our articles, as containing examples of life and instruction of manners, though not as any part of the Canon of the Scripture, contained a full and clear precedent for resisting and shaking off extreme tyranny. The Jews, under that brave family, not only defended themselves against Antiochus, but formed themselves into a free and new Government: Our homilies were only against wilful rebellion, such as had been against our Kings, while they were governing by law. But, at that very time, Queen Elizabeth had afflicted, first the Scots, and then the French, and to the end of her days continued to protect the States, who not only resisted, but, as the Maccabees had done, shook off the Spanish yoke, and set up a new form of Government. In all this she was not only justified by the best writers of that time, such as Jewel and Bilson, but was approved and supported in it. Both her Parliaments and Convocations gave her subsidies to carry on those wars. The same principles were kept up all King James's Reign. In the beginning of King Charles's Reign he protected the Rockellers, and asked supplies from the Parliament, to enable him to do it effectually, and ordered a fast and prayers to be made for them. It is true, soon after that, new notions of absolute power, derived from God to Kings, were taken up: At the first rise given to these by Maynwaring, they were condemned by a sentence of the Lords; and though he submitted, and retracted his opinion, yet a severe censure passed upon him. But, during the long discontinuance of Parliaments that followed, this Doctrine was more favoured: It was generally preached up, and many things were done pursuant to it, which put the Nation into the great convulsions, that followed in our civil wars. After these were over, it was natural to return to the other extreme, as Courts naturally favoured such Doctrines. King James trusted too much to it; yet the very asserters of that Doctrine were the first, who pleaded for Resistance, when they thought they needed it."

Several other Peers, particularly the Duke of Devonshire, the Lord-Chancellor, and the Lords Sommers, Hallifax, and Mobun, spoke also in vindication of the late Revolution; and maintained, that in extraordinary cases Resistance is necessary and lawful; and concluded, that the Commons had made good the first article. The Archbishop of York, the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Nottingham and Rochester, the Lords Guernsey, Norib and Grey, and Caermarthen, and the Bishops of London, Rochester, and Landaff, who spoke on the other side, declared, "That they never read such a piece of madness and nonsense, as Dr Sacheverel's sermon, but did not think him guilty of a misdemeanor." After a long debate, which lasted till past nine in the evening, it was at last carried by a majority of nineteen, that the Commons had made good their first article of impeachment against him.

The next day, March 17, the Lords took into consideration the second article of the Commons impeachment, and Dr Wake, Bishop of Lincoln, began the debate with a speech, wherein he gave an account of the design of a Comprehension set on foot, towards the end of King James II's Reign, by Archbishop Sancroft, and promoted by the most eminent Divines of the Church of England, particularly Dr Patrick, late Bishop of Ely, and Dr Sharpe, the present Archbishop of York, and the Bishops of London and Ely, which was, "to improve, and, if possible, to enforce our Discipline, to review and enlarge our Liturgy, by correcting some things, and adding others; and by leaving some few indifferent ceremonies, in order to reconcile Dissenters to the Church. That Dr Sacheverel had made a strange and false representation of this design, which was again set on foot, and openly espoused by King William and Queen Mary, but which unhappily miscarried." He then proceeded to offer such passages out of Dr Sacheverel's sermon, as plainly and fully made out the second article of the Commons impeachment, including, "That somewhat should be done to put a stop to such preaching, as, if not timely corrected, may kindle such heats and animosities among us, as may truly endanger both our Church and State. As for the Preacher himself, I am (said the Bishop) very willing to come into any measures of favour to him, that are consistent with your Lordships honour and justice, and will answer the ends of the impeachment, that has been brought before us against him." Dr Trinnell, Bishop of Norwich, enforced what the Bishop of Lincoln had said, about Toleration; "invighed against the insolence of Dr Sacheverel, who had arraigned Archbishop Grindall (one of the eminent Reformers in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth) as a perfidious Prelate, for favouring and tolerating the Genevian Discipline; checked his presumption, in taking upon him, in his sermon, to prescribe rules to his Superiors, by telling them when they are to thunder out their anathemas against Schismatics; shewed, that the proper use of those spiritual weapons is to suppress vice, immorality, and profaneness, among the members of the Church; and that they were altogether useless to convince Heretics or Schismatics, who are rather to be won by gentle methods and Christian forbearance. And to that purpose his Lordship took notice of the good effects of the Toleration act; and mentioned several instances wherein he had himself been instrumental in reconciling Dissenters to the Church. I shall not take upon me (said he in the conclusion) to charge the Doctor, or any of his particular friends, with this practice (meaning the late tumults) as great temptation as one is under to do so from several circumstances. And it is not the least, that occurs in his prayers, which he has published on this occasion, to represent, not so much to God, as to the World, that he is under persecution, when he is prosecuted for offending against the law, by those, who, in common justice, ought to be thought the fairest accusers, and, before your Lordships, who are justly acknowledged to be the most impartial Judges. However, I will never believe, till I cannot avoid it, that any Members of the Church of England, who have acknowledged the Government, much less any Clergyman, who has so often professed his obedience to it in Church and State, should have been any way

1709-10. "way accessory to these threatnings, that have been given out, particularly against such Bishops, as should happen to condemn the Doctor's proceedings. As far, my Lords, as I have seen of this cause, I am likely to be one of those Bishops; and, though I do not pretend to any great share of courage, I am very free to declare to your Lordships, that I am in no comparison so apprehensive of what may befall myself for condemning this person, as I am of what will probably befall the public, if your Lordships should not condemn him. However, I wish he may be treated with all possible moderation; and that the evilsome severities, he recommends in his sermon, may not be used against him. But that is in your Lordships judgment, to which I

"humbly submit it; and only beg pardon for having detained your Lordships so long in giving my reasons, why I think the Commons have made good this second part of their charge." No Peer offering to speak in favour of the Doctor, it was voted, That the Commons had made good the second article of their impeachment. The party, that was for the Doctor, made no opposition to the third, and but little to the fourth. They contented themselves with protesting against them, as they had done against the two first. The four articles being thus voted to be proved, the Lords went down to the Hall, when the Question being put upon the whole impeachment, Guilty or not Guilty, the Doctor was voted not Guilty by fifty-two*, and Guilty by sixty-nine† (1). (1) The proceedings of the Peers more at large were as follows:

In relation to the third article, the Lord Hallifax made a short speech, and was answered by the Lord Ferrers and the Earl of Nottingham. The fourth article occasioned a longer debate, which was begun by the Earl of Wharton, in the commendation of the present administration. The Bishop of Salisbury seconded him, and spoke with vehemence against Dr Sacheverel, 'who, by inveighing against the Revolution, Toleration, and Union, seemed to arraign and attack the Queen herself, since her Majesty had so great a share in the first, and had often declared, that she would maintain the second; and that she looked upon the third as the most glorious event of her reign. That nothing could be more plain than his reflecting on her Majesty's Ministers; and that he had in particular so well marked out a noble Peer there present, by an ugly and scurrilous epithet* (which he would not repeat) that it was not possible to mistake him.' Upon this some of the younger Peers fell a laughing, and cried out, name him, name him; but the Lord Chancellor interposed, declaring, 'That no Peer was obliged to say but what he thought fit.' The Lord Ferrers said something in favour of Dr Sacheverel, but was answered by the Earl of May; and then the Lord Haverham made a short speech about that part of the fourth article, wherein Dr Sacheverel was charged with wresting and perverting divers passages of Scripture. He said, 'No man on earth has authority to interpret the scripture; which, he thought, must be interpreted by itself: Since the Reformation, we had contended against the Church of Rome, who pretended to that authority: And shall we (added he) allow infallibility in the Commons, which we deny to the Pope of Rome?' And in conclusion he repeated his desire, that the reverend Prelates there present would tell the House, 'How Dr Sacheverel could be charged with wresting the scripture?' But none of the Bishops offered to satisfy him. The Duke of Hamilton having said something in favour of the Doctor, he was answered by the Lord Mohun. The Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Ferrers, the Earls of Scarfdale and Abingdon, and the Lord Caermarthen, endeavoured likewise to extenuate the Doctor's offences, but it was voted that the Commons had made good the fourth article of the impeachment. However, thirty-eight Lords entered their dissent to the question upon the second, third, and fourth articles. At the close of the debate, the Earl of Wharton said, 'That since the House had resolved, 'That the Commons had made good their four articles of impeachment against Dr Sacheverel,' the Lords ought, by a necessary consequence, to resolve and declare likewise, That the Doctor was guilty of the High Crimes and Misdemeanors charged upon him. But the Earls of Abingdon and Rochester, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord North and Grey, and the Lord Ferrers, starting some difficulties, it was proposed, that the Question to be asked every Lord in Westminster-hall should be as follows: 'That the Commons having made good the several articles of the impeachment against Henry Sacheverel, Doctor in Divinity; the said Doctor Henry Sacheverel is guilty of High Crimes and Misdemeanors.'

Accordingly, on the 18th of March, the question being read, the Earl of Rochester moved, that the Judges should be consulted; but no Peer seconding that motion, the Lord Guernsey said, 'The question, as stated, was not fit to be put in Westminster-hall, because it would subvert the constitution of Parliament, and preclude the Peers from their right of giving their judgment, both of the fact, as well as of the law. For in this case some Peers might be satisfied as to the fact, but not as to the law, and if they were to give their judgment as the question was stated, their freedom of voting would be taken away. Therefore he moved, 'That the first part of the proposed question be left out.' The Lord North and Grey, who spoke next, said, 'There is no necessity of putting the question in Westminster-hall, but only acquainting the Commons there, that Dr Sacheverel is guilty in general: For how can any Peer, that thinks him not guilty (as for my part, I don't) say in the face of the Commons, he is not guilty, and allow at the same time, that the Commons have made good their articles of impeachment?' The Earl of Wharton said, 'He wondered at the Lord Guernsey's making that motion, after the 1710. The next debate was, what censure ought to pass upon him. And here a strange turn appeared; some seemed to apprehend the effects of a popular fury, if the censure was severe; to others it was said, the Queen desired it might be mild; it was therefore proposed to suspend him from preaching for one year, others were for seven years; but by a vote it was fixed to three years. It was next moved, that he should be incapable of all preferments during these three years; upon that the House was divided, fifty-nine were for the vote, and sixty against it; so that was laid aside. The sermons were ordered to be burnt in the Presence of the Lord-Mayor and the Sheriffs of London, which was done; March 27. only the Lord-Mayor being a Member of the House the House had come to a resolution, that the Commons had made good their articles. The question, as stated by the Lord Chancellor, did not preclude any Peer from his right of giving his judgment; for every Lord was at liberty to protest and enter his dissent, if he would not be convinced by the majority of the House; and that the Lords, being in the nature of a jury, ought to deliver their opinions separatim. The Lord Ferrers supported the Lord Guernsey's motion, objecting against the preamble of the question as unnecessary, and urging, that it was only the majority of the House, and not the House, that came to a Resolution, 'That the Commons had made good their impeachment.' On the other hand, the Lord Guernsey, in answer to the Earl of Wharton, said, 'That the Lords were not as a jury, for every Lord was both a judge and a juror; that some Peers might think Dr Sacheverel guilty of one part, and innocent of the other; and yet if they were to give their judgment, as this question was stated, how could they say he was not guilty, when the preamble set forth, that the Commons had made good their impeachment?' The Earl of Wharton replied, 'That this objection had been much more proper before the House had proceeded so far.' However the Earl of Rochester having moved, that the preamble be left out, the Earl of Wharton and the rest agreed to it; and the Lord Chancellor stated the question thus: 'That the question to be put to each Lord in Westminster-hall, beginning at the junior Baron first, shall be, Is Dr Henry Sacheverel guilty of High Crimes and Misdemeanors?' The Earl of Nottingham moved, that the words of High Crimes and Misdemeanors be left out, and was seconded by the Lord North and Grey. But the Earl of Wharton said, 'That what was offered was unfair; for the Commons having impeached Dr Sacheverel of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, and the Lords having agreed and resolved, that the Commons had made good the impeachment, it necessarily followed, that he was guilty of the said Crimes and Misdemeanors.' To moderate the matter, the Duke of Buckingham proposed, that the question be thus altered, of the Crimes and Misdemeanors charged upon him by the Impeachment; to which the Earls of Wharton and Sunderland readily agreed; but the Earl of Jersey excepted against the question, as being complex or complicated. The Lord Guernsey pursued the same objection, for the reason he alleged before, viz. 'That some Peers might think Dr Sacheverel guilty of some of the crimes charged upon him by the impeachment of the Commons, and innocent of the other; and urged an instance of an indictment concerning several charges, in which case the jury is not to answer generally, but particularly to each offence, because the judge goes by the verdict, and imposes the fine accordingly.' Therefore his Lordship moved, That each Peer should give his Judgment severally to each article. To this the Lord Sommers answered, 'That the matter of fact was already settled, though every Peer might protest and dissent: That the Lord Guernsey's objection, grounded on the instance he brought of indictments in the courts below, was very improper, because, as his Lordship himself had suggested, the Lords are both Judges and Jury. That, as Jury, they might, in conscience, pronounce the Doctor guilty, though they thought him guilty only of one article: But that the Lords, who did not think him guilty of all the four articles, might, afterwards, as Judges, moderate the punishment.' The Earl of Nottingham replied, 'That, for his part, he thought Dr Sacheverel guilty of no crime;' and moved, that the particle the be left out, and the question put thus; Is Dr Henry Sacheverel guilty of high Crimes and Misdemeanors charged upon him by the impeachment? Which was agreed to.

Then it being proposed to consider what answer each Lord should give, the Lord Halifax said, 'That according to the usage of Parliament, the Lords ought to answer, content, or not content. But the Lord Ferrers alleged, That content, or not content, was not an adequate answer to the question: And both the Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Guernsey, his brother, urged, 'That there were several precedents for guilty, or not guilty upon my honour; but did not remember any for content, or not content. The Lord Halifax maintained his assertion, and said, he wondered, the Lord Nottingham did not know there were precedents for content or not content; and instanced in the Lord Sommers's trial, in which the Lords gave their Judgment that way. On the other hand, the Lord Guernsey insisted upon answering guilty or not guilty; and was seconded by the Lord Treasurer, who said, 'That there was a difference between the Lords voting in their House promiscuously, sometimes in confusion, and their giving their judgments in Westminster-Hall; and that the precedent mentioned by the Lord Halifax was an extraordinary one, made in an extraordinary case.' The Lord Halifax moved for searching the Journals; and the Earl of Wharton for following precedents. The Clerk turned to, and read the precedent of the Lord Sommers's impeachment, in which the Peers gave their judgment by content or not content. But the Earl of Rochester desiring, that other precedents might be searched, and urging, that there was a difference between the Lords voting in their House and in Westminster-Hall; the Duke of Buckingham answered, 'That the trial was the same in Westminster-Hall, as if the Lords were in their House; that they removed to the Hall only for the spaciousness of the place: And therefore the question ought to be answered, as if they were in the House, content or not content.' To this the Earl of Ilay replied, 'That content, or not content, was a very improper and ungrammatical answer to the question, Is Dr Sacheverel guilty of high crimes, &c. And therefore either the question ought to be altered, or the answer be, guilty or not guilty.' Then the Lord Ferrers endeavoured to shew the inconveniences, that might attend the putting the question, as proposed, alleging, 'That some of the Peers there present, might hereafter be impeached, and repent too late having made such a precedent of giving judgment generally.' The Earl of Anglesey pursued the same argument; adding, that if the question was put, and answered generally, the majority of the people would not know what the Doctor was condemned for. To which the Lord Chancellor readily replied, 'That every body would know he was either guilty or not guilty of the crimes charged on him by the impeachment of the House of Commons.' But the Earl of Mar insisted, 'That every Peer ought to be at liberty to vote, guilty or not guilty to every article; otherwise it might happen, that the majority of the House might think Dr Sacheverel innocent upon each article; yet, by this method of a general answer, he might be condemned of all; which seemed inconsistent with the usual method of justice in that House.' The Duke of Buckingham urged on the same side, 'that, since the judgment of the House in this case ought to be a declaration 1710. House of Commons, did not think he was bound to be present (1).

The Oxford decree voted to be burnt.
Fr. H. L. With Sacheverel's Sermons, the famous decree of the University of Oxford passed in their Convocation, July 21, 1683, was, at the same time, voted by the Lords to be burnt, as containing several positions contrary to the Constitution of the Kingdom, and destructive to the Protestant Succession. This decree had been given in evidence by the Doctor at his trial, in which the absolute authority of Princes, and unalterableness of the hereditary right of succeeding to the Crown, were asserted in a very high strain.

Sacheverel's collections, and other books burnt.
Fr. H. C. The Commons also, upon a complaint made to them of a book intitled, Collections of passages referred to by Dr Sacheverel, in his answer to the articles of his impeachment, ordered the same to be burnt. On the other hand, the Doctor's friends complained to the House, of a book intitled, The Rights of the Christian Church, &c. and a defence of it, in two parts, with a letter from a Country Attorney to a Country Parson, concerning the Rights of the Church; and Le Clerc's judgment of that book in his Bibliothèque Choisie. All which were condemned to the flames; as was also a Treatise of the word Person, by John Clendon of the Inner-Temple. Not content with this, the Tories moved for an address for a Fast, to deprecate the divine vengeance, which there was just reason to fear, on account of the horrid

claration of the law, the condition of the people would be most miserable, to have punishment for High Crimes and Misdemeanors, and not have a probability of informing themselves, what the crimes thereby punished were, which they could not learn from this general determination: And that, this uncertainty being in the case of a Clergyman for preaching, it might create some fears in good men, when they preach some doctrines of the Church of England, particularly that of Non-Resistance. The Earl of Sunderland calling for the question, the Earl of Anglesey insisted on the inconveniencies of answering generally to it. Whereupon the Lord Chancellor mentioned four inconveniencies that might ensue: 'First, That Clergymen would know, that to preach against the Revolution, was a High Crime and Misdemeanor: Secondly, To preach against the Toleration: Thirdly, Against the Union: And, Fourthly, That to reflect on the Queen's Ministers, and suggest, that the Church is in danger under her Majesty's administration, were likewise High Crimes and Misdemeanors. These, said his Lordship, are the only inconveniencies, that I can foresee, will attend this judgment.' The Earl of Wharton calling then for the question, the Duke of Shrewsbury said, 'That he did not think the Doctor guilty of the first article, though he had as great a share as any man in the late Revolution, and would ever go as far as any to vindicate the memory of our late glorious Deliverer. That he thought the Church safe under her Majesty's Administration; but he would not have it made a High Crime and Misdemeanor to say, That the Church is in danger, because times might come, when it might really be in danger.' And, in conclusion, his Grace insisted on voting article by article. The Lord Caermarthen, the Earl of Anglesey, and the Earl of Nottingham did the like; but, the same being opposed by some other Peers, the Lord Chancellor at last proposed this question, 'Whether the answer to be given by each Lord should be guilty or not guilty only? Which being resolved in the affirmative, then the main question was put, Whether it should be asked, Is Henry Sacheverel, Doctor in Divinity, guilty of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, charged upon him by the Impeachment of the House of Commons? This was likewise carried in the Affirmative; when four and thirty Lords entered their protest, importing, in substance, 'That the obliging every Lord to answer generally guilty or not guilty, to a question containing all the articles of his impeachment, was a kind of taking upon themselves by an unnecessary joining of matters of a different nature, and subjecting them to one and the same determination; and consequently, might prejudice the right every Peer had to give a free affirmative or negative; since whoever thought Dr Sacheverel guilty of one part, and innocent of the other, would be obliged either to approve what he condemned, or condemn what he approved. 2. They conceived, there was at least a possibility, that tho' a majority of the House was admitted to vote the articles separately, and might think him innocent Numb. LXIII. Vol. IV.

upon each article; yet, by this method of a general answer, he might be condemned of all; which seemed not to be consistent with the usual method of justice in this House. 3. That since the judgment of the House, in this case, ought to be a declaration of the law; the condition of the people would be most miserable, to have punishment inflicted for High Crimes and Misdemeanors, and not have a possibility of informing themselves, what the High Crimes and Misdemeanors, thereby punished, are. For the people's only guide is the law; and they can never be guided by what they can never be informed of. And that, this uncertainty being in the case of a Clergyman for preaching, it might create some fear in good men, when they preach some doctrines of the Church of England, particularly that of Non-Resistance; and might be made use of by ill ones, as an excuse for the neglect of that duty, which upon some occasions is required.'

On the 20th of March, about three o'clock in the afternoon, the Lords and Commons having taken their respective seats, and their Lordships House being resumed, the Lord Chancellor declared, that they had agreed upon a question to be put to each Lord severally. And then his Lordship having put the question, beginning at the junior Baron first, sixty-nine Lords declared Dr Sacheverel guilty, and fifty two not guilty. The Lord Chancellor, having cast up the votes, declared Dr Sacheverel guilty; and the Usher of the Black-rod having brought the Doctor to the bar, and caused him to kneel down, the Lord Chancellor told him, that the Lords having, with their usual candour and equity, examined and considered the articles exhibited against him, with the allegations to make good the same, and what had been offered by his counsel and himself in his defence, had found him guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors charged upon him by the Commons of Great Britain. Then the Doctor, standing up, made a short speech, importing, 'That not having been suffered to be at their Lordships bar, while their Lordships were giving their votes; he hoped he might now be permitted to put in a plea, before their Lordships passed sentence upon him. That he was advised by his Counsel to offer, first, That, by the opinion of all the Judges, the particular words, supposed to be criminal, ought to have been expressly specified in the articles of impeachment against him. Secondly, That, in the title of the said articles, the same were said to be exhibited in the name of all the Commons of Great-Britain, and yet the Commissioners of Shires, who make part of the Commons of Great-Britain, were not mentioned with the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled. Both which he begged their Lordships to take into consideration.' The Lords, being returned to their House, considered of the Doctor's plea; and resolved, that the same was frivolous, and that they would the next day consider what censure to pass upon him. Pr. H. L.

(1) The sentence passed upon him was, That Henry Sacheverel, Doctor in Divinity, shall be, and is hereby enjoined not to preach during the term of three years

1710. rid blasphemies lately published in the Kingdom. Those who supported this motion, thought not only to cast a reflection on the Whigs, as encouragers of such writings, but also to justify what the Doctor had advanced in his sermon about the danger of the Church, which he had ascribed to the heretical and blasphemous positions lately printed. But their design was easily seen through, and therefore the majority added to the address, "many of which blasphemies" have again, in a most irregular, extraordinary, and insolent manner been printed, published, and dispersed, throughout the Kingdom, to the scandal of good Christians, by "Dr Henry Sacheverel." Upon this addition the Tories would have dropped the address, but it was presented to the Queen, who, probably, on that account answered, "That, a fast having lately been observed, she did not think proper to appoint another so soon, but would consider of it at a more convenient time."

As soon as it was known what a mild sentence the Lords had passed upon Dr Sacheverel, those, who supported him during his trial, expressed an inconceivable gladness, as if they had got a victory; bone-fires, illuminations, and other marks of joy, appeared not only in London, but over the whole Kingdom. However, much greater effects than these rejoicings were produced by it, as will hereafter be seen.

The affair being over, and the Supplies all granted, besides which little more was done this Session (1), the Queen, on the 5th of April, came to the House of Peers, and made the following speech to both houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"IT is with great satisfaction, that I come hither at this time, to return you my hearty thanks for the marks of duty and affection,

"which you have given me through the whole course of this Session.

"And I am to thank you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, in a very particular manner for the great dispatch, which you have made in providing, so early in the year, such great and effectual supplies for the public service. This cannot but make me very desirous to repeat the assurances I gave you at the opening of the Session, that they should be very carefully applied to the uses, for which you have designed them.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I cannot sufficiently express to you my great concern, that you have had so necessary an occasion of taking up a great part of your time towards the latter end of this Session.

"I am confident no Prince, that ever sat on the throne, has been more really and sincerely kind to the Church than myself, nor ever had a more true and tender concern for its welfare and prosperity than I have, and always shall continue to have.

"The suppressing immorality, and profane and other wicked and malicious libels, is what I have always earnestly recommended, and shall be glad of the first opportunity to give my consent to any laws, that might effectually conduce to that end. But, this being an evil complained of in all times, it is very injurious to take a pretence from thence to innuendate, that the Church is in any danger from its immorality.

"I could heartily wish, that men would study to be quiet, and do their own business, rather than busy themselves in reviving questions and disputes of a very high nature, and which must be with an ill intention, since they

years next ensuing. That Dr Henry Sacheverel's two printed sermons, referred to by the impeachment of the House of Commons, shall be burnt before the Royal Exchange in London, between the hours of twelve and one, on Monday, the 27th day of this instant March, by the hands of the common hangman, in the presence of the Lord-Mayor of the City of London, and the two Sheriffs of London and Middlesex.

The Lord-Mayor, who was not a little mortified at his being, by the Lords sentence, obliged to assist at the burning of a sermon, which he had approved, and commanded to be printed (as Dr Sacheverel asserted in the Dedication) desired and moved, that he might be excused from attending at the Execution, he being a Member of the House: And a debate arising, it was deferred till the House was informed what answer the Lord-Mayor had returned to the Sheriffs, when they should demand of him, whether he would attend, or not; and so that business was dropped.

(1) During the trial, a bill was ordered to be brought in for limiting the number of Officers, military or civil, in the House of Commons. Mr Wortley Montague was Chairman of the Grand Committee, and General Stanhope, and other leading men of the Whig party, promoted it. It passed the House of Commons, but was rejected by the House of Lords; where not only the Earl of Wharton, but the Earl of Scarborough, and the Lord North and Grey spoke against it. The House of Commons, having examined the subject-matter of the petition of the Creditors of the Mine-Adventurers, resolved unanimously, March 31, "That Sir Humphry Mackworth, Deputy-Governor of the Mine-Adventurers, was guilty of many notorious and scandalous frauds, and indirect practices, in violation of the Charter granted to the said Company, in breach of his trust, and to the manifest wrong and oppression of the Proprietors and Creditors of the said Company: And, that he might not run away, a bill was ordered to be brought in, "to prevent Sir Humphry Mackworth leaving this Kingdom, and alienating his estate, till the end of the next Session of Parliament." This Gentleman had written several Pamphlets as well as Devotional tracts, and was for many years of great note with the High-Party. For which reason, on the change of the Ministry, nothing more was heard of his proceedings.

A bill was also brought in for settling the African trade, but was not brought to perfection.

Some of the French Refugees settled in England, petitioned the House of Commons, that as the French Protestants were by the French King declared to be outlawed, and excluded from claiming any inheritance in France, and as, on the contrary, many persons living in France did frequently claim here and inherit the estates of their deceased relations, to the prejudice of the remoter relations settled in her Majesty's dominions; they begged leave for a bill "to preclude the subjects of the French King, residing in his dominions, from claiming any estates of their relations dying in her Majesty's dominions." Mr Hampden brought in a bill for this purpose; but upon the private suggestions of some eminent French Protestants, that it would be prejudicial to themselves and other Refugees, who from time to time received considerable remittances from their relations in France, the bill was dropped.

"For my own part, as it has pleased God to give success to my endeavours for the Union of my two Kingdoms, which I must ever esteem as one of the greatest blessings of my Reign; so I hope his divine goodness will still continue favourable, and make me the happy instrument of that yet more desirable union of the hearts of all my people in the bonds of mutual affection, that so there may remain no other contention among you, but who shall exceed the other in contributing to advance our present happiness, and secure the Protestant Succession.

"Finding by the advices from abroad, that our army has not yet taken the field, and that the Plenipotentiaries of France are still in Holland, I think it proper at present to make the Prorogation but for a very short time."

Accordingly the Lord-Chancellor prorogued the Parliament only to the 18th of April, when it was farther prorogued.

The Queen's expressing thus her concern, that there was a cause given for what had taken up so much time, and her wishing that all her people would be quiet and mind their own business, rather than employ themselves in reviving such disputes, seemed to look a different way from what had been whispered about. But soon after her proceedings (as will be seen) revived those whispers again.

As the Bishop of Sarum had been encouraged, this winter, by the Queen, to speak more freely to her of her affairs, than he had formerly ventured to do, he told her what reports were secretly spread of her through the Nation, as if she favoured the design of bringing the Pretender to succeed to the Crown, upon a bargain that she should hold it during her life: He was sure these reports were spread about by persons, who were in the confidence of those, that were believed to know her mind: He was well assured, the Jacobites of Scotland had, upon her coming to the Crown, sent up one Ogilby of Boyne, who was in great esteem among them, to propose the bargain to her; he, when he went back, gave the party full assurances that she accepted of it; This, he said, he had from some of the Lords of Scotland, who were then in the secret with the professed Jacobites. The Earl of Cromarty made a speech in parliament contradicting this, and, alluding, to the distinction of the Calvinists, made between the secret and the revealed will of God; he assured them, the Queen had no secret will contrary to that she declared: Yet, at the same time, his brother gave the party assurances to the contrary. The Bishop told the Queen all this, and said, if she was capable of making such a bargain for herself, by which her people were to be delivered up and sacrificed after her death, as it would darken all the glory of her Reign, so it must set all her people to consider of the most proper ways of securing themselves, by bringing over the Protestant Successors, in which he told her plainly he would concur, if she did not take effectual means to extinguish those jealousies. He said, her Ministers had served her with that fidelity, and such success, that her making a change among them would amaze all the world.

The glory of Queen Elizabeth's Reign arose from the firmness of her Councils, and the continuance of her Ministers, as the three last Reigns, in which the Ministry was often changed, had suffered extremely by it. He also shewed her, that, if she suffered the Pretender's party to prepare the nation for his succeeding her, she ought not to imagine, that, when they thought they had fixed that matter, they would stay for the natural end of her life, but that they would find ways to shorten it; Nor did he think, it was to be doubted, but that in 1708, when the Pretender was upon the sea, they had some Affairs here, who, upon the news of his landing, would have tried to dispatch her. It was certain, that their interest led them to it, as it was known that their principles did allow of it. This, with a great deal more to the same purpose, the Bishop laid before the Queen, who heard him patiently, and, for the most part, silently; however, by what she said, she seemed desirous to make him think, she agreed to what he had represented to her; but he found afterwards it had no effect upon her; for she soon began the change of the Ministry, by the introduction of the Duke of Shrewsbury, and dismissal of the Earl of Sunderland, as will be related.

It is now time to take a view of the transactions abroad, particularly in relation to the negotiations for peace, which seemed to be prosecuted with warmth.

The treaty at the Hague the last year having proved fruitless, the French Court thought proper to make new overtures of peace. In the beginning of January 1710, the Marquis de Torcy sent another project to Mr Pelkum, Resident of Holstein, consisting of the five following articles;

I. Immediately after the signing of the peace, the French King would acknowledge King Charles as King of the whole Monarchy of Spain; and not only withdraw all the succours he had given his Grandson, but also forbear sending him any assistance for the future, and forbid his subjects to lift in his service; and consent likewise, that no part of the Monarchy of Spain should ever be united to France.

II. As for the Emperor and Empire, the French King would restore Strasburg and Brisac; content himself with Alsatia, according to the literal sense of the treaty of Munster; leave the Empire Landau; raze the fortifications he had built on the Rhine from Basil to Phillipsburg; and acknowledge both the King of Prussia and the Elector of Hanover.

III. As to England, he would acknowledge Queen Anne, and the Succession in the Protestant line; restore Newfoundland, and agree to a mutual restitution of all, that had been taken in the West-Indies on both sides; demolish the fortifications of Dunkirk, and ruin the harbour thereof; and consent to the Pretender's leaving France.

IV. As to the States-General, he would yield to them for a barrier all the places specified in the twenty-second article of the Preliminaries, and confirm what he had offered to them with respect to their trade.

V. As to the Duke of Savoy, that he was willing to grant the Demands made for him by the the Allies; but that he likewise demanded, that the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria should be restored to their estates and dignities.

This project being rejected by the Allies, the French resolved to make other overtures, and dispatched a Cabinet-Courier to the Hague with a letter from the Marquis de Torcy to Peikum. The Courier arrived the 2d of February, N. S. at the Hague, and brought a fresh project of peace to be communicated to the Allies, which differed little from the former, or rather was an amplification of it. It was in the main the same with the Preliminaries, but cast into another form, which as effectually destroyed the Preliminaries, as if it had been put into no form at all, besides several material alterations. For the restitution of the Spanish Monarchy, there was a promise only. The clause in the fourth article, whereby the French King engaged to take in concert with the Allies proper measures to oblige his Grandson to it, was left out. The restoring of the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria was insisted on as a Preliminary, and of the Elector of Bavaria in particular to the Palatinate, in contradiction to the Preliminaries, by which it was agreed it should remain to the Elector Palatine, whom the Emperor had some time before put into possession of it; than which nothing could be more reasonable, no Prince having suffered so much from France as one of them, or deserved so ill of the Emperor as the other. As for the thirty-seventh article, the expedient offered was three towns in Flanders of his own choosing; an offer of no consequence, since he would never give any towns, that the Allies could think a tolerable security for so important a point. But to complete the project, and that the design and end of the Preliminaries might be intirely subverted, it was proposed, that the execution of all the articles be deferred, till the treaty be concluded, and the ratifications exchanged. The Marshal d'Uxelles and the Abbot de Polignac, afterwards a Cardinal, were appointed the French King's Plenipotentiaries, and to meet those of the Allies at Antwerp, or any other place, if the Allies would send the necessary passports. This project being communicated by Peikum to the Pensionary, and by him to the Plenipotentiaries of the Emperor and the Queen of Great-Britain, several conferences were held between these Ministers and the Deputies of the States-General. The result of which was, that the French Courier was sent back, the 13th of February, N. S. with an answer from Peikum to the Marquis de Torcy's letter, importing, "That the Allies required, that his most Christian Majesty should declare, in plain and expressive words, that he consented to all the Preliminaries, except the seven and thirtieth article; which done, the Allies would send passports to his Ministers, to treat of an equivalent for that article." When the French Court saw so much firmness on the part of the Allies, they thought fit to recede, and give the States all the assurance the most expressive words could do, that the King agreed to all the Preliminaries; and if they would consent, that his Ministers should come and confer with them on the thirty-seventh article, he did not doubt, but what should be proposed from him, would be to their satisfaction. The States therefore sent back the express (which had brought the French King's answer) with passports for the French Plenipotentiaries. But as the suspicions, which the French gave of their insincerity, made the States pursue the most effectual measures for an early campaign; so it put them upon taking the best care they could, that, if no good should come from the renewing of the Conferences, they might prevent the mischief, which they apprehended was designed by them. As they foresaw the ill effects of suffering the French Ministers to come into their Country, who by their Agents, were every where stirring up the people against the Government, as if the war was prolonged without necessity; they proposed upon Antwerp being disliked, to send their Deputies, Buis and Vanderdussen, to treat with the Ministers of France, either at Maerdyke or Gertruydenberg. The French liked neither of these places, but, when no other could be obtained, they chose the last, where they arrived the 19th of March, but were met the day before by Buis and Vanderdussen at Maerdyke, who had a Conference with them. The next day they had another with them, which lasted several hours, and then the Deputies set out for the Hague to make their report to the States.

By this time the Duke of Marlborough was come to the Hague. When the States sent the passports for the French Ministers, they wrote in very pressing terms to the Queen, to send over the Duke of Marlborough before the end of February. The House of Commons likewise being informed, that advances were made towards renewing a negotiation of peace, voted an address to the Queen to second the request of the States-General, about sending the Duke of Marlborough to Holland. The Lords concurring in the address, it was presented by both Houses on the 18th of February. As this was the last Parliamentary respect shewn the Duke, it will not be improper to insert it at large:

May it please your Majesty,

"WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in Parliament assembled, having reason to believe, that the negotiations of peace will suddenly be renewed in Holland; and being justly apprehensive of the crafty and insinuating designs of our enemies, to create divisions among your Allies, or by amuling them with deceitful expectations of peace, to retard their preparations for war, do think ourselves bound in duty, most humbly to represent to your Majesty, of how great importance we conceive it is to the interest of the Common Cause, that the Duke of Marlborough should be abroad at this critical juncture.

"We cannot but take this opportunity to express our sense of the great and unparalleled services of the Duke of Marlborough, and, with all imaginable duty, do applaud your Majesty's great wisdom, in having honoured the same person with the great characters of General, and Plenipotentiary, who, in our humble opinion, is most capable of discharging two such important trusts. We therefore make it our humble request, That you will be pleased to order the Duke of Marlborough's immediate departure for Holland, where his presence will be equally necessary, to assist

1710. "at the negotiations of peace, and to hasten the preparations for an early campaign, which will most effectually disappoint the artifices of our enemies, and procure a safe and honourable peace for your Majesty and your Allies."

Her Majesty's answer.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I am so sensible of the necessity of the Duke of Marlborough's presence in Holland, at this critical juncture, that I have already given the necessary directions for his immediate departure; and I am very glad to find, by this address, that you concur with me in a just sense of the Duke of Marlborough's eminent services."

There is no doubt but the States letter, and the Parliament's address, were intended to let the Queen see what confidence they put in the Duke of Marlborough, and how necessary they thought his service for carrying on the Common Cause, whether by arms or treaty. But it was without any effect, for, whatever soft words the Queen made use of in her answer, she was at that time determined to change Ministers and Measures. The Duke set out the next day for Harwich, and landed in Holland the 7th of March, N. S.

Four days after, Boys and Vanderdussen returned to the Hague. The next morning they had a Conference with the Duke of Marlborough, the Lord Townshend, and Count Zinzendorf, in the presence of the Pensionary and the Deputies of the States, wherein they made the following report: 'The French Plenipotentiaries had endeavoured, in the first place, to persuade them, that it was the interest of the Allies to make a separate peace with France, exclusive of Spain; and to render the same more effectual, and remove the umbrage the Allies seemed to have taken, that the King of France might underhand assist his Grandson, his most Christian Majesty was willing to enter into the most solemn engagements to the contrary, and give Cautionary Towns for the performance of his promise.' The Deputies of the States answered, 'These offers of France were not sufficient; and, the Allies having chiefly undertaken this war for restoring the Monarchy of Spain to the House of Austria, they could not treat with the French King (who had placed his Grandson on the Spanish Throne) without stipulating, that he should relinquish the same; adding, the high Allies would be very much surprized to hear, that, after the pressing instances, the French had made for these Conferences, their Plenipotentiaries were come to offer what had been already rejected; and would doubtless take it as an evidence, that their Court was not sincere, and fought only to amuse the Allies.' Messieurs d'Uxelles and de Polignac pretended, 'They did not know, that any such thing had been yet offered; but they were told, that, though Ministers might be allowed sometimes to dissemble, yet this was not a fit time to make use of that privilege, and they ought plainly to speak their minds. Those Gentlemen made large protestations of their Master's sincere inclination for peace: That he could never be prevailed upon to enter into a war with his Grandson, or take any other violent measures against him. They inlarged on the affection of the Spaniards for that Prince; and at last declared, they saw no other expedient for procuring the Spanish Monarchy to King Charles, than to give a share of it to King Philip; concluding, if the Allies would consent to give him Naples and Sicily, King Philip might be induced to resign the rest to the Archduke. They urged, this was the only way for preventing a farther effusion of Christian blood, and which would save the Allies abundance of trouble, and secure to the House of Austria the Monarchy of Spain; whereas, the fortune of the war being uncertain, it might still happen, that the Allies would be obliged to make peace upon other terms. The Deputies confuted these reasons without any great difficulty; and having represented, that such a partition was contrary to the treaties, which the Allies had amongst themselves, and to the whole tenor of the preliminaries, which the French themselves acknowledged for the foundation of the treaty, they declared, in express terms, they were sent to hear what equivalent they had to propose for the thirty-seventh article of the preliminaries, which they excepted against; but not to debate upon any other point. Whereupon they parted.'

The same day, to prevent any jealousies among the other Ministers of the Allies, the Deputies of the States communicated to the Prussian Plenipotentiaries what had been transacted at Maerdyke; and, the next day, the same was in a more solemn manner communicated to all the Ministers of the Allies, who were desired to use their interest with their respective Masters, that their troops might be in a readiness to begin the campaign as early as possible, as the most effectual means to force the common enemy to accept such conditions, as might secure a safe and lasting peace.

Six days after, an express from the French Plenipotentiaries arrived at the Hague, and acquainted the Pensionary, that they had received an answer from their Court to their last dispatches; and desired, either that they might be permitted to come to the Hague, or that the States Deputies might again confer with them at Gertruydenberg. The first being denied, and the latter granted, Messieurs Boys and Vanderdussen set out for Gertruydenberg, where, on the 21st and 22d of March, they had several Conferences with the Ministers of France, who again proposed a separate peace, exclusive of Spain; offering, as before, all manner of security, that the most Christian King should not assist his Grandson: Which being rejected, they proposed several schemes of partition of the Spanish Monarchy. They mentioned, in the first place, Naples and Sicily for King Philip: Afterwards, that the Allies would leave him in possession of the Kingdom of Arragon: And lastly, that he would content himself with Sicily, Sardinia, and the Spanish places on the coast of Tuscany. The Dutch Deputies told the French Ministers they were surprized to hear of no equivalent for the thirty-seventh article of the preliminaries, as their Court had promised, and on which consideration alone the present negotiation was agreed on by the Allies; adding, they had no power to treat of any partition. Having said this, they took their leave of the French Plenipotentiaries, who sent an express to Versailles for farther instructions. On the other hand, Boys and Vanderdussen,

1710. derdussen, being returned to the Hague, made a report of these Conferences to the Pensionary, in the presence of the Imperial and British Ministers, who dispatched Expresses to their respective Courts, with an account of the proposals made by France, which were also communicated to the States of Holland, and other Provinces.

On the 22d of March Petrum went from the Hague to Gertruydenberg, but without any Commission on the part of the Allies, and solely at the desire of the French Plenipotentiaries; who, not many days after, having given notice of the return of the express they had sent to their Court, the Deputies of the States set out again for Gertruydenberg. In these new Conferences, the French Plenipotentiaries insisted on a Partition of the Spanish dominions, according to the schemes they had proposed before; but seemed, however, to depart from what they had advanced in relation to Sicily and Sardinia, pretending that was only by way of conversation, and demanded either Naples, with the places on the coast of Tuscany, or the Kingdom of Aragon; which occasioned great debates. The French Ministers mentioned afterwards the article of security for the performance of what should be stipulated in the Preliminaries, and proposed what they expected from the Allies for themselves; but would not explain their meaning on the security to be given by France to the Allies for the performance of the Preliminaries. The Deputies of the States, being very much dissatisfied with the Plenipotentiaries of France, frankly told them, 'The Allies were tired with this way of treating, and therefore expected a full and clear declaration on the part of France on the Matters already debated; or else they would break off all manner of Conference with them.' Hereupon d'Uselles and Polignac desired time to send another Courier to Versailles, for further instructions; pretending, 'That the final resolution of their Master depended upon that of the Court of Madrid, which was expected about that time at Versailles.' This dilatory way of treating confirmed the general opinion, that the French had not a real intention to come to a peace, even by way of partition; and that they had no other design in these Conferences, than either to divide or amuse the Allies. In both of which, however, they were equally disappointed; for, Prince Eugene being come to the Hague on the 12th of April, and having, with the Duke of Mariborough and the Deputies of the States, concerted the operations of the next campaign, for the early opening of which, great magazines of dry forage and other necessaries had been provided, those two Generals set out, on the 15th, for Tournay, near which place the Confederate forces, quartered on the Maese, and in Brabant and Flanders, were ordered to rendezvous.

It was by many expected, that the early success of the Confederate Armies in passing the lines, and investing Doway, would have quickened the Negotiation at Gertruydenberg. But Buys and Vanderdussen being again returned thither on the 24th of April, N. S. at the desire of the French Plenipotentiaries, they had the same day a Conference, in which they desired to know, 'Whether by the last Courier they had received any further instructions on the grand affair, for which they were come into these Provinces?' The French Ministers answered, they had no other proposal to make, but what they had already offered; and told the Deputies they had expected the Answer of the Allies on their proposals. This declaration occasioned some warm debates among them; and the Deputies complained of the insincerity of the French Court, telling them in express terms, 'That the Ministers of France having so often and so positively declared by letters, and otherwise, that their Plenipotentiaries were to propose an expedient for the thirty-seventh article; the Allies could not but be surprized, that, after so many Conferences, they should hear nothing from them but a proposal for the partition of the Spanish Monarchy.' And so the Conference broke up without any success. The next morning the Deputies of the States went to take their leave of the French Plenipotentiaries, and insinuated to them in general terms, 'That, the armies being actually in the field, and no advances made in the late Conferences towards procuring a general peace, they thought it was no purpose to continue them.' The French Ministers alledged, they had made several proposals, which, in their opinion, might have conducted to a general peace; and that they wondered the Allies had made none on their part, since they were not fatished with those of France. They desired likewise the Dutch Deputies to give them their answer or declaration in writing, that they might transmit it to their Court: But, this being denied, the Deputies took their leaves, and the French Plenipotentiaries dispatched d'Uselles's Secretary to Versailles. Many were still of opinion, that the late success of the Allies, and the siege of Doway, would have obliged the Court of France to alter their style; and it was then strongly reported, that, in the Council held at Versailles, upon the first advice of the Allies having passed the lines, there appeared a great division among the Princes of the blood; some insisting upon the necessity of peace to preserve France from intire ruin; and others persisting in their former opinion, that it was better to venture the fate of another campaign, than to submit to such ignominious terms, as were insisted on by the Confederates.

Upon the report made at the Hague by Buys and Vanderdussen of the last fruitless Conferences, the Imperial Minister thought fit to declare, 'That the Emperor, his Master, could not consent to any partition of the Spanish dominions; and therefore proposed, that the French Plenipotentiaries should be forthwith dismissed.' But the Dutch were of a different opinion, alledging, that, since the French Ministers had sent an express to their Court, it was but reasonable to expect his return, and see whether the late progress of the Confederate arms had caused any alteration in the measures of that Court. The express being returned on the 3d of May, N. S. the French Plenipotentiaries wrote the next day the following letter to Petrum:

"We could wish our Conferences had produced a peace; but as we have no order to make any other proposition than those we have already made, we patiently expect, that the Deputies will come hither, to declare themselves in a more open manner than they have done hitherto, or to give us our dismissal; or, at least, that the Pensionary will send us an order to be gone."

This

This letter being communicated to the States-General, and by the Pensionary to the Imperial and British Ministers, it was thought fit to impart it to all the Ministers of the Allies, who, being met on the 9th of May, unanimously resolved, Monsieur Petkum should be desired to write to the French Plenipotentiaries, That, seeing they had nothing further to propose, and the Allies nothing more to say than what they had said before, it was to no purpose to continue useless Conferences; but he should avoid to speak any thing of dismissal, or order to depart. Petkum having writ a letter to that purpose to the French Plenipotentiaries, they sent him the next day an answer, importing, They were extremely concerned to see, that, notwithstanding all the advances of the King their Master for procuring Peace, the States and the Allies so resolutely refused it; and, since it was thought fit to break off the Negotiations, they were preparing to depart. Upon this declaration, it was generally believed, the French Plenipotentiaries would have set out for Paris, for which purpose they had caused their baggage to be packed up. But, having received another Courier from Versailles, they gave notice of it to Petkum, desiring at the same time, that the States would once more send their Deputies to Gertruydenberg. These new Conferences met with some Difficulties, Count Zinzendorf, the Imperial Minister, having insisted on his being present: But his demand being over-ruled (by reason the other Ministers of the Allies, particularly British, might with equal justice have claimed the same privilege) Buy and Vanderdussen set out the 23d of May for Gertruydenberg. Being returned to the Hague, they made the next day their report to the Pensionary in the presence of the Imperial and British Ministers, to this effect: After many protestations of their Master's sincere inclination to Peace, the French Plenipotentiaries said his most Christian Majesty had been prevailed upon to recede from the former demand he had made of Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, and the places on the coast of Tuscany; and therefore was willing, that Naples should remain to the House of Austria, and that King Philip should content himself with Sicily, Sardinia, and the Places on the coast of Tuscany. The Deputies upon this thought fit, without granting any part of the Proposals, to ask the French Plenipotentiaries, what security they had to propose to the Allies for the evacuation of Spain and the Indies by the Duke of Anjou, supposing that these proposals of a partition should be accepted. But they declined to give them any satisfactory answer. Whereupon the Deputies told them, the Allies being daily more and more convinced, that the French Court continued the Negotiation, not out of a sincere desire of Peace, but only to encourage their subjects to bear the more patiently the burthen of the war, they would be obliged to break off all further Conferences with them, to remove all occasions of jealousy amongst themselves. The French made great protestations of their Master's sincerity, and said, they would send him another express, with an account of these Conferences.

The Dutch Deputies having made the like report to the States of Holland, they took no final resolution, but deferred it to another meeting, in order to give the French Plenipotentiaries time to receive new instructions from their Court; which they did the 6th of June, and immediately writ a letter to Petkum, with one inclosed for the Pensionary, acquainting him, that, having new overtures to make, they desired, that Messieurs Buy and Vanderdussen would once again return to Gertruydenberg. The Imperial Plenipotentiary renewed his former pretension of assisting at the Conferences; and being again refused, and his orders from Vienna, to persist in his demand, being positive, he sent an express to Prince Eugene for his opinion, who advised him to follow the example of the British Ministers, whose Mistress, though she contributed more to the war than any other of the Allies, was yet so well satisfied of the wisdom and integrity of the States-General, as to trust to them that preliminary Negotiation of Peace.

Buy and Vanderdussen being absent from the Hague, when the French Courier, sent to Petkum, arrived there, they did not set out for Gertruydenberg till the 14th of June. The two following days they had several Conferences with the French Plenipotentiaries, who declared, Their Master receded from the demand made in the last Conference, of the Spanish places on the coast of Tuscany, and would content himself with Sicily and Sardinia for King Philip; and use all possible means to persuade his Grandson to consent to that partition: This required some time; but, if that Prince would not acquiesce in this proposal, the most Christian King, though he could by no means declare war against his Grandson, would yet furnish a sum of money towards the charges of a war to be continued against him, till he had surrendered Spain and the West-Indies to the House of Austria. This declaration of the French Plenipotentiaries being reported to the Pensionary, in the presence of the Imperial and British Ministers, occasioned two or three Conferences between them, and confirmed the general opinion, that the French had no other design, than either to amuse the Allies, or to decoy them to a separate peace, exclusive of Spain; where, notwithstanding their promises to the contrary, they might underhand assist King Philip, and carry on the war with such advantage, as might in the end tire out, if not exhaust the principal Members of the Alliance. The Imperial Minister was still of opinion, that, since the French Plenipotentiaries did not propose any equivalent or expedient for the thirty-seventh article of the preliminaries, which was the main intention of the present Negotiation, they ought to be immediately dismissed; and therefore moved, that Petkum, who, on the 21st of June, went to Gertruydenberg, as he pretended, for some private concerns, should be desired to signify to the French Plenipotentiaries, that the Allies would not consent to any further Conferences. But it was thought more advisable to send him to make the following declaration on the part of the Allies: I. The last proposal made by the French King, of contributing a sum of money towards the charges of the war, to oblige the Duke of Anjou to quit the Monarchy of Spain, and content himself with Sardinia and Sicily, if he would not do it voluntarily, was not acceptable to the Allies upon several accounts; and namely, because this would produce but a separate, and not a general peace, which was the end the Allies proposed to themselves. II. The Allies insisted to have Spain and

and the Indies delivered up, according to the tenor of the preliminaries. III. This foundation being laid and agreed upon, the Allies would consent to continue the Conferences on other articles. The French Ministers deferring their answer to this declaration, Buy and Vanderdufsen were directed to send an express to Gertruydenberg, who returned to the Hague the 10th of July, with an answer, importing, "That, by virtue of their powers and instructions, they were always in a condition to explain the sentiments of the King their Master; and therefore desired, that the Deputies would come once more to Gertruydenberg." This being communicated to Count Zinzendorf and the Lord Townsend, those Ministers met at the Pensionary's, where, after a long debate, it was resolved to send back the Dutch Deputies to Gertruydenberg with this instruction, That they should insist upon a plain and positive answer to the articles delivered to the Plenipotentiaries by Peikum. Buy and Vanderdufsen set out the next day, and had a Conference with the French Plenipotentiaries, that lasted about four hours, though to as little purpose as the former. For the Dutch Deputies insisting on the declaration made on the part of the Allies by the Resident of Holstein, the French said, They had no further instructions, but would send another express to their Master for a final answer, which they would communicate upon the return of the Courier, for whose journey fifteen days were allowed. The Dutch Deputies being by this time convinced of the insincerity of the French, Vanderdufsen could not forbear making some warm expostulations about it; to which the Abbot de Polignac replied in very high terms, not without reproaching the Dutch with ingratitude towards the Crown of France, which had been their main support upon their defection from Spain. Whereupon the Conference, which proved to be the last, broke off unkindly. The French Ministers, not thinking it proper to demand another interview, on the 20th of July sent a letter to the Pensionary, wherein they represented the proposals made in the last Conference by the Deputies to be unjust, and impossible to be executed, and complained of the ill treatment they pretended they had received in contempt of their character; of the injurious, false, and scandalous libels, which had been suffered to be dispersed during their stay at Gertruydenberg, to inflame the minds of those, whom they were endeavouring to reconcile; and of all the letters, which they either received or writ, having been opened, in breach of the public faith. This letter being communicated to the States-General, they came to a resolution, 'That the contents of it concerned not only their State, but likewise all the Allies, and therefore they thought it their duty to communicate it to their Ministers residing at the Hague, that every thing might be done in concert with them, as it had been hitherto. That the French Plenipotentiaries rejecting, by their answer, the propositions, made to them, declaring, that it was useless to hold any more Conferences upon these propositions, and thereby breaking off the Negotiations on that subject, nothing more remained to be done on the part of the Allies, than to acquiesce therein, and to enter into no more Conferences, as long as the enemy should continue in such sentiments. And the Sieurs Buy and Vanderdufsen were, by this resolution, required to signify the same by a letter to the French Plenipotentiaries, without entering into a debate upon the contents of their letter, notwithstanding it might be easily confuted, as well with respect to things as words.' Accordingly Buy and Vanderdufsen returned a short answer to the French Ministers, importing, 'That, since their Court would not give a sufficient security for the delivering up of Spain, it was to no purpose to continue the Conferences.' Upon this the French Plenipotentiaries set out the 25th of July, from Gertruydenberg, to return home (1). It was observed, that, about this time, the French began

(1) Dr Hare, in his fourth letter to a Tory Member, Part II. p. 42. observes, 'that the ill success of these Negotiations was intirely owing to the French; the King of France having put it out of the power of the Allies to make a general Peace, by refusing to give them Spain and the Indies, without which a good Peace could never be made, or the end, for which they went into the war, tolerably answered. And the more, says he, this affair is examined into, the more you will be convinced of the insincerity of the French, and the necessity the Allies were under to act as they did.'

First, It is indisputably true, and confessed on all hands, that the restitution of Spain and the Indies, whatever became of the rest of the Monarchy, was promised from the very first. They did not pretend to desire so much as one single Conference for Peace on any other terms.

Now if the King could do what he promised, what became of the pretended impossibility? And if he could not, what could he mean by such a promise but to amuse and deceive? But, if he designed that, then it undeniably follows, all these Negotiations, on his part, have been one continued cheat from the beginning to the end. And, that this is the truth of the case, I have given you many proofs both in my last letter and in this. All the expedients, he proposed, were so many shams, and had no other meaning in them but to gain time, quiet his people, and slow jealousies among the Allies; and defeat, if possible, by a treaty those he cannot defeat by his arms. What else could he mean by proposing a Partition as an expedient, and yet refusing to let it have the effect of one? To ask the States to consent to a Partition, and not suffer them to ask for what, is a little too bare-faced. Could they think the Dutch would consent to this expedient, for the sake of a general Peace, without being sure a general Peace would be purchased by it? I scarce believe, they expected that of them; but nevertheless hoped, they should gain their ends by it; and that the very hearkening to the proposal of a Partition would create jealousies, and divide the Allies, in which they did not judge very ill; for the Conferences upon this foot very much alarmed the Ministers of the Emperor and King Charles, who were utterly averse to a partition of any kind; and it was with great difficulty they were prevailed with to consent to let the Conferences with the Ministers of France be managed by the Deputies of the States, without their being themselves present at them; which would have rendered the Negotiations for a general Peace much more difficult than they were, though France had been in earnest for it. And this was all France aimed at by proposing a Partition: Some of the Allies, they knew, would be extremely against it, while the States, they hoped, would, for so desirable an end, be willing enough to come into it. And this difference they promised themselves

1710. to talk of Peace with indifference; either, as some conjectured, in hopes of a diversion in the North, or, which is much more probable, from an expectation, that the ferment, raised in England by the late trial of Dr Sacheverel, would be so industriously fomented and improved by their friends, as to produce a favourable turn. On the other hand, the States-General were so exasperated by the late evasive conduct of the Court of France, that on the 27th of July, N. S. they came to another vigorous resolution, in confutation of the letter from d'Uxelles and Polignac to the Pensionary, and in particular to shew, 'That the enemy had departed from the foundation, on which the Negotiation had begun, and studied pretences to evade the execution of the capital points, the restitution of Spain and the Indies; and, in short, that France had no other view, than to sow and create jealously and disunion among the Allies. As to the complaint of the Plenipotentiaries relating to their persons, the pretended contempt of their character, the publication of abusive libels, the opening of their letters, the hindering the making any visits to them and their lodging, as if they had been in a kind of prison; the States observed, That, pursuant to the agreement, the Plenipotentiaries came without any character, for which reason no ceremonial was observed on either side; but that all manner of consideration was had for their birth, quality, and merit.

That libels were severely forbidden in Holland, 1710. and the authors and printers liable to punishment. That none of the many Couriers; the French Plenipotentiaries had received and dispatched, had been stopped; nor were any of the letters, which they sent by the ordinary post, intercepted. That no person was ever hindered from going to them; nor was any order given to take notice who visited them. But as; in all frontier-towns, it is the custom, that none enter, unless they declare who they are, both at the Gate and to the Governor; it ought not to be thought strange, nor ought exceptions to be taken, if this custom were not discontinued during the stay of the French Ministers at Gertruydenberg. And, in the last place, they could not call a kind of prison the town, which they pitched upon for their residence, and which they preferred to Antwerp, a large and noble City.

On the 7th of August, the Lord Townshend delivered to the States-General a memorial, wherein he acquainted them, that the Queen intirely approved their resolution, in answer to the letter of the French Plenipotentiaries, and all the steps they had taken during the late Negotiations; giving them, at the same time, fresh assurances of her Majesty's firm resolution to prosecute the war with all possible vigour; till the enemy was brought to accept such terms of peace, as might secure the tranquillity of the Christian world.

By

much from. But, for fear this difficulty should be overcome, and the Allies should take them at their words, and accept some of the expedients offered, they had another resort behind, by which they could at any time confound all that had been done, and had great hopes, at the same time, that the Alliance might be broke by it. And that was this; they pretended they could not execute any part of the preliminaries, unless the Allies would oblige themselves not to make any further demands, than what were already contained in those articles, or that they should be now declared; which is contrary to the 3d article, in which there is a power expressly reserved for the Empire, the four associated Circles, the Kings of Portugal and Prussia, and the Duke of Savoy, to make what further demands they should find reasonable. This the French insisted on for no other reason, but because they knew it was impossible for the Allies in justice to comply with it, unless the respective powers above-named, had had Ministers at the Hague, with full instructions from each of them, which they knew they neither had, nor could have, without losing a great deal of time. Besides, this demand of the French is contrary, not only to the express terms of the preliminaries, but to the very nature of them; for, if nothing is to be left to be adjusted at a general treaty, how does a preliminary treaty differ from it? But it was very much for the purpose of the French, — who meant nothing but to amuse the Allies, and make mischief, to insist on it; which accordingly they did, being sure which ever part the Allies took, they should find their account in it. For, the Allies would not agree to this demand, then there was always a handle ready to break off the treaty upon: As long as further demands may be made upon them, they cannot be sure any concessions will procure a lasting Peace, and they shall be in danger of having the War renewed upon them, after all they shall have done to put an end to it. And this is very plausible and specious; but has at the bottom nothing at all in it. But, if the Allies had complied with this demand, and declared no further demands should be insisted on, what a fine game would the French have had? They had nothing else to do to break the Alliance, but to represent to some of these members of it, how their interests were neglected, and what poor terms the Maritime Powers and the Emperor had made for them. You see, Gentlemen, the utmost your Allies ask for you; you see the whole you are to expect from them. These are the terms they have made for you; and they have promised to oblige you to acquiesce in them. Are these Allies worth adhering to? Come over to the interest of the King, and support his first pretensions; and you will find both him and his Grandson more grateful. You shall have this and that, and the other good thing; this town, that principality, so much money, such a valuable match; in short, terms infinitely more advantageous to your masters, and the interest of their families, than any thing the Allies will do for you. This artifice the French found the good effects of the last war; and their fingers itch to be at it again; for this was the way they drew off a certain Prince then, which was the ruin of that Confederacy. After their emissaries had been for some time in Holland, proposing under-hand terms of Peace, and endeavouring to find, what articles the principal Allies would be content with for the rest; when they had learned this, the use they made of it, was to seduce one of them, by offering much better terms than had been asked for him. The bait took, and it was agreed to leave the side he thought himself ill used by. Nothing remained but to contrive how this might be done most decently. The way agreed on was to invade his country with a great army, and lay siege to his capital. What could the unhappy Prince do in these circumstances? He is in the utmost danger; his Allies neither do, nor can support him. There is no safety for him but in a Peace. Thus a member was brought off from the last confederacy; and the same play they want to be again at. This is so certain, that we are sure they were trying this very trick with the same Prince. While the Marquis de Torcy made at the Hague such mighty difficulties in complying with the terms demanded for the Duke of Savoy, whom he pretended his Master had great reason to be dissatisfied with, this false perfidious Court was at that very time tempting him with better offers at

By this time the Confederate armies under Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, had made a considerable progress in Flanders. On the 14th of April, the Earl of Albemarle, Governor of Tournay, in concert with Lieutenant-General Cadogan, caused the Castle of Mortagne to be attacked, which was executed with so much success, that the garrison, consisting of a Captain, four Subalterns, five Sergeants, and 65 private men, surrendered prisoners of war. But the next morning the enemy retook that post with about sixty men. The Earl, resolving to be master of it again, made a second attack with six hundred men of the garrison of Tournay; and though the French garrison, which consisted of two hundred grenadiers, were assisted by twelve or fifteen Gallions from Condé; yet the Confederate troops, being supported by a detachment from the body of Count Feltz, and favoured by the cannon, which they had planted on the heights of Munde, the enemy were obliged again to surrender prisoners of war. The Allies, considering the great convenience and advantageous situation of that post, left there two hundred men, and four pieces of cannon.

The French had all the winter been strengthening their lines for covering Daway, and other frontier-towns, and boasted they were impregnable; but not being able to supply their troops with provision, and especially forage for their horse, the two Confederate Generals, with Count Tilly and Monsieur de Clerbergen, one of the States Deputies, made all the necessary dispositions for advancing towards the enemy's lines; and the army began their march in two April 20. columns; the right commanded by the Duke of Marlborough to Pont-a-Vendin, and the left by Prince Eugene to Pont-Oby, on the Deule. This march was so well contrived, and so sudden, that notwithstanding the great preparations, which the French had made for fortifying and defending their lines; the Chevalier de Luxembourg, being for that purpose incamped with about four thousand men near St Amand, and the Marshal de Montesquiou, having assembled about forty battalions, and sixty squadrons, near Lens and Beibune; yet the Prince of Wirtemberg, and Lieutenant-General Cadogan, with a detachment of fifteen battalions and fifty squadrons from the Duke of Marlborough's column, entered those lines at Pont-a-Vendin, without any opposition. The few troops they had there, for the defence of that post, retired without firing a gun; and the battalions and squadrons, posted near Lens and Beibune, made likewise their retreat, partly towards Arras, and partly towards Daway. The Allies having laid bridges over the Scarpe, the Prince of Hesse

Turin; but that Prince understood his interests too well, to hearken again to them.

This is the use the Ministers of France hoped to make of this demand of their's, if the Allies had been weak enough to have agreed to it. But they were not to be so imposed on, nor would they act in so arbitrary a manner, as to force any of their Allies to submit to terms made against their consent, or without their knowledge; and therefore could not, by all the artifice of France, be prevailed with to preclude them from making such further demands, as they should think reasonable. But, to shew they were sincere, they were willing to desist from all further demands for themselves, according to the 31st article. This they could do; more injustice they could not. And, had the French been in earnest on their part, they would, without difficulty, have trusted the Allies in this point; for they could not, with any colour of reason, believe, that, when the Maritime Powers and the Emperor were satisfied, they would renew the war at the end of two months, or what other time should have been agreed on, for the sake of any further demands on the part of the other Allies, which it would not be very reasonable for France to grant them. And therefore it cannot be thought they meant any thing else by urging this point, but to make mischief, and, draw the Allies, if they could, into a snare; and, if that did not succeed, that they might always have it in their power to go off.

To reduce the whole management of the French in this affair under one short view: They press the Allies to an impossibility contrary to the preliminaries, and complain at the same time of being pressed to an impossibility themselves, though the Allies ask nothing but what they themselves offered from the beginning; and the steps they have taken are very extraordinary. First, Negotiations are broke off upon the single point of the 37th article. Then an expedient is offered of cautionary towns; then the Conferences are again desired to be renewed, upon repeated assurances of agreeing to all the other preliminaries, except the 37th. Then, as what would solve all difficulties, a partition is proposed, which is at last reduced to Sicily and Sardinia. And what is all this for? Will they sign the preliminaries if this partition is agreed to? By no means; they take the very asking of this question for a plain design in the Allies to break off the Conferences; and they, who would have given you before all the preliminaries, except the 37th article and three cautionary towns, now take it very ill you will not accept the preliminaries, not only without that article, but without any cautionary towns, or other expedients, though Sardinia and Sicily be taken out of them, without having for this any more security given than before, that Spain and the Indies shall be restored, though the proposing a partition could not possibly have any other meaning in it. For it was proposed as an expedient; but for what? To leave the Allies where it found them? No sure; but to remove the pretended difficulty of evacuating Spain and the Indies, in favour of King Charles. But, if this be the plain meaning of this proposal, how came the treaty to break off upon this point? What can be more unjust, than to desire the Allies to quit part of what the preliminaries give them, for the sake of the rest, and yet not tell them, which way the rest is to be had? What is more ridiculous than to press the States to all the inconveniencies, which the consenting to a partition might be attended with, without allowing them the least advantage from it? How can one reconcile the asking a partition at the beginning of the Conferences, and then breaking them off, because the Allies desire to be secured of the effect proposed from it? Now after all that has been said upon this subject, can there be any doubt, which side is in fault, or at whose door it lies, that those Conferences did not succeed? — It is plain they broke off, because the French would not secure to the Allies the restitution of Spain and the Indies. And it is as plain, the French ought to have done this: It is what they promised from the beginning, and undertook for at the opening of those Conferences, the proposal of a partition being incapable of any other fair construction. And therefore the blame of the rupture can lie only upon the French, or on those, who have encouraged them to act thus, by dissuading the mighty haste they were in for peace. For whether the French, when they first began these conferences, intended they should end as they did, may possibly be a question. I must own, when I heard they had proposed a partition, I thought the necessity of their affairs had at last forced them to be sincere; and that they would have 1710. Hesse Cassel was detached with twelve Squadrons to fall upon their rear ; but they broke down so many bridges, and retired so fast that he could not put his designs in execution, and only took a few prisoners. The army under the Duke of Marlborough passed the Scarpe, incamping his right near Vitri, and his left at Gouy; the extremity of his left at Goulesfin. The army under Prince Eugene remained on the other side of the river to invest Doway, the siege of which was resolved upon ; and for that purpose Lieutenant-General Cadogan marched to take post at Pont-a-Rache, and other detachments were made to open a communication over the lower Scarpe with Lille and Tournay. The enemy quitted St Amand, Marchienne, and the abbey of Hafnon below Doway; and their army retired towards Cambray, upon the news that the Confederates had passed the Scarpe at Vitri. This opened the way to Doway, which was immediately invested.

On the 8th of May, eight hundred men were detached from Prince Eugene's Army to attack the castle of Pignonville near Fort-Scarpe, which would have disturbed the Besiegers in their approaches ; and after an hour's resistance, the garrison, consisting of about one hundred men, surrendered prisoners of war. At the same time the necessary preparations for the attack of Doway being made, forty battalions were appointed for that service, under the command of the Prince of Anhalt-Dessau, and the Prince of Nassau-Friesland, both Generals of foot. And, on the 4th at night, the trenches were opened with so much precaution and regularity, that the men were covered before they were perceived from the town ; so that all the fire, which the enemy then made, proved ineffectual. The siege was carried on in the usual methods till the 7th ; when about ten at night the Besieged, to the number of one thousand foot, (most grenadiers) and two hundred dragoons, made a vigorous sally, under the command of the Duke of Mortemar, against the left attack, commanded by the Prince Nassau ; put the workmen into great disorder, and levelled some paces of the parallel. Colonel Sutton's regiment suffered very much, being the first that supported the workmen ; but, Macartney's and some other regiments coming up to their relief, the enemy were repulsed with considerable loss, and pursued to their counter-scarp. The Besiegers had above three hundred men killed or wounded upon this occasion, and among the latter, Lieutenant-Colonel Gledbit, who was taken prisoner.

By this time the enemy's troops began to assemble in different bodies near Bethune, Bapaume, Arras, Cambray, Landrezi, and behind the river Somme ; and, Marshal Villars, whom the French Court had appointed to command their forces in the Netherlands, being arrived at Peronne on the 14th of May, the Confederate Generals received advice, that he designed to pass the Scheld, between Bouchain and Denain, in order to advance towards the Allies. And indeed he made such speeches to his army, that it was generally believed he would venture a battle, rather than look on and see Doway lost.

have struck up a Peace before Doway was taken, that the Allies might not extend their conquests beyond the bounds of their preliminaries. And perhaps, even after this, they might balance with themselves, and were for some time irresolute with intention to consent, or not consent to the Allies, as they found themselves pressed by the War. And, could the Duke of Marlborough have either beat their army, or besieged Arras, I believe they would have thought the King might with honour have abandoned his Grandson, after he had sacrificed so much for the support of him ; and the safety of France would have excused to all the world his quitting Spain. And it was with this view principally they kept their Ministers so long at Gertruydenberg, that they might be upon the spot, to clap up a Peace immediately, if there should be occasion. By this they were sure to have an advantage, in case of a battle, which ever way it turned ; for, if they lost it, they would have been able to prevent the fatal consequences of a great defeat by closing with the terms of the Allies, before a victory could be pursued ; and, if they had won it, they would have made use of the first consternation, which the loss of a battle would have put the Dutch into, to press them to a Peace on their terms. That this was the most the French meant by these Conferences, is evident from what was doing at the same time in Spain. I have observed before, that either the Spaniards or we must have been deceived ; and therefore the French kept it in their power, by the most artful ways they could, to do either as they found most convenient ; but that the King's inclination and interest were too well known to leave room to doubt, that he would keep his promise to the Spaniards, if he could. Accordingly we see, he did not only enable his Grandson, as I have observed before, to put Spain into the best posture of defence it was capable of, and supply him with every thing that was necessary ; but promised to make the siege of Gironne early in the spring, and was making a new offensive and defensive treaty with him during these very Conferences. And the assistance and assurance, the Duke of Anjou had given him, made him think of nothing less than quitting Spain. In the spring he pretended to have an Army of one hundred and twenty two battalions, and one hundred and forty-five squadrons, besides the troops that were coming to him from Flanders. Before the Conferences begun, the King received an express from his Grandson, to acquaint him with the zeal the Castilians express for him, and his resolution to stand by them ; and the French Minister at Madrid in April gave out, that the Conferences were broke off. At the same time the Duke of Anjou was hastening to put himself at the head of his army, but was stopped by the affair of the Duke de Medina Celi ; which, as great a mystery as it was, was probably at bottom a French trick. It was very natural for the Spaniards to take umbrage at the Conferences, and to think it was time to take care of themselves ; and that, if the King should in earnest abandon them, it was to no purpose for them to adhere to his Grandson. To feel their pulse upon this point, it is probable the French Ministers, either Bleau or Ibberville, or some others of their emissaries, had pretended to treat with some of the Grandees upon this foot, and acquainted them, that the King's affairs would not permit him to support his Grandson any longer, and that the King did not expect they should ruin themselves to maintain him on the Throne, since in that case it would be impracticable. But that, if they would dispose him to resign, the King would endeavour to get some partition for him. It is extremely probable, this trick was tried at Madrid, to find how the Grandees were inclined to act on this occasion ; the Duke of Medina in particular, who was the first Minister ; and that, when they had got out of him the sense of him and his friends on this nice subject, the use they made of it was to betray him to the Duke of Anjou. And possibly the thing went farther ; and that in concert with the French, to save the King's honour, they had

On the 17th of May, in the morning, the Besieged made a second salley with nine companies of Grenadiers, and a detachment of dragoons upon the left. But Colonel Preston, who commanded there, gave them so warm a reception, that, upon the first firing of his men, the enemy retired with precipitation. The 21st, at night, the Besieged made another salley on the left, wherein several men were killed on both sides; and, notwithstanding they were disappointed, they made a fourth attempt on the trenches, the 23d at night. But, the Besiegers, who had notice of it, having killed about twenty of their men, upon the first discharge, the rest retired in great confusion.

During these transactions before Doway, Villars set out from Peronne, and arrived the same day at Cambray, where he held a grand Council of war, in which it was resolved, immediately to assemble the French Army, in order to attempt the relief of Doway. Accordingly, Villars sent expresses to some reinforcements, that were commanded to join him from the Upper Rhine, to advance with all possible expedition; and having drawn together all his troops, passed the Scheldt, and incamped with his right near Bouchain, and his left at Ribecourt. Upon advice of this motion, the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene thought fit to alter the disposition of their forces, except thirty battalions left at the siege, and twelve squadrons at Pont-a-Racbe. The 24th, all the cavalry of the Duke of Marlborough's army marched over the Scarpe, and incamped near Gouffesin; and, the next day, the infantry moved the same way, incamping with the right over against Vitry, and the left near Arleux. At the same time, Prince Eugene made a motion with his army, placing his right at Isle-les-Esquerchiens; by which situation, the Confederate troops were ready to repair immediately to either of the fields of battle, already marked out, according to the next motions of the enemy; for which purpose roads were made for the armies to march in four columns either way. The 25th, bridges were laid in several places over the Scarpe (which parted the two armies) for the more easy communication of the troops; and, the same day, upon advice, that the enemy were in motion, all the troops were ordered to be in a readiness to march. The four following days, both armies made several motions; and, on the 30th, the Dutch Infantry, under Count Tilly, was ordered to join the Duke of Marlborough's army; which was by this time reinforced by the arrival of the Prussians, Palatines, and Hessians, and the recalling of several detachments. Upon intelligence, that Villars had positive orders from Court to venture a battle, the expectation of a sudden engagement increased on both sides; and that General, who was incamped with his right at Roquelincourt, near Arras, and his left at St Eloy, advancing with his troops in order of battle, the Confederate Generals repaired to their respective posts; the cannon was placed on the batteries, that defended the avenues to their camp; and all other necessary dispositions were made to receive them. Villars, with a great detachhad agreed to seize his person, and carry him off; which I remember, was the first report we had upon that Minister's disgrace. After this affair was over, which had sufficiently intoxicated the Spaniards, the Duke of Anjou left Madrid, and joined his army near Lerida. And the Duke of Noailles was advanced to the banks of the Ter, the river Gironne stands upon, to favour his designs. In June the Duke of Anjou was so sanguine, that he made no doubt of being able to drive King Charles out of Catalonia that campaign, especially if the Duke of Noailles could but make the siege of Gironne. This appears at large in some letters of his, that were intercepted, to the King and the Duke of Burgundy, writ to congratulate the marriage of the Duke of Berry, which he shews himself not at all pleased with. Upon his disappointment in Catalonia, when he could neither attack Marshal Staremberg, nor besiege Balaguer, he grew dissatisfied with his Spanish Generals: And in July both he and his Princes solicit the King in very pressing terms to send the Duke of Vendôme to him; which was soon complied with, and, that the Duke might have no apprehensions of the King's designing to abandon him, he entered into a new Alliance with him. This Alliance was framing, while the Ministers of France were at Gertruydenberg; which place they left but the 25th, and the 8th of August, or before, the articles of this new treaty were known publicly at Paris: Which makes it plain to a demonstration, that this treaty was forming before the Conferences were broke off.

From this account, it is exceeding evident, that the French were taking the most effectual methods to support the Duke of Anjou, as I make the Spaniards faithful to him, while they were persuading the Allies, the King would in earnest abandon him, and give him no assistance directly or indirectly; nay, while they were making terms for him, upon which they would oblige him to resign. And, if this be not insincere in the last degree, I would be glad to know what is. If he was sincere, why did he treat for a general Peace, when either he would not, or could not make the necessary conditions of it practicable? Why, when he meant nothing but a separate Peace, did he not frankly from the beginning tell the Allies, that he was willing to make terms with them for himself, but that he could make none for Spain? Was this for any thing else but to amuse the Allies, who, he knew, would flatly have refused entering into any Negotiations, if he had spoke out plainly what he meant? Did not he intend, from the beginning, to defeat by an exception a general peace, while he pretended all the while to be for it? As old managers sometimes do with a bill in parliament, which they contrive should be lost by an amendment, while they would be thought zealous for it; which they would not have been able to effect, had they openly declared against the bill itself. Thus they gain the point they would have, by seeming to be for what in truth they would not have: And the same part the King of France has acted with respect to Peace, but not with the same success. He has not got yet what he wants, I mean a separate Peace, by affecting to treat for a general one, which he would of all things keep off. A man must shut his eyes very hard, not to see the French meant nothing by these Conferences but to amuse the Allies, and keep it in their power to make what use of them they should have occasion for; and that they never designed to consent to what was necessary to make a general peace practicable. They meant either no Peace at all, or only a separate one for themselves; which they hoped from the temper of the Dutch, the nature of their government, and the experience they have formerly had of them, they might be frightened into. To which end they affected from the very first Conference to let nothing fall from them, that might look like a desire to retard the operations of the campaign, but on their own part threatened what mighty things they would do upon the Rhine and in Spain; and, to intimidate them the more, Marshal Villars condescended 1710. detachment, advanced some time after, within musket-shot of the Confederates guard, and took a view of the army and its situation. But instead of attacking them (as he had so confidently given out in the morning, he marched back, and joined the center of his army, and incamped between Noyelles sous-Lens and the Heights of St Laurens. The Confederates judging, he did not design to attack them, but only to retard the siege, sent the troops back, which they had drawn from before Doway; and those under General Fagel returned into the lines on the other side of the Scarpe. And, to prevent any surprize from the enemy, orders were given to join the several redoubts, in the front of the camp by a line to extend from Montignon to Vitri, which was finished on the last of May.

The siege of Doway, which by all these motions had been retarded, was carried on with all imaginable vigour, notwithstanding the many obstacles the Allies met with in their approaches, both from the difficulty of the ground, and the resolute defence of the garrison. On the 29th of May, the Besieged made a fifth salley on the right attack, and penetrated into the trenches; but, after an obstinate engagement, they were repulsed with the loss of twenty-five Officers, and about one hundred private men. The next day a party of the garrison of Fort-Scarpe made a salley, and advanced to Pont-a-Rache, with a design to intercept the bread-waggons of the Allies. But Colonel Caldwell, who commanded there with three hundred dragoons, vigorously repulsed them, though he had the misfortune of being wounded in one of his arms. The last day of May, the Besieged made a vigorous salley, burnt several villages, took part of the equipage of General Fagel, and returned into the town with a good number of cattle. The Besieged continued to defend their out-works with the utmost obstinacy; but notwithstanding their frequent sallies and mines, on the 5th of June, the Allies made two lodgments on the glacis of the counterescarp at the right attack; as also lodgments on the right and left of the other attack of the counterescarp of the ravelins, and fired briskly from the batteries of cannon and mortars, to drive the enemy from their traverses. The 10th in the morning, the Allies fired five pieces of cannon into the covered-way, and continued the sap, which went on but slowly, by reason of the great fire of the enemy. However the Besiegers in the night, between the 14th and 15th, perfected a lodgment on the covered-way at the right attack, and repaired the damages their works received at the left by the great number of bombs, that were thrown into them. On the 16th, the Besiegers began to fire against the ravelins, from a battery of seven pieces of cannon, and made a line of communication on the left attack. They sprung likewise two mines, that night, at the right attack with so much success, that the enemy abandoned all their places of arms, and the Besiegers made lodgments at both attacks. After this they brought several pieces of cannon on their batteries, and fired so effectually, that, the defended to the mean artifice of writing to the French Ministers, from time to time, letters filled with the grossest galconade, what a brave army he had; how desirous they were to come to an engagement; and that, if the Allies had a mind to a battle, they should meet with no intrenchments, but should find him ready to receive them in an open plain. These poor tricks they fancied would pass upon the Dutch Deputies; but they were too well known to be believed; and the event shewed there was nothing else in all these boasts aimed at, but to deceive; for, the minute Doway began to capitulate, the Marshal retired to safe ground, and intrenched with all his might, and dared not offer them battle all the rest of the campaign, though more battalions had been weakened by the sieges of Doway and Bethune, than the battle of Blenheim was fought with; and almost as many more were afterwards at the same time employed in the sieges of St Venant and Aire. But these and all the other artifices of France could not delude or drive the States to quit the common interest, or induce the Allies to hearken to a separate Peace with the French, who, they knew, were taking the most effectual means to make the reduction of Spain impossible, while they were treating of terms for the surrender of it. But nothing can discover more plainly the insincerity of France, than what happened after these Conferences were ended. Two days after their Plenipotentiaries were gone, the Duke of Anjou received a considerable disgrace at Almanara; and, in about three weeks after that, his army was intirely defeated at Saragossa, beyond a possibility of maintaining his ground, or recovering his affairs, without the assistance of France. Here was now a fair occasion for the French King to shew himself; his language had been all along, that he could not be active to dethrone his Grandson, but would consent absolutely to abandon him, if that would procure a Peace. The Allies cannot take his bare word: His Ministers make the most solemn protestations in his name, and give

repeated assurances of this in the most express words, and complain heavily, that they are not believed. Now, in less than a month after the Conferences were ended, there happens the best opportunity in the world for the King to shew his great sincerity: The obstruction to a Peace is the evacuation of Spain. Let now the King but keep his word, and be passive only, and the thing will do itself: The Allies cannot fail of Spain, if the King does not support his Grandson against them. What part now does the King take? Does he send to the Allies, that he will abandon his Grandson in earnest, if that will content them? Nothing like it; he balances, indeed, for some time what to do, and holds frequent councils: But for what? Not because he was in any doubt, whether he should act agreeably to his word, or shew he is sincere; for that I have already observed he could not be; he must deceive either us, or the Spaniards. All the debate therefore was, which he should do: At first their affairs seemed to be in so desperate a condition, as to be beyond retrieve; and that all the support he could give his Grandson would be insignificant; and therefore there were some thoughts of making a virtue of necessity, and to procure a Peace to France by abandoning Spain; since, if he did not abandon it, it must be lost. And had the action of Saragossa happened a month sooner, it is very likely it had proved so, for the hands of the French were too full of other work to send any considerable force to Spain, till the campaign was in other parts, Savoy particularly, drawing to an end. After many consultations, it is resolved to make the utmost efforts to support the Duke of Anjou, notwithstanding all their pretences to leave him to himself, or rather to persuade him to quit a kingdom, which, without their help, all the world sees he could not have kept. What success this assistance, that has been given him, has had, I need not tell you; nor what further mischief the common cause is like to suffer from it. It is a great pity the Conference did the breaches in the ravelins being judged wide enough, and all things being in a readiness to storm both of them by the 19th, the troops commanded for the assault performed that service with great bravery, but met with so vigorous a resistance, that many were killed on both sides. On the 23d at night the Prince of Anhalt having made the necessary dispositions for attacking the two ravelins at the right attack, they stormed the same on the 24th, and lodged themselves thereon after a small resistance. Soon after the enemy sprung two mines under the ravelin of the right,* whereby the Besiegers lost some workmen: However they enlarged the lodgments and communication at the left. At length the garrison, being reduced to the last extremity, on the 25th at two in the afternoon beat a parley, and offered to capitulate for the town only, without including Fort-Scarpe. But, this being refused, they sent hostages to both attacks, who were conducted to the Duke of Marlborough's quarters; where being again told, that no capitulation could be granted to the town without including Fort-Scarpe; on the 26th in the morning, Monsieur Albergotti signified, that he was willing to surrender that fort with the town, provided he might have liberty to remove all their provisions and ammunition. This pretension occasioned a Conference in Prince Eugene's quarters, where it was agreed, that the garrison of Fort-Scarpe should be allowed to march out with two cannon, two covered waggons, twenty others, and two days provisions; but they were to leave their muskets in the magazine. So the capitulation for the town and Fort-Scarpe were signed on the 26th, after fifty-two days open trenches. Pursuant to this capitulation, on the 29th, about ten in the morning, Albergotti, marched out of Doway (1) with his garrison (which amounted to no more than four thousand five hundred and twenty-seven men) and Lieutenant-General Hompesch took possession of the town as Governor. Brigadier Des Roques, Engineer-General of the States, was likewise made Governor of Fort-Scarpe at the same time. The Allies found in the place forty pieces of brass cannon, two hundred of iron, and eight mortars, with ammunition and small arms, but a very small stock of provisions (2). As soon as the trenches and other works before the place were levelled, and the breaches repaired, the Confederate Armies, being joined by several detachments, advanced to Vitry, and from thence to the camp at Villars-Brunin, Villars being likewise reinforced with several detachments, and having drained the garrisons of Condé, Quefroy, Valenciennes, and Cambray, instead of attacking the Confederates, incamped within his new lines from Arras, towards Miramont. The Confederate Generals finding it impracticable, either to attack the enemy, or besiege Arras, turned their army against Bethune (3), which was invested the 15th of July, N. S. and on the 29th of August the place was surrendered by Monsieur du Puy Vauban, who commanded there, and was nephew to the famous Engineer of that name.

During the siege of Bethune, Villars, with his army, marched out of their intrenchments, and positively declared, that he would attack the Confederates, and endeavour to raise the siege. Upon this the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene formed their armies in order of battle, and the Duke advanced with a detachment to Aug. 14 observe the French army, who, instead of preparing for a battle, were casting up a new line and intrenchments for the better security of their troops. On the 24th of August, the right wing of Prince Eugene's army foraged in the front towards St Pol near the enemy's camp, under a guard of five hundred horse, and one thousand Danish and Hessian foot. Villars, having notice of it the night before, detached thirty squadrons not last one month longer, which would have put the French under a necessity of keeping their word, or in the most infamous manner breaking it, to support a cause they had so often, and with so much seeming earnestness, promised to renounce. As it is, there is but one excuse for them,—which those, I am arguing against, had rather should not be made; and that is, to plead, that the case is altered: Affairs are not in the same condition they were in, when they made those promises. They have a political observatory at Paris, where the Marquis de Torcy and the French Ministers frequently examine what appearances there are in the heavens of all the countries in war with them; and according to these they take their measures of War and Peace; and it is by this they justify their assisting the Duke of Anjou. What passed in Spain, the 20th of August, they thought sufficiently balanced by what happened to the Northwest of them the 19th. What preceded that phenomenon, and has since followed it, has determined the French not only to support the Duke of Anjou, but to desert for the present from all further offers of Peace, by which we are as much plunged into the War, as we were seven years ago; and there seems no remedy for it, but, what is worse than the disease, an ill Peace.

(1) Doway, or Doway, a strong City of the Low-Countries, in the Earldom of Flanders, the Marquise of the territory of Doway. An University, subject to the French, and taken by them in 1667. It stands on the river Scarpe, between Artois and Hainault, thirteen miles almost North of Cambray, fifteen almost East of Arras, and thirty-five West of Mons.

(2) The French, according to their custom, very much magnified the loss sustained by the Allies in the siege of Doway. And it is certain, the reduction of so strong and important a place must be attended with no small danger and difficulty; and according to the computation, which was made by the Allies of their killed and wounded, there were three Lieutenant-Colonels, three Majors, twenty-three Captains, thirty-five Subalterns, one hundred Sergeants, and one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine private men killed: Two Lieutenant-Colonels, four Majors, fifty Captains, one hundred and fifty-two Subalterns, two hundred and forty-two Sergeants, and five thousand two hundred and sixty-seven private men wounded. Of the Artillery, fifty-four killed, and ninety-six wounded: Engineers, thirteen killed, and thirty-three wounded: Miners, twelve killed, and twelve wounded. Total at both attacks, two thousand one hundred and forty-two men killed, and five thousand eight hundred and sixty-five wounded.

A Nobleman, in his travels, was so extremely pleased with it, that he declared, it gave him such surprising ideas of the great loss of France, in the death of Monsieur Vauban (who drew the plan of it) that he could not but pass away a melancholy thought upon mortality, and regret the short duration of inventors of arts and sciences, when the works, that are done by them, are of so long continuance. It stands on the river Biette, eighteen miles North-west of Arras, and eighteen South-east of Aire.

They fell upon three squadrons of the Allies, which gave way; but the foragers, joining with their guard, beat the enemy back with great slaughter. However, the French growing too numerous, the Allies retired in very good order to an adjacent village, from whence the Danish and Hessian infantry made such a fire upon the enemy, that they lost a great many men. Villars advanced in person, and having surrounded that post, summoned the infantry to surrender, and, upon their refusal, ordered part of his horse to dismount and attack them; but they were so warmly received, that they retired in disorder. In the mean time the picket guard of the army advancing, and Prince Eugene marching with part of his cavalry, Villars thought fit to retreat, lest this skirmish should occasion a general engagement, having lost a great many men in this fruitless attempt, besides a Colonel, twenty other officers, with three hundred private men, who were made prisoners, and a booty of one hundred and fifty horses.

As Villars still declined an engagement, the Confederate Generals, in order to secure the head of the Lys, resolved to besiege St Venant (1) and Aire (2) at the same time. Both these places were invested on the 6th of September, and both surrendered on honourable terms. St Venant the 30th of September, and Aire the 9th of November.

Notwithstanding the great precaution of the Allies, for the security of their artillery and ammunition, which were to be used in these sieges, the enemy formed a design of surprising a convoy of several boats coming up the Lys from Ghent, under a guard of twelve hundred men, who were to be reinforced by another detachment. But Monsieur de Ravignan with four thousand men from Ypres, not far from Courtray, beat the guard; killed about two hundred men; took six hundred soldiers; blew up some boats laden with ammunition, sunk others laden with cannon-ball and bomb-shells, to interrupt the navigation of the Lys, and then retired with so much precaution, that a detachment of the Allies, sent out to cut off his retreat, could not effect it. There was no time lost in repairing the damages occasioned by this misfortune; and the country people were immediately summoned to weigh up the boats, which the enemy sunk in the Lys, and clear the passage of that river.

On the 26th of September, the Chevalier de Luxemburg having formed a design to surprise Fort-Scarpe, marched from Bouchain with a strong detachment to Pont-a-Rache, sent two hundred men in the night into the wood of Bellifonties near the Fort, and had two waggons loaded with hay, in which several grenadiers were concealed.

These waggons were driven by some other soldiers disguised as Boors, who were to seize the Barrier, and, upon a signal, to be supported by others, and then by the Chevalier himself. But Major-General Anania coming at the same time to visit General Hompesch, who, having some suspicion of the design of the enemy, was gone into the Fort to give the necessary orders for its security, left his guard without the Barrier, who walking their horses, and following the waggons by mere chance, the enemy believed they were discovered, and so ran away, leaving their Captain and one of their men prisoners.

Six days after the surrender of Aire, the Confederate armies broke up and marched into winter-quarters.

Thus ended the campaign in Flanders, which, though not of such lustre as the former, because no battle was fought, yet was, by military men, esteemed very extraordinary in this respect, that our men were about a hundred and fifty days in open trenches, a thing said to be without example.

Nothing considerable passed on the Rhine, they being equally unable to enter upon action on both sides. The French, who, in the winter, had threatened the Empire with a new invasion, were obliged to weaken their forces, in order to cover their frontiers, and strengthen their armies in the Neiderlands; and the Germans were not in a condition to improve so fair an opportunity of invading France. The Elector of Brunswick, who commanded the Imperial army, dissatisfied with these proceedings, desired leave to resign a command, from which, as he said, he could not promise himself any honour, nor the public expect any advantage. As he could not be prevailed with to desist from his purpose, the command of the army of the Empire was given to Count Grensfeld.

Nor was the campaign on the side of Piedmont more considerable than on the Rhine. The march of the Confederate troops met with such difficulties and delays, that the army was not formed till about the middle of July; and the Duke of Savoy, besides his former pretences for not putting himself at the head of the army, was now indisposed, as well as the Prince of Piedmont, his eldest son, and his brother, the Duke of Aosta. In this situation, Count de Thaun, Veldt-Marshal of the Imperial forces, took upon him the command of the Confederate army, the Piedmontese Generals being directed to comply in every thing with his orders. But, notwithstanding the preparations made to pass the Alps, and penetrate into Dauphiné, they found it impossible to force their way through the mountains; so that, after having dislodged the French from Arbés, and some other posts at the entrance of the valley of Barcelonnette, they gave over that design, and the army marched to Susa, where they continued, as long as the season permitted, to hinder the Duke of Berwick, who commanded the enemy's forces, from making any detachments into Spain. The French were so apprehensive of an invasion on the side of

Spain.
M. S.

The campaign this year in Spain was very remarkable, where both parties were conquerors and conquered by turns. In April a great Council of war was held (says our Author *) in which it was resolved to take the field on the first of May, and that the fleet (lately arrived at Barcelona, under the command of Sir John Norris) should immediately sail for Cagliari, to secure the Island of Sardinia, which was performed in a short time. Pursuant to this resolution, our army assembled near Agramont. The enemy, under the command of the Marquis de Villadarias, had already taken the field, and were incamped at Balaquer. Upon our approach they marched to Lerida, and we took possession of their camp. Here King Charles, with General Stanbope (who was come from Italy with money and a thousand recruits) came and reviewed the whole army. On the other hand, King Philip, who was likewise come to head his army, gave it out, that he was resolved to put all to a decisive battle; and, accordingly, the enemy, consisting of forty-two battalions and sixty squadrons, marched along the plain in our full view, in nine columns, to attack us. Marshal Staremberg immediately prepared to receive them, but they did not think fit to come within cannon-shot that day, and only drew up in battle on the hills on our left, from whence they could easily discern every thing in our camp. In the evening they retired to Belcaire, in the way to Balaquer, about four miles distant. The next day they came again, and, forcing in our grand guard, halted an hour or two; after which they marched towards our front, raised a battery, and began to fire. This was answered by one of ours, which did some execution on their foot. Having halted some time, they retired a second time to the same place, and were pursued by General Stanbope with some squadrons, who fell upon their rear, and killed several hundreds. A few days after, the enemy sent a large detachment, with six pieces of cannon, to take the town of Calaf, where we had some men, but they met with so warm a reception, that they were glad to return to their camp.

On the 15th of July, it was resolved in a Council of war, to march down the plain in our turn, and attack the enemy before they had passed the river at Lerida: But that evening, news being brought that all had passed, or would have passed before we could come up with them, that design was laid aside, and another was put in execution. The next morning some squadrons of dragoons, and twenty companies of grenadiers, with cannon and pontoons, marched very early to make a bridge over the Noguera at Alfaras, and the whole army followed. When our horse came upon the hills, they saw forty-two squadrons drawn up, with nine battalions, upon some high grounds near Almanara, who were followed by their whole army, which was in the valley, on the other side the hills. General

Stanbope, rightly judging that we had a fair opportunity of falling upon these squadrons before their whole army was joined, went with General Belcaire to King Charles (who was near with Marshal Staremberg and Count Attalaia) and pressed his Majesty very warmly to attack the enemy with the horse, sustained by the whole army; but, perceiving the King and the Marshal did not so readily come into his proposal as he expected, he said aloud, that, if they let slip so fair an opportunity, General Belcaire and he had orders to withdraw his troops, which he would instantly obey and leave the country. Upon these words he went away to a great number of General Officers and Colonels, who were got together about fifty paces from the King, viewing the enemy, and expecting what news the General would bring them. In a few minutes, Count Attalaia came to Stanbope from the King, to inform him that he complied with his desire and advice, but wanted to know, Who was to command? Who but myself, answered the General, being the Lieutenant General of the day. He immediately sends his Aid de Camps to the regiments he intended to take with him, with orders to mount and follow him. These were all the horse and dragoons of our left, in all sixteen squadrons. The rest of the horse were commanded by the Marshal to follow, and all the foot to form and be ready to march. Or-train to fix a battery of six guns upon a rising ground on our left. The sun was not above half an hour high, when General Stanbope marched up to the enemy, who were in two lines, twenty-two squadrons in the first, and in the second, twenty, besides the nine battalions who were a little behind them on their right. Stanbope put himself at the head of the first squadron of Harvey's horse, and Carpenter at the head of the other. He made a very short speech to the men, and desired them to keep very close, and not break themselves, for he was sure they would be as firm as a rock, and all the enemy's squadrons could not break them. Then he marched and attacked the Guards commanded by General Amessaga, who, as their horses closed, spoke some words to him, which Stanbope answered with a stroke of his sword, that killed the Spaniard. The whole squadron, as indeed all the rest, animated with the example of their General, performed wonders, pushed the first line upon the second, and entirely routed the Spanish horse. The nine battalions ran away, and all were pursued till dark. We lay upon our arms all night, and the next day incamped on the field of battle. In this short Action we took Lieutenant-General Verboon, and lost the Earl of Rockfort and Count Francis Nassau, both killed at the head of their regiments of dragoons, and both Officers of great merit and distinction. About four hundred men were killed and wounded on our side; but the enemy's loss was considerable, the number of their slain and wounded not being less than fifteen hundred. Many more would have been made prisoners, if our men, in the heat of the action, could have charged themselves with them. The enemy

1710. enemy retired that night in such haste to Lerida, that they left behind a great deal of their baggage (amongst which was some of King Philip's plate) and in two days marched on towards Saragoza, the Capital of the Kingdom of Aragon.

We left our camp of Almanara to pursue them, and took the castle of Monjon, and fortified the head of the bridge. From hence a thousand horse were detached to seize the town of Albastro, and the day after a thousand foot, with four pieces of cannon, were sent to the town of Stadilla, which was defended by above five hundred men, and where the enemy had some magazines, which were all taken. Stanbope marched all that night for Sarimana, where he found two regiments of horse, which he soon put to flight. A party of four hundred horse marched to Candamos, and surprized a convoy of forty waggons with stores, sixty laden mules, and two thousand sheep, guarded by two troops of horse, which they routed and brought away the whole convoy. This supply was very acceptable in a country, where provisions for man and beast began to grow very scarce, being at so great a distance from Barcelona, where our magazines were.

On the 2d of August General Stanbope, after having been away several days with two thousand horse, joined the army, and all marched to Cajadin. Here we saw the enemy plant their camp near Fraga on the other side the river Cinca, which it was resolved we should pass that evening to attack them the next morning: But they marched all night towards Saragoza, so that instead of fighting we were put to a long and tedious march after them, in which we overtook part of their rear, and several skirmishes ensued, which might have drawn us into a general battle, very much to our disadvantage; because the main of our army was still at a distance over a very long heath, where no water was to be found, and the weather excessively hot; whilst the enemy's were altogether behind a brook and such high eminences as were almost inaccessible, and the ford, through which they had passed the brook very narrow. When General Stanbope came up to the advanced guard, and to some squadrons sent to sustain it, he immediately formed all the horse of the left, and sent with all speed the Generals Belcastel and Wills to march up the foot as fast as they could. Presently after Marshal Staremburg came up with the right of our horse and formed immediately; for the enemy was not then half a mile from us. Fresh orders were sent to the foot and artillery to make all possible haste. The enemy sent several small parties to the rising grounds to observe us. Some of their horse came through the narrow ford, but, when they saw ours drawn up, they quickly retired. At last the foot and train being arrived, dispositions were made to receive the enemy, if they thought fit to come from behind their strong natural intrenchment and attack us: but they suffered our army to refresh themselves after so great a fatigue, and marched away in the night, leaving at a small town on this side of the ford, some of their baggage, which was secured the next morning. Here we rested ourselves that night without pitching our tents, and early in the morning marched after the enemy to the large town of Candamos, where we were in danger of perishing with thirst, there being neither pump, nor well, nor cistern in the place, but only one large pond of water, which the troopers, as they came up, marched their horses into, and by that means the water was so spoiled, that it could not be used. The pond was supplied by two springs, which the foot-soldiers entirely ruined by their great eagerness to come at the water. Wine was as scarce as water, none being to be found in the Town, nor even in the Convent, and what the butlers had was all turned four (1). We were glad to march out of this place the next morning, but found ourselves in as great distress for want of water as the day before, till we came to Bucarelos, where we incamped, the enemy still retiring before us. At break of day the army marched on in four columns, in expectation of overtaking the enemy, but were disappointed, and instead of them had to encounter, on our march to Ufesa on the Ebro, with violent thirst and heat, without a drop of water; and, to incommode us the more, the enemy had set fire to a very long heath, we were to pass over. It is not to be conceived what we suffered upon such a march, smothered, all that day with clouds of ashes, especially the foot. About five in the evening, and not before, the horse of both lines got to the river Ebro, whose waters did not a little refresh us. Some Generals rid up by the river-side, and discovered at a small distance the tops of the enemy's colours behind a rising-ground. A party of Hussars being ordered to advance, brought word in a quarter of an hour, that their army was there in a marching posture. Staremburg instantly made a disposition, in case they should come back, and the foot formed as they came up. We stayed upon our arms till night, when we could hear the enemy's drums, who then began to march to Saragoza.

General Stanbope, perceiving no great inclination in the Marshal to pass the river that night, prevailed so far as to have Carpenter detached with two thousand horse to ford it over, and went with him as a volunteer. We expected to hear every moment, that the pontons were ordered to be laid over the river for the whole enemy to pass; but no such thing, till at last the Generals Belcastel, Wills, Frauenberg, and Lepel went to Staremburg, and, after a long consultation, gained the point, in which it was said, the Marshal was determined by the King, as well as convinced by the reasons of the Generals. The pontons, after this, were laid with all expedition, and the army began to pass the river between one and two in the morning, on the 8th of August. Carpenter, finding the enemy were gone to Saragoza, marched with his detachment of horse by the side of the Ebro, over-against Villa-Franca, and having notice that the army had passed the river, he marched as an advanced guard towards that city, where he found the enemy's horse drawn up. We marched with great speed, and came in the evening

ning before the town, where we saw the enemy's whole army in order of battle (being within less than cannon-shot of them) on a rising ground on the right of the city. Here we continued all night on our arms, and some of the horse moved towards us, as if they intended to surprize us, but we were too well upon our guard for them to attempt any thing that night.

When General Stanhope viewed the enemy's disposition that evening, he observed their right line was extended far beyond our left, theirs consisting of thirty-two squadrons, and ours of twenty. Whereupon he formed a design, which he communicated at supper to some Officers, and which proved of great service the next day. He commanded the left of the army, and the body of reserve under Brigadier Hamilton was by the Marshal ordered to obey his directions. This body consisted of eight squadrons of Portuguese horse, who were clothed in red. The General rightly judged the enemy would take them for English (as they did) and so resolved to have them drawn up before the battle at a distance from his left, and to flank it, all which succeeded to his wish.

Saragoza.
M. S.

The next morning very early the cannon began to fire on both sides. The most part of the morning was spent in viewing the lines and making alterations. King Charles with Marshal Staremberg rid from the right to the left, notwithstanding the danger, which animated the troops. The convoy of bread was expected every moment, and was much wanted, considering the last three days march, but it came not before the signal for the attack was given; so that the soldiers, as well as many officers, fought with empty bellies. General Stanhope was obliged to march the horse more to the left, by reason of a very large dry ditch made by the torrents, that come down from the hills, and which is very famous in the history of Aragon; for here it was, that King Ferdinand overthrew the Moors, and made such a slaughter of them, that the ditch is from thence called, the Ditch of the Slain *. We lost many men this morning, who, pressed by hunger and thirst, ventured to go and gather grapes in the vale between the two armies, and were shot by the enemy's advanced guard. Major-General Wade came to the left some time before the attack, and advised General Stanhope, besides his other project (which he much liked) to have three or four battalions sent for, to interline with his squadrons, which was done, and they performed very great service. About noon the signal for battle was given; the body of reserve immediately marched up and flanked our left, which had the desired effect; for the enemy observing this body of red coats beyond our line, ordered ten or twelve squadrons of their right to march and attack them. General Stanhope soon came up with the enemy's horse, which he did not find much superior to his, by reason of the detachment just made, but still they were superior. He received their fire, which killed and wounded some men, which put two squadrons into disorder, but they rallied in an instant. Then the whole left fell upon the enemy sword in hand with such order and courage, that, notwithstanding an obstinate resistance, the first line was entirely broke. The second made but a short stand, and ran away with the first. They were pursued very far, and in the flight many were taken and killed. Our right and center were no less successful. For their left wing of horse was overpowered and put to flight in a short time by our right. The foot indeed made a longer defence, which lasted above two hours, but with such slaughter of their men, that the field of battle was covered with the dead. The enemy's horse of the left wing being gone, and our right being come up to the walls of the City, our horse had time to breathe, for the ground would not permit them to be in the lines, and the right of our foot was close to the walls. Here the Marshal was at the head of his own regiment, making it fire by platoons, as regularly as any of ours do at their exercise. The detachment, the enemy had made against the body of reserve, put them to flight as was expected, and pursued them a great way, till they found their mistake. Then returning towards the field of battle, and finding their right was gone off, they fell very furiously upon our battery, cut to pieces all the guard, and killed or wounded all the Officers and men belonging to it. Our author (a chaplain in the army) was upon the battery, and first discovered these squadrons advancing towards it; upon which he thought it high time to secure himself by galloping away to our right. When he came there, though the field of battle (which, says he, was a terrible sight) he met close by the walls with General Wetzel, whom he informed of the success of our left, and of what the enemy's detachment of horse was doing in our rear. Wetzel desired him to go to the Marshal, and sent his Aid de Camp with him. He found the Marshal (as was said before) exercising his men against a brigade, that had turned their backs upon us. When he told him, that General Stanhope had defeated the enemy's right, and was pursuing them, but that ten or twelve squadrons were in our rear and falling upon our batteries: That is no great matter (says the Marshal) if General Stanhope has beat the right, we are sure of a complete victory. And so indeed it proved, for quickly after all the foot threw down their arms and ran away, or were taken prisoners. However, upon the intelligence given the Marshal, he ordered Wetzel to be upon his guard, and prevent any surprise from those squadrons, who, in a few minutes, came in sight of our rear; but upon our first motion galloped away and were seen no more. A great slaughter was made of the enemy's foot, to the number of five or six thousand, and above seven thousand were taken prisoners. We took all their colours and cannon, and should have made more prisoners, had the horse of our right had room to pursue them; but the situation was such, that they could not pass by or through the foot. However the victory was entire and glorious, considering the great disproportion of numbers, the enemy having sixty squadrons to our forty-seven, and forty-two battalions to our thirty-three. The army incamped that night in a very commodious and pleasant ground near the City.

King Charles, in the evening, entered Saragoza, attended by most of the General Officers, and was received with loud acclamations by the people, who looked upon him as their deliverer from the yoke they had so long groaned under, and as come to restore them to the form and privileges of their ancient Government, which had been taken from them. And in this he answered

1710. answered their expectations; for the King's first care, that very night, was to abolish the Castilian Government (which had been introduced by King Philip, and consisted of Chancellors, Syndics, &c. in every City, of his appointment) and gave them their old Magistrates or Jurats, as well in the Kingdom of Aragon, as in Valencia and Catalonia, who are chosen by the people. During the public rejoicings, the populace fell upon the houses of King Philip's Magistrates in a very riotous manner, and committed great outrages, as they did also upon all the persons of distinction, that were reputed to be better affected to the House of Bourbon than to that of Austria. Nor would this tumult have been so soon appeased, if parties of soldiers had not been sent to disperse them.

In this large City we found very considerable stores of all sorts of provision, ammunition, and entire cloathings of regiments. The situation of Saragoza is extremely pleasant, being seated on the river Ebro, in a very plentiful country, abounding with every thing necessary for the support and convenience of life. The streets are broad and long, adorned on both sides with stately palaces, belonging to the Grandeas of the Kingdom of Aragon. This City was the delight of Julius Cæsar, who erected here a very magnificent palace for himself (inhabited now by the Archbishop) and built a large stone-bridge over the Ebro, opposite the middle of the town, with a great number of arches, which is now as firm and strong as if it was a modern structure. To perpetuate the memory of his benefactions to this City, he called it after his own name, Cæsaris Augusta. Here the army refreshed themselves, after their fatigues, a whole week, which time was employed by King Charles, in settling the civil Government of this Kingdom upon the old establishment, and not in diversions.

The Generals were daily consulting among themselves what was proper to be done to improve their late success, in order to put an end to the war, and fix King Charles on the Throne of Spain. A great Council of war was held, in which it was resolved to march to Madrid. General Stanbope did not think fit to lay before this Council a project of his own (which he had communicated only to one or two friends, particularly to General Wade) because the march towards Madrid was, for some days, in the way to the place he intended to propose. On the 16th of August, we broke up our camp at Saragoza, and were seven days before we reached Calatayud, where we halted three days. At this place a Council of war was held, in which General Stanbope opened his project, namely, That, since there was no bodies of the enemy able to oppose our march to Madrid, a strong detachment should be sent to Pampeluna (which was not very far from Calatayud) the only pass by which the French could send any forces into Spain: That all we had to fear was from the French reinforcements; and, if that pass was well secured, they could not penetrate into Spain but by Gironne, on the other side of the Kingdom: That, if our forces once took post at Pampeluna, they could not be dislodged by all the troops the French King could send to the assistance of his Grandson: That there we might have fresh troops, sent us from England and Holland, and not only troops, but all manner of necessaries, it being a much shorter voyage to the Bay of Biscay, than to any Port in the Mediterranean: That, if they could prevent any succours from joining the enemy the latter end of this year, such measures might be taken in the winter, as would secure the quiet possession of the Kingdom. These, with many other reasons, were urged by General Stanbope, and heard with surprise. He answered, in a very plain and satisfactory manner, all the objections that were made against his proposal, but his answers did not content all the Members of the Council, who perhaps had their private views (1). However, Marshal Staremberg approved of this well-concerted project; but, as his single approbation was not sufficient to bring over the rest, it was resolved the whole army should march to Madrid, which gave General Stanbope a very great concern, and very justly; for, had his project been put in execution, it would very probably have soon brought the war to a happy conclusion, and prevented the shocking turn of affairs, which happened in less than three months (2).

On the first of September we got to Seguença, a City of Castile. Here another Council of war was held, and it was again resolved to continue our march towards Madrid. On the 9th, the army arrived at Alcala; and, the next day, General Stanbope went with a thousand horse to Madrid, followed by all the troops. King Charles came thither the 17th, but made no stay. He found none of the Grandeas there, and it appeared, that the Castilians were firmly united to King Philip, and resolved to adhere to him at all hazards. A detachment was sent to take and fortify Toledo; and about that City, and the neighbouring Country, the army continued in several incampments till the latter end of October, when they began to march into cantons. The King of France now shewed he was resolved to maintain his Grandson, since, if it had ever been his intention, it was now very easy to oblige him to evacuate Spain. But he had no such design, but the contrary, as appeared by his proceedings*. For after the battle of Saragoza, which had caused a great consternation in the Court of France, it was resolved in a Council at Verfailles, that the Duke of Vendosme should immediately set out for Navarre, and put himself at the head of the remains of the Spanish troops, which were to be reinforced with detachments from several parts of France. King Philip, after the battle, got off with a very small body to Madrid. But he soon left it, and retired with all the tribunals following him to Valadolid, and sent his Queen and son to Victoria. Some of his troops got off in small bodies, and these and others, asserting, That a certain foreign General (meaning Stanbope) with some Spanish General Officers, prevailed with King Charles to march into Castile, in opposition to the opinion of Staremberg and Belcassel.

1710. these were in a little time brought together to the number of ten thousand men; the troops, they had on the frontier of Portugal, were brought to join them, with which they soon made up the face of an army. The Duke of Vendosme, in the beginning of September, arrived at Bayonne, and orders being given for the garriſons of Pampeluna, Jaca, and other towns in Nivarni, to march and join the Spaniſh army, he and the Duke de Noailles purſued their journey to Spain. When they came to Valladolid, where King Philip kept his Court, it was reſolved in a Council of war, that the Duke de Noailles ſhould return to Paris, and from thence proceed with the utmoſt diligence to Rouſſillon, in order to act offensively in Catalonia, and that, as ſoon as the Spaniſh army was recruited, the Duke of Vendosme ſhould repair thither.

In the mean time, though the French were preparing to ſupport King Philip's broken affairs, no care was taken by the Allies to ſupply or ſupport King Charles. We were ſo engaged in our party-matters at home, that we ſeemed to take no thought of things abroad, and without us nothing could be done. The Court of Vienna was ſo apprehenſive of the danger of a war, like to break out between the Grand Signior and the Czar, that they would not diminiſh their army in Hungary. But to return to the army in Spain.

On the 5th of November a Council was held, in which it was reſolved, that Toledo ſhould be abandoned, and King Charles ſhould move towards Saragoza, and the army follow in a few days. Accordingly, on the 22d, the Generals of the ſeveral Nations began to march ſeparately at the head of their reſpective troops, and all were ordered into cantons in the neighbourhood of Ciſuentes, where Marſhal Staremberg with the Germans was to canton. Colonel Du Bourgay, with his regiment, was detached two days before to guard the train, and march to the ſame place. Count Atalaya came, on the 25th, to Aſignan with all the Portugueſe going to his cantons. Brigadier Lepel marched out by order with his own and Richards's regiment to Gargules, within a few miles of Ciſuentes, where, on the 27th, Staremberg, who was then getting into that town with the Germans, ſent him word by his Aid de Camp, Major Nugent, to make all poſſible haſte to join him, left he ſhould be ſurprized by the active French Partizan Vaillejo, who was at the head of a thouſand horſe (1). Lepel with the two regiments got into Ciſuentes, in the cloſe of the evening, without being attacked. The Brigadier (in company with our Author) waited preſently after upon Staremberg, whom he had not ſeen ſince the beginning of September, having been upon a ſeparate command. In above an hour's converſation the Marſhal told the Brigadier, he hoped he thought him very kind to receive him that night into his head-quarters among his Germans, for that he ſhould have marched on to Bribuega, the canton of the Engliſh, where, he had received a letter, General Stanbope was arrived with his troops; but he hoped Colonel Du Bourgay would come up that night with the train, and the three regiments might march together the next day to Bribuega without any great riſque. And ſo Brigadier Lepel took his leave.

per, and Gore, with the Engliſh forces, marched along the Tajuna, and on the 26th of Novem- ber, came to their canton at Bribuega, a town of about a thouſand houſes, ſituated on the ſide of a hill near that river. The next day a body of the enemy appeared about three on the hills above the town, to the great ſurprize of the Engliſh, who had ſeen no troops in their march from Clincon to Bribuega, except ſome ſmall ſtraggling parties of horſe: Nor had they any intelligence of an army being aſſembled, though all poſſible care had been uſed, and great rewards promiſed to get early notice of it; ſo well affected were the Caſtilians to their King Philip. The Duke of Vendosme, having joined the Spaniſh army with freſh ſuccours, had marched three days and three nights with incredible expedition; and the foot, which appeared on the hills over Bribuega, were brought thither behind the troopers; but the whole army and train did not come up till late that night. This army conſiſted of thirty-two battalions (which had been reduced from forty-five to that number) and eight thouſand horſe, with thirty-two pieces of cannon, ſome whereof were twenty-four pounders. That very night Vendosme ſent a ſummons to General Stanbope, which was answered as uſual in ſuch caſes. Stanbope diſpatched Captain Coffey, his Aid de Camp, to Staremberg, to inform him of his unexpected and unhappy ſituation, which, it was ſaid, might have been prevented, if an advanced guard had been kept on the high grounds; for they might have given notice of the enemy's approach time enough for our troops to retire to Ciſuentes. This, it is affirmed, was the advice of one of our Generals*, which unfortunately was not followed. In the night the enemy marched ſome of their foot, and took poſſeſſion of the bridge over the Tajuna. * Suppoſe to be Carpenter.

The next day about noon many regiments, with their colours flying, came and ſurrounded the town within cannon-ſhot. We had no artillery, and ſo little ammunition (which was reſerved for the attack) that we could not moleſt them. Their whole army joined, and made four different attacks at once, which were ſoon turned into breaches in the ruinous wall. Our troops were diſpoſed in excellent order for a vigorous defence, every attack being defended by a General Officer. The enemies opened one of the gates with their cannon, made a large breach, and gave a general aſſault, but were repulſed. At laſt about eight hundred men got into the town and into houſes, from whence they made a terrible fire, which we could not answer, our ammunition being quite ſpent; ſo that about ſunſet it was thought adviſable to bear a parley, and thoſe brave troops, that had behaved ſo gallantly all the campaign, were forced to ſurrender priſoners of war, and to march out the next day towards Valladolid and the neighbouring towns, where they were to remain (2).

Captain Cosby, who was sent to Marshal Stanhope with an account of General Stanhope's being surprized, did not come to Cifuentes till late at night. The Marshal immediately sent to the Generals of the three Nations, the Portuguese, Dutch and Palatines, to march their troops with all possible Expedition to Cifuentes. They were indeed cantoned in towns very near, and got ready so quickly, that at break of day they were all assembled before one of the gates of the town. The Marshal had ordered the Germans to beat to arms, which much alarmed us (says our Author, who was then with Lepel at Cifuentes) and we were not a little surprized to see, upon opening one of Brigadier Lepel's windows, great bodies of troops close to the walls; but it was so dark we could not distinguish what they were. An Officer sent by the Brigadier to the Marshal brought word, that the English were surrounded in Bribuega by the enemy; that the troops about the town were our own; and that he must not lose a moment to get ready to march. This order was immediately obeyed, and we were out before we could well see. The Germans came out soon after, and the Marshal himself about eight o'clock, when we expected to march every minute; but he was resolved to stay for Du Bourgay's regiment and the train. At last, after waiting three hours in vain, about eleven, orders were given to march, and Brigadier Lepel was sent back with his regiment to meet Du Bourgay. We passed the Tajuna at Olmeda, and marched through such very narrow and difficult roads, that it was quite dark before we were clear of the defiles, and got to the high grounds in the way to Bribuega. As soon as our field-train (which had much retarded our march) came up to the ground, where we lay that night on our arms, the Marshal ordered several pieces of cannon to be fired, as a signal to General Stanhope, that we were marching to his relief; but it was too late and to no purpose; for they were not heard, it being just at the time the enemy got into the town, when they made their last and greatest fire before the capitulation began. So it may truly be said, that the saving one regiment was the cause of our losing such a considerable body of English. For, had we marched to the relief of Bribuega, as soon as all the troops were ready about Cifuentes, we should have been there between two and three in the afternoon, and very probably saved that valuable part of our army; for the enemy must have either retired or fought between two fires. About eight, Brigadier Lepel joined us, with Du Bourgay's regiment and the train, having skirmished above three hours with Vailejo, who had pursued them till they came to the army.

On the 29th, early in the morning, we marched upon four columns toward Bribuega, though it was believed Stanhope had surrendered; the firing of small arms having been heard by the advanced guard, from the time we came to that ground. About eleven the Marshal, with his Adjutant General, and some Aids de Camp, went about half a mile before the army to try whether he could get a sight of the town from the rising ground. After some minutes some smoke was discovered to rise from the bottom between the hills, and he was soon satisfied there was the place, by hearing the enemy's horse marching up the high grounds before he could see them; but it was not long before he saw them plain enough, upon which he galloped back, and ordered his army to form. The enemy was also forming; but their lines extended as far again as ours, consisting of twenty-five thousand men to our thirteen thousand. Between twelve and one, the armies began to cannonade one another; but as the enemy saw how weak we were since the loss of the British troops, they soon began the attack on their right, flanking and almost surrounding our left, which had no more than thirteen weak squadrons who behaved very ill, and ran away as soon as the enemy charged them (1.) By that means our foot were left to mercy, and two English battalions, two Dutch, four Palatines, two Spanish, and one Neapolitan, were cut in pieces or taken prisoners. Here the Generals Belcastle and St. Anand were killed, besides many Field-officers and others. By good fortune, the victorious right, instead of pursuing their blow, fell to plundering the baggage of the whole army, which was very considerable, and could not stir from the place, Vailejo being in the rear of it with his party. Besides the baggage they met with another great booty. Many persons of quality and distinction (chiefly Ladies and Ecclesiastics) having left Madrid to follow King Charles to Saragoza or Barcelona, fell into their hands with a great number of coaches, and all the riches they could bring away. Unfortunately for them they came into the field of battle, which was on the high-road, just before the action began, and could not proceed, for fear of falling into the hands of the Partisan Vailejo.

The enemy's right being thus employed, the Marshal fought the left with great slaughter and success till night, when both horse and foot retired in disorder. The Duke of Vendosme, with King Philip (who was present during the whole action) galloped away in such haste, that they passed by the English prisoners before they got to Guadalaxara. Thus the Marshal remained master of the field, took all their cannon, and retook ours, but was forced to nail it all up for want want of mules to draw it away. The Germans made use of their Chevrons de Vite, which were of singular service, and the Portuguese horse behaved very well. Some of their squadrons were mixed with the foot, and fell upon the enemy's infantry sword in hand, as soon as ours had put them in disorder, and made a very great slaughter. It was computed the next day that no less than seven thousand were killed on the spot, besides the wounded. General Frankenberg and Brigadier Lepel had rallied the horse on the left, within half a mile of the field, and would have marched them to Count Staremberg; but they were seized with such a panic at the sight of some straggling squadrons, that they galloped away the second time, and did not stop in three or four miles, when we overtook them in small parties, and made up at last a body of about six hundred horse with which we made haste to Siguencia, lest Vallier should overtake us, who followed us so close, that we did not halt above three hours in that City, but continued on long marches, till we got to Saragoza (1).

Staremberg, who had suffered so much in the action, that he was not in a condition to pursue the enemy, left the field of Villa Viciosa, and marched with his army to Saragoza, the enemy not thinking it convenient to give him any disturbance. As he did not judge it safe to stay long in deza, he marched into Catalonia, and the Duke of Vendosme with his army, came and took possession of Saragoza; two days after, to the inexpressible grief and great loss of the Aragonese.

The Marshal, though closely pursued by several parties of the enemy, passed the Cinca and Noguera, and, leaving a small garrison in Balaguer, came, in the beginning of February, to Barcelona with the remains of his army. Some days before his arrival, Count Tattenbach, Governor of Gironne, was obliged to capitulate. The French under the Command of the Duke of Noailles, had invested that place in December, the very day King Charles came to Barcelona, and had carried on the siege with great resolution, notwithstanding the difficulties they met with, both from the badness of the weather, and the vigorous defence of the garrison, who obtained very honourable terms. Not long after upon the approach of the Marquis de Valdecannas with a body of troops, in order to attack Balaguer, the garrison, which Count Staremberg in his march had left there, consisting of two battalions and one hundred horse, thought fit to abandon the place; so that King Charles's affairs had now a very ill aspect, being confined within the narrow bounds of the principality of Catalonia, which, by the loss of Gironne, was open to the enemies on all sides. On the other hand, King Philip gained this summer a very material advantage, by having unquestionable demonstrations of the affection of the Castilians, which neither his defeats at Almanara and Saragoza, nor his retreat from Madrid, nor the presence of King Charles with a veteran victorious army, were able to shake.

The Spanish Grandees seemed indeed to be in some apprehension of their being given up

(1) The affair of Bribuaga has been variously related, and General Stanbope much censured, but by this account of an eye-witness, he was by no means to be blamed. Our author undertakes to answer the falsties published in a pamphlet called the Romance, (wherein General Stanbope is introduced under the name of Celfus) particularly those relating to this affair.

The Romance says, Celfus was left at Bribuaga by Count Staremberg with the English troops and some battalions of the Dutch, to cover his march as well as the cannon and heavy baggage, being himself to incamp about three leagues further, and that he gave him orders to come and join him the next day.

To this our Author answers: That Celfus was not left at Bribuaga to cover the Count's march, is very plain from the disposition that was made some days before, when it was resolved in a Council of war, that the army should canton upon the borders of Arragon, to secure that Kingdom. Bribuaga then fell to the English for their canton, as Cifuentes did to the Germans for theirs; and the towns and villages near Cifuentes to the troops of other nations.

That there were no battalions of the Dutch in Bribuaga, is evident from this, that none of them were taken in that town with the English: Neither was the cannon or heavy baggage there, both being with Count Staremberg's army at the battle of Villa Viciosa; and one may easily conclude, that, had Celfus had the English train with him, he would not have surrendered with such a considerable body of English officers and soldiers, who had signalized themselves all that campaign, and were flushed with victory and success; but would have given time to Count Staremberg to have come to his relief.

But the most malicious falsehood of all is, that Celfus had orders to join Count Staremberg the next day.

Count Staremberg could have given no such orders, since Bribuaga, as I have observed before, was the canton assigned to the whole English body of troops and artillery; and where they were to continue till Count Staremberg thought fit to remove the whole army from their several cantons.

The truth of this will appear from the following narration: The same day that the troops marched into their cantons, Brigadier Lepel's regiment of dragoons, which was within four or five miles of Cifuentes, and where it was left to secure Du Bourg's regiment from falling into the hands of Vailley's Partisan, received orders from Count Staremberg to march with all haste into Cifuentes. The regiment lost no time, and narrowly escaped the Partisan with his thousand horse, who fell upon some part of the rear of the Germans, as they were marching into that town.

About seven that Evening, Brigadier Lepel waited on Count Staremberg who told him that he was resolved to cover the Kingdom of Arragon, and secure it from the insults of the enemy: That he had ordered the troops into several cantons, each nation by itself: That the English had Bribuaga, and he wished all the regiments were there together. But till Du Bourg's was come up, he would suffer Lepel's dragoons to continue with him in Cifuentes, and that, as soon as it had joined, the three regiments of Lepel, Richards, and Du Bourg, with the train, would be able to make their way to Bribuaga, without any danger from Vailley's party. Now let it be judged, whether this is consistent with what the Romance tells us, That Celfus had orders to join Count Staremberg the next day? Neither is there more truth in what it relates, That Celfus dispatched one of his Aids de Camp to Count Staremberg, to let him know that he thought proper to rest his troops one day more at Bribuaga, but that he would certainly join him the day after, since no other Aid de Camp was sent from Bribuaga to Count Staremberg, but Mr. Cody, who came to acquaint him late in the evening, that the enemy's troops had surrounded that town.

It appears also from our Author's account, why Staremberg

1710. by the French; and there was a suspicion of some caballing among them: Upon which the Duke of Medina Celi, King Philip's chief Minister, was sent a close prisoner to the castle of Segovia, and was kept there very strictly, none being admitted to speak with him. He was not brought to any examination; but, after he had been some months in prison, being often removed from one place to another, it was at last given out that he died in prison, not without the suspicion of ill practices*.

Nothing material happened this year in Portugal, except only, that, about the beginning of July, the Marquis de Bay, who commanded the Spanish Forces in Estremadura, made himself master of the town of Miranda de Duero by surprize; took in it four hundred men of regular troops and militia; and then formed the blockade of Bragança, which was raised by the Marquis de Risbourg, upon the news of the battle of Saragoza; and soon after the Portuguese took from the Spaniards, Xeres de los Cavaleros, Barcarota, Alcanza, and Puebla, places of no great consideration. Some time before, the Earl of Galway, who found himself useless in Portugal, had desired and readily obtained leave to return to England.

The Czar of Muscovy made a very considerable improvement of his great Victory at Pultowa; for in this year's campaign he reduced to his obedience Elbing, in Polish Prussia; Wyburgh, the Capital of Carelia; Kenholm, in Finland;

Aremberg, in the island of Oesel; Pernau, Revel, Riga, the Dunamunder-fort, and, in a word, all Livonia, the most valuable province in the Swedish dominions. It is very probable, the united forces of the Czar and King Augustus would have made a greater progress; but, the Allies having, with great wisdom taken early measures, and interposed their good offices and power, to prevent the northern war from spreading into the Empire, the province of Pomerania, where General Crassau had retired out of Poland, enjoyed a perfect tranquillity. The treaty, or project of neutrality, which was made for that purpose, was accepted by the Czar and King Augustus, and by the King of Denmark with some exceptions; as it was by the Regency of Stockholm for the Swedes; though the last did it only to serve a turn. For their Czarish and Polish Majesties demanding, that the troops under General Crassau should be either disbanded, or put into the service of the Allies; this last was not agreed to by the Swedes, though a treaty was set on foot for that purpose. At the same time the Swedish Ministers at Vienna, Ratisbon, and other places, notified that their master, who still continued at Bender, was dissatisfied with that neutrality: And, on the other hand, notwithstanding the earnest endeavours of the British and Dutch Ministers at the Ottoman Porte to baffle the artifices of the French and Swedes, the Grand Signior by the advice of the Cham of Tartary, resolved at last, openly to espouse the quarrel remberg delay'd his marching to Stanhope's relief so many hours; namely, his waiting for Du Bourg's regiment and the train, though he marched without them at last. Bishop Burnet indeed says, Staremberg might have come time enough to have saved Stanhope, but he moved so slowly, that it was conjectured, he envied the glory that General had got, and was not sorry to see it eclipsed, and therefore made not that haste he might and ought to have done. But this, as the Bishop observes, is only conjecture.

The following Letter was writ by Brigadier Lepel, to the Lord Dartmouth, then Secretary of State, concerning the Brihuega affair, and the battle of Villa Viciosa:

My Lord,
Saragossa, Dec. 10. 1710. O. S.

I think myself obliged to inform your Lordship of the misfortune that has befallen her Majesty's troops, in our retreat from Castile towards the borders of Arragon. The army marched upon three columns, the Generals of each nation at the head of their own people: General Stanhope led the Left, and the rear of all, and had with him the regiments of Harvey, Raby, Pepper, and his own, of the foot-guards; and Harri-son's, Wade's, Dormer's, Boules's, Munden's, Gore's, and Dalzell's regiments. The enemy had detached some squadrons to observe him. On Sunday the 26th of November, O. S. he got into a little walled town in the mountains of Castile, called Brihuega, where he resolved to halt a day and refresh his men and horses, who were much fatigued by their long marches, especially the last, which was of seven leagues. But, being among enemies from whom no intelligence could be had, though he had offered large sums to encourage the peasants, he was invested that very night by the enemy's whole army. The 27th, they erected three batteries against the town, which in a short time made very considerable breaches. That night Mr. Stanhope sent out with much difficulty Captain Cosby, his Aid de Camp, to inform the Marshal of his condition. The Marshal, who was at Cifuentes, four leagues from Brihuega with the German troops, gathered immediately all the rest of his army, and marched the 28th to endeavour to relieve Mr. Stanhope; but the road was so difficult by reason of the defiles through the mountains, that the army could not advance that day above two leagues. The 29th we began to march at break of day, and got by noon to the rising grounds above Brihuega, within half a league of the town; where having halted a short time, and perceiving no signals from Mr. Stanhope, the Marshal concluded he was taken, and resolved to attack the enemy, who soon after marched to us in order of battle.

The cannonading began about one on both sides; and between three and four, their right attacked our left with much vigour, which was soon overpowered by their great numbers, they having by the best accounts we can get, eighty squadrons, and about forty battalions, and we in the whole not above ten thousand men, and on our left, not seven hundred horse; thus was our horse forced to retire, and our foot was almost cut to pieces. The right of their horse in the pursuit of ours, fell in with the baggage, and betook themselves to plunder. The Marshal improved that opportunity, and with his right fell upon the enemy with such bravery and conduct, that he put them to the route, retook our cannon, took theirs, and remained master of the field, where he continued till eight of the clock the next day; and, for want of mules to carry away the cannon, was obliged to nail them up; and then began his march towards Arragon to get bread and provisions for his army; where he is now at a place called Daroca, gathering his people from all parts, in order to secure this country.

As to Mr. Stanhope, what I can learn, which comes from some soldiers that have made their escape, and some of the enemy's officers that were taken in the battle, is this: That he was attacked several times at three different breaches the day before the battle, and always repulsed the enemy; but at last, for want of ammunition, was forced to surrender prisoners of war; that he began to capitulate about seven in the evening, and marched out the 29th about noon; that besides 1710. quarrel of the King of Sweden. The Muscovite Ambassador at Constantinople, was seized and confined; and not long after the Grand Signior declared war against the Czar, having, for that purpose sent circular letters by way of manifesto to the Basha's and Governors in his dominions.

About the beginning of April the Swedes published likewise a manifesto, in answer to one put out some months before by the King of Denmark, upon his landing in Schonen, and pretending to shew, that the reasons alledged by the Danes to justify that invasion, were so far from being a sufficient cause of war, that they did not amount even to a plausible pretence. Not long after both the Swedes and Danes sent out their fleets to sea; and the Danish fleet having on the 14th and 15th of September, N. S. met with a violent storm by which they were separated, and several of their ships damaged in their rigging, they were obliged to return to the Kinger Bight. The Swedes imagining their loss to have been much greater, went in quest of them; and on the 4th of October, attacked them with twenty-one ships of the line of battle, and ten frigates. Upon this surprize, the Danes immediately cut their cables, and endeavoured to gain the wind, so as to get between Copenhagen and the Swedish fleet, whilst the Swedes endeavoured to intercept them. This occasioned a cannonading between the foremost ships; during which, a Danish ship of ninety guns, called the Danebrog blew up. But, tho' the Swedes gained their point, yet, advancing too far towards the Danish coast, two of their flag ships, an Admiral and a Rear-Admiral, struck upon a sand-bank, near the island of Amack, where the whole Swedish fleet came to an anchor, to endeavour to recover them. This being impracticable, they saved the men, and set fire to their two ship, as they did to a Danish transport. In the mean time the Danish fleet returned to their former posts before Königsberg, and the wind bearing hard on the coast, the Swedes were unwilling to attack them a second time; and, on the 7th of October in the morning, weighed anchor, and sailed towards the East sea. The Danes pursued them, but at such a distance, as shewed they had no mind to another engagement.

The Imperial arms were this year attended with great successes in Hungary, where they reduced several important towns. Some of the chief of the malecontents considering, that their affairs were desperate, inclined to consult their safety, by making their submission to the Emperor. But, upon the Turks declaring war against the Muscovites, Prince Ragotzki encouraged them to stand out to the last, by giving them hopes, that the Turks would assist them with men, and the French with Engineers and Money.

The Imperial Court persisting in their resolution not to grant the exercise of the Protestant Religion in Silesia, upon pretence that they were not included either in the treaty of Westphalia, or in the convention of At Rastadt, the Queen of Great-Britain ordered Lieutenant-General Palmer her Envoy Extraordinary to the Emperor, to make new Influences in their favour. And the States-General ordered the Sieur Bruyninx, their Envoy, to use his good offices, in

Lieutenant-General Carpenter, who was killed at one of the breaches, we have lost above three hundred men killed, and as many wounded; among the killed are some Field-officers, whose names and ranks I do not know.

In the battle, my Lord, our greatest loss has been sustained on the left, where Colonel Richards, and Col. Du Bourgay's regiments have been entirely cut off; and of my regiment above one hundred private men are still missing, and seven officers. Of the other nations the regiments of St. Amand, Dutch; Lucini, Neapolitan; Albuquerque, Portuguese; and Unadar, Spanish; are totally destroyed: Lieutenant-General Belcastle, and Major-General St. Amand killed. The enemy's loss is modestly computed to amount to above six thousand men killed on the spot.

By this great turn of affairs, my Lord, the command of the remnant of her Majesty's troops is devolved on me. I am endeavouring, by the Marshal's directions and desire, to make up the regiments of Richards and Du Bourgay, out of the few people that are come off, and those that were left in the hospitals. The greatest difficulty attends my own, which is reduced to betwixt eighty and a hundred men, and as many horses, and no fund to go upon; but, if I can get money from Mr. Mead, or credit, I shall use my best endeavours to get men and horses to repair my regiment, and put it in a condition to serve next campaign, if my designs are approved. This I humbly pray your Lordship to lay before her Majesty, and that speedy supplies may be sent to us, to keep up the few bodies that are left, if it be thought fit for the service; for Mr. Mead complains very much for want of money and credit, by which we are already reduced to great straits here, where our credit is very indifferent, and our wants extremely great, having lost all our equipages in the battle, and saved nothing but what we had on our backs; and, as my loss in particular is very considerable, I hope your Lordship will be so kind as to represent it as such, that her Majesty will be pleased to consider me in it, and grant me some compensation, which may enable me to serve the next campaign with some satisfaction.

To this letter, our Author had added the Memorial sent to the Queen by the officers of the two regiments commanded by the Colonels Richards and Du Bourgay, which begins thus:

That the said two regiments were the only English battalions, that were at the battle of Villa Viciosa: That, being posted on the left of the two lines, the horse, who were on our flanks gave way, and left us naked, and exposed to the weight and shock of the whole right wing of the enemy; who like a torrent not to be resisted, soon over-bore us. Many of your Majesty's faithful officers lost their lives upon the spot; many more were wounded, and all were at last made prisoners: Tho' some few of us were fortunate enough to be retaken. Fortunate indeed we esteem it; because we hope to be able to serve your Majesty again this campaign, and to revenge the wrongs our Country suffered in the last. With regard to every thing else, our misery is equal to that of the poor captives.— For never certainly in any nation, or in any age, where Christianity, or the civil arts have been planted, have such barbarities been practised, as by this ungenerous enemy, of whom it may truly be said, Their very tender Mercies were cruel. For, after their Officers had taken from us what money or whatever else of value we had about us, and had promised us their protection, they suffered, nay, encouraged their soldiers to strip us of our cloaths, to insult, and to wound us. In this miserable condition we were found, when some of us were restored to our liberty; and in this condition we retreated with the body of the army, having lost the entire baggage of the two regiments.

1710. in concert with the British Ministers. They presented a joint-memorial to the Emperor, which, however, had but little effect; though, at this time, the Imperial Court had more reason than ever to keep measures with the Protestant powers. These were the transactions abroad this campaign, during which great changes had happened in England.

Addresses of different file. Burnet.
The trial of Dr. Sacheverel had given, as was observed, great advantages to the Tory party, who set on foot addresses from all parts of the Nation, in which the absolute power of our Princes was asserted, and all resistance was condemned, under the designation of Anti-Monarchical and Republican principles; the Queen's hereditary right was acknowledged; and yet a zeal for the Protestant Succession was likewise pretended, to make those addresses pass the more easily with the unthinking multitude. Most of these concluded with an intimation of their hopes, that the Queen would dissolve the present Parliament, giving assurances, that in a new election they would chuse none, but such as should be faithful to the Crown, and zealous for the Church. These were at first more coldly received; for the Queen either made no answer at all, or made them in very general words. Addresses were brought up on the other hand, magnifying the conduct of the Parliament, and expressing a zeal for maintaining the Revolution and the Protestant Succession.

The Queen sends to the Duke of Marlborough to give a regiment to Mr. Hill. Cond of D. of Marl.
But the Queen's resolution of changing her Ministry had begun to appear very early this year; for in the beginning of January 1709-10, upon the death of the Earl of Effex, she writ to the Duke of Marlborough to give his regiment to Mr. Hill, a man, who had been extremely ungrateful to the Duchess of Marlborough, and whose sister, Mrs. Malham, the Duke well knew, was at this time undermining the interest of himself, his family and friends. The scheme of the Queen's new Counsellors to make her Ministers quit her service, or engage her to discard them, now shewed itself without disguise. They durst not tell her at once all they designed; but, proposing to her only one thing at a time, led her, by insensible degrees, to the accomplishment of the whole. They began, as has been related, with engaging her to nominate persons to Bishopsricks, without consulting her Ministers. And now they prevailed with her to appoint military officers, without advising with her General. And nothing could be more to their purpose, than this choice of Mr. Hill for Lord Effex's regiment, because they knew, that nothing could be more disagreeable to the Duke of Marlborough, or would tend more to lessen his weight and authority in the army, and consequently at home too. The new Counsellors saw, that, if the Duke readily yielded in this matter, it would sow discontent among the Officers; and that a door would be opened for his enemies to come into the army, and insult him. And, on the other hand, if the Duke should not comply, or should shew any reluctance in complying, this would furnish an excellent pretence for grievous complaints, that the Queen was but a cypher, and could do nothing. Upon the Queen's letter, the Duke waited on her, and with all humility represented to her, what a prejudice it would be to her service, to have so young an Officer preferred before so many others of higher rank and longer service;

besides, that the shewing so extraordinary and partial favour to Mrs. Malham's brother could be interpreted no otherwise, than as a declaring against all those, who had so much reason to be uneasy with her; and that, indeed, it would be setting up a banner for all the discontented persons in the army to repair to. In short, the Duke said every thing he could think of, and with all the moving concern that the nature of the affair created in him; to engage her to change her resolution. But all seemed to no purpose. He could not draw one kind expression from her, nor obtain any answer, but "that he would do well to advise with his friends."

The Earl of Godolphin spoke often to her upon the same subject, representing to her the Duke's long, great, and faithful services, and the very bad influence, which her intended favour to Mr. Hill must necessarily have in the army. But neither had this so much effect as to engage her to say one favourable word about the Duke. Wherefore, on the 15th of January, he left the town, and went to Windsor in great discontent. It was Council-day. The Queen did not ask where he was, nor take the least notice of his absence. His withdrawing himself made a great deal of noise in the town. Many of the Nobility spoke with earnestness to the Queen of the very ill consequences of mortifying a man, who had done her so long and important services. She answered, that his services were still fresh in her memory, and that she had as much kindness for him as ever she had. The noise, however, still continued and increased, and there was great discourse, not without probability, that some notice would be taken of the matter in the House of Commons, and some votes passed disagreeable to the Queen and her new Counsellors. This design was laid to the Duchess of Marlborough's charge; but she said enough to the Queen to vindicate herself. And indeed it was owing to the Duke's particular friends in the House, that no such notice was taken.

The new Counsellors being alarmed with apprehensions of what the Parliament might do, and believing, that they should be able, at a proper season, to make better use of the Queen's yielding up the point, than of her insulting upon it, gave her advice accordingly; so that, on the 20th of January, she ordered the Earl of Godolphin to write to the Duke, "that he might dispose of the regiment, as he himself thought fit;" and to desire him to come to town. But, before this reached the Duke, he had written the following letter to the Queen:

The Duke of Marlborough retires to Windsor.

The Queen desists from her recommendation.

"By what I hear from London, I find your Majesty is pleased to think, that, when I have reflected, I must be of opinion, that you are in the right in giving Mr. Hill the Earl of Effex's regiment. I beg your Majesty will be so just to me, as not to think I can be so unreasonable, as to be mortified to the degree that I am, if it proceeded only from this one thing; for I shall always be ready and glad to do every thing that is agreeable to you, after I have represented what may be a prejudice to your service. But this is only one of a great many mortifications that I have met with. And, as I may not have many opportunities of

A a a " writing

1710. "writing to you, let me beg of your Majesty to reflect what your own people, and the rest of the world, must think, who have been witnesses of the love, zeal, and duty, with which I have served you, when they shall see, that, after all I have done, it has not been able to protect me against the malice of a bed-chamber woman. Your Majesty will allow me on this occasion to remind you of what I write to you the last campaign of the certain knowledge I had of Mrs. Mafham's having assured Mr. Harley, that I should receive such constant mortifications as should make it impossible for me to continue in your service. God Almighty and the whole world are my witnesses, with what care and pains I have served you for more than twenty years; and I was resolved, if possible, to have struggled with the difficulties to the end of this war. But the many instances I have had of your Majesty's great change to me has so broke my spirits, that I must beg, as the greatest and last favour, that you will approve of my retiring, so that I may employ the little time I have to live, in making my just acknowledgments to God, for the protection he has been pleased to give me. And your Majesty may be assured, that my zeal for you and my country is so great, that in my retirement I shall daily pray for your prosperity, and that those, who shall serve you as faithfully as I have done, may never feel the hard return, that I have met with."

The Queen wrote the Duke an answer, expressing some concern at several parts of his letter, assuring him, without entering into particulars, that he had no ground for suspicions, and desiring him to come to town. But fearing, at the same time, that some motion might be made in Parliament against Mrs. Mafham, which might be attended with very disagreeable consequences, she sent about in much concern to many persons to stand by her, as if some great attack was going to be made upon her. This application, and the clofeting some persons, who were known enemies to the Revolution, gave encouragement to the Jacobites; several of whom were now observed running to Court with faces full of business and satisfaction, as it they were going to get the Government into their hands. And this being represented to the Queen, as a kind of victory gained by her over the Marlborough family, was doubtless one means of hindering all thoughts of a real accommodation.

In about a month after this it was, that both Houses of Parliament addressed the Queen, to order the Duke of Marlborough over into Holland, to attend to the great affair of a peace, and in case that project did not take effect, to prepare for an early opening the campaign. In her answer to this address (as hath been said) she used these words: "I am very glad to find, that you concur with me in a just sense of the Duke of Marlborough's eminent services." But, notwithstanding this, he had not been long gone, before she gave a signal proof how much his declared enemies were in her favour, by granting Mr. Hill a pension of one thousand pounds a year; and in some time, she made both him and Mr. Mafham, men of little or no service, general Officers over the heads of many brave men, who had frequently hazarded their lives in her service, and had gone through the toils and hardships of a tedious war.

In the mean time the Duchefs of Marlborough learnt, that the Queen was made to believe, that she often spoke of her in company disrespectfully; upon which she desired an audience, in order to justify herself, which she obtained on the 6th of April; but could make no impression upon the Queen, whom she never saw afterwards, nor ever had any correspondence with her Majesty, except upon two occasions relating to the public (1). However, notwithstanding

(1) The Duchefs of Marlborough, in the account of her Conduct, says: As I knew myself wholly free from the guilt of this charge, and indeed incapable of it, I waited on her Majesty the 3d of April, 1710, and begged of her that she would be pleased to give me a private hour, because I had something which I was desirous of saying to her Majesty, before I went out of town. I named three several hours, in which I knew the Queen used to be alone, but she refused them all in a very unusual and surprizing manner; and at last she herself appointed six o'clock the next day, the hour for prayers, when she could least of all expect to be at leisure for any particular conversation. But even this small favour though promised, was not thought advisable to be granted by her new Counsellors. For that night she wrote a letter to me, in which she desired me to lay before her in writing whatever I had to say, and to gratify myself in going into the country as soon as I could. I took the first opportunity of waiting upon the Queen again, and used all the arguments I could to obtain a private hour; alledging, that when her Majesty should hear what I had to say, she would herself perceive it impossible to put things of that nature into writing: That I was now going out of town for a great while, and perhaps should never have occasion to give her a like trouble as long as I lived. The Queen refused it several times in a manner hard to be described; but at last appointed the next day after dinner. Yet upon further consideration it was thought advisable to break

this appointment; for the next morning, she wrote to me, to let me know, that she should dine at Kenington, and that she once more desired me to put my thoughts into writing. To this, I wrote an answer, begging that her Majesty would give me leave to follow her to Kenington; and that she might not apprehend a greater trouble than she would receive, I assured her Majesty, that what I had to say, would not create any dispute or uneasiness (it relating only to the clearing myself of some things, which I had heard had very wrongfully been laid to my charge) and could have no consequence either in obliging her Majesty to answer, or to see me oftner than would be easy to her: Adding, that, if that Afternoon were not convenient, I would come every day, and wait till her Majesty would please to allow me to speak to her. Upon the 6th of April, I followed this letter to Kenington, and by that means prevented the Queen's writing again to me, as she was preparing to do. The Page, who went in to acquaint the Queen, that I was come to wait upon her, staid longer than usual; long enough, it is to be supposed, to give time to deliberate, whether the favour of admission should be granted, and to settle the measures of behaviour, if I were admitted. But at last he came out, and told me, I might go in. As I was entering, the Queen said, she was just going to write to me. And, when I began to speak, she interrupted me four or five times with these repeated words, Whatever you have to say, you may put it into writing. I said, her Majesty never did so hard a thing

1710. ing this thorough alienation of the Queen's affections from the Duchess, she was not yet divested of her employments; it being, perhaps, not yet determined, who should succeed her, nor whether it were proper, that the Duke of Marlborough should have that mortification, before the season was fully ripe for the execution of the new scheme; though it now was greatly advanced, since the Duke of Shrewsbury, who had voted for the acquittal of Dr. Sacheverel, was soon after appointed Lord-Chamberlain, in the room of the Marquis of Kent, who was made a Duke. The Duke of Shrewsbury had gone out of England, towards the end of the Reign of King William, thinking, as he gave out, that a warmer climate was necessary for his health. He staid several years at Rome, where he became acquainted with a Roman Lady; who, upon his leaving Rome to return to England, went after him to Augsburg, where she overtook him, and declared herself a Protestant; upon which he married her there, and came with her back to England in 1706. Upon his return, the Whigs lived in civilities with him; but they thought his leaving England, and his living so long out of it, while the Nation was in so much danger, and his strange marriage, gave just cause of suspicion. The Duke of Marlborough and the Lord Godolphin lived still in friendship with him, and studied to overcome the jealousies, that the Whigs had of him; for they generally believed, that he had advised King William to the change, which he made in his Ministry towards the end of his Reign. He seemed not to be concerned at the distance, in which he was kept from business; but, as was observed above, in the trial of Dr. Sacheverel, he left the Whigs in every vote; and the change of his principles, which he had discovered by this, was imputed to a secret management between him and Mr. Harley with the new Favourite. But, before the Queen declared her intention for giving him the Lord-Chamberlain's Staff, she thought fit, for form sake, and perhaps to cover her further designs to communicate her resolutions to the Earl of Godolphin, who, being then at Newmarket, sent a letter to the Queen; to which her Majesty wrote, with her own hand, on the 13th of April, the following answer:

"I am sorry to find by your letter, you are ^{The} so very much in the spleen, as to think you ^{Queen's} cannot, for the future, contribute any thing ^{letter a-} towards my quiet but your wishes. How- ^{but it is} ever, I will still hope you will use your endea- ^{the Earl of} vours. Never was there more occasion than ^{Godol.} now; for, by all one hears and sees every ^{Phin.} day, as things are at present, I think one can expect nothing but confusion. I am sure, for my part, I shall be ready to join with all my friends in every thing, that is reasonable, to allay the heat and ferment, that is in this poor Nation. Since you went to Newmarket, I have received several assurances from the Duke of Shrewsbury of his readiness to serve me upon all occasions, and his willingness to come into my service; which offer I was very glad to accept of, having a very good opinion of him, and believing he may be of great use in these troublesome times. For these reasons I have resolved to part with the Duke of Kent, who, I hope, will be easy in this matter, by being made a Duke; and, I hope, this change will meet with your approbation, which I wish I may ever have in all my actions. I have not yet declared my intentions of giving the Staff and the Key to the Duke of Shrewsbury, because I would be the first, that should acquaint you with it."

The Lord-Treasurer, who well understood ^{The Earl's} the meaning, and foresaw the consequences of ^{answer.} such a change, wrote to the Queen the following letter:

Newmarket, April 15. 1710.

"I have the honour of your Majesty's letter of the 13th, by which I have the grief to find,

thing to any, as to refuse to hear them speak, and assured her, that I was not going to trouble her upon the subject, which I knew to be so ungrateful to her; but that I could not possibly rest, till I had cleared myself from some particular calumnies, with which I had been loaded. I then went on to speak (though the Queen turned away her face from me) and to represent my hard case: That there were those about her Majesty, who had made her believe, that I had said things of her, which I was no more capable of saying, than of killing my own children: That I seldom named her Majesty in company, and never without respect, and the like. The Queen said, Without doubt there had been many lies told. I then begged, in order to make this trouble the shorter, and my own innocence the plainer, that I might know the particulars, of which I had been accused; because, if I were guilty, that would quickly appear; and, if I were innocent, this method only would clear me. The Queen replied, that she would give me no answer; laying hold on a word in my letter, that what I had to say, in my own vindication, would have no consequence in obliging her Majesty to answer, &c. which surely did not at all imply, that I did not desire to know the particular things laid to my charge, without which it was impossible for me to clear myself. This I assured her Majesty was all I desired, and that I did not ask the names of the authors or the relators of those calumnies; saying all that I could think reasonable to inferce my just request. But the Queen repeated again and again the words she had used, without ever receding. And it is probable, that this conversation had never been consented to, but that her Majesty had been carefully provided with those words, as a shield to defend her against every reason I could offer. I protested to her Majesty, that I had no delign in giving her this trouble, to solicit the return of her favour; and that my sole view was to clear myself, which was too just a design, to be wholly disappointed by her Majesty. Upon this the Queen offered to go out of the room, I following her, and begging leave to clear myself; and the Queen repeating over and over again, You desired no answer, and shall have none. When she came to the door, I fell into great disorder; streams of tears flowed down against my will, and prevented my speaking for some time. At length I recovered myself, and appealed to the Queen in the vehemence of my concern, whether I might not still have been happy in her Majesty's favour, if I could have contradicted or dissembled my real opinion of men or things? Whether I had offended in any thing, unless in a very zealous pressing upon her that, which I thought necessary for her service and security? I then said, I was informed by a very reasonable and credible person about the court, that things were laid to my charge, of which I was wholly incapable: That this person knew that such stories were perpetually told to her Majesty to incense her, and had begged of me to come

1710. "find, that what you are pleased to call spleen in my former letter, was only a true impulse and conviction of mind, that your Majesty is suffering yourself to be guided to your own ruin and destruction, as fast as it is possible for them to compass it, to whom you seem so much to hearken.

"I am not therefore so much surprized, as concerned at the resolution, which your Majesty says you have taken, of bringing in the Duke of Shrewsbury. For when people began to be sensible, it would be difficult to persuade your Majesty to dissolve a Parliament, which, for two winters together, had given you above six millions a year for the support of a war, upon which your Crown depends; even while that war is still subsisting, they have had the cunning to contrive this proposal to your Majesty, which, in its consequence, will certainly put you under a necessity of breaking the Parliament, though contrary (I yet believe) to your mind and intention.

"I beg your Majesty to be persuaded, I do not say this out of the least prejudice to the Duke of Shrewsbury. There is no man, of whose capacity I have had a better impression; nor with whom I have lived more easily and freely for above twenty years. Your Majesty may please to remember, that, at your first coming to the Crown, I was desirous he should have had one of the chief posts in your service; and it would have been happy for your Majesty and the Kingdom, if he had accepted that offer. But he thought fit to decline it; and the reasons generally given at that time for his doing so, do not much commend him to your Majesty's service. But I must endeavour to let your Majesty see things as they really are. And to bring him into your service and into your business at this time, just after his being in a public open conjunction in every vote with the whole body of the Tories, and in a private constant correspondence and caballing with Mr. Harley in every thing, what consequence can this possibly have, but to make every man, that is now in your Cabinet-Council, except—

"to run from it as they would from the plague? And I leave it to your Majesty to judge, what effect this intire change of your Ministers will have among your Allies abroad; and how well this war is like to be carried on, in their opinion, by those who have all along opposed and obstructed it, and who will like any peace the better, the more it leaves France at liberty to take their time of imposing the Pretender upon this Country.

"These considerations must certainly make Holland run immediately into a separate peace with France, and make your Majesty lose all the honour and all the reputation your arms had acquired by the war; and make the Kingdom lose all the fruits of that vast expence, which they have been at in this war, as well as all the advantage and safety, which they had so much need of, and had so fair a prospect of obtaining by it. And can any body imagine, that, after so great a disappointment to the Kingdom, there will not be an enquiry into the causes of it; and who have been the occasion of so great a change in your Majesty's Measures and Counsels, which had been so long successful, and gotten you so great a name in the world? I am very much afraid your Majesty will find, when it is too late, that it will be a pretty difficult task for any body to stand against such an inquiry. I am sure, if I did not think all these consequences inevitable, I would never give your Majesty the trouble and uneasiness of laying them before you. But persuaded as I am, that your Majesty will find them so, it is my indispensable duty to do it out of pure faithfulness and zeal for your Majesty's service and honour. Your Majesty's having taken a resolution of so much consequence to all your affairs both at home and abroad, without acquainting the Duke of Marlborough or me with it, till after you had taken it, is the least part of my mortification in this whole affair, though perhaps the world may think the long and faithful services, we have constantly and zealously endeavoured to do your Majesty, might have deserved a little more consideration.

and vindicate myself: That the same person had thought me of late guilty of some omissions towards her Majesty, being intirely ignorant how uneasy to her my frequent attendance must be, after what had happened between us. I explained some things, which I had heard her Majesty had taken amiss of me; and then with a fresh flood of tears, and a concern sufficient to move compassion even where all love was absent, I begged to know what other particulars she had heard of me, that I might not be denied all power of justifying myself. But still the only return was, You desired no answer, and you shall have none. I then begged to know if her Majesty would tell me some other time?—You desired no answer, and you shall have none. I then appealed to her Majesty again, if she did not herself know, that I had often despised interest in comparison of serving her faithfully, and doing right: And whether she did not know me to be of a temper incapable of disowning any thing, which I know to be true?—You desired no answer, and you shall have none. This usage was so severe, and these words so often repeated, were so shocking (being an utter denial of common justice to one, who had been a most faithful servant, and now asked nothing more) that I could not conquer myself, but said the most disrespectful thing I ever yet spoke to the Queen in my life, and yet, what such an occasion, and such circumstances might well excuse, if not justify; and that was, I was confident her Majesty would suffer for such an Instance of inhumanity. The Queen answered, That will be to myself. Thus ended this remarkable conversation, the last I ever had with her Majesty. I shall make no comment upon it. The Queen always meant well, how much sooner she might be blinded or misguided. But in a letter, which I had from the Duke of Marlborough about eight months before, there is something so pertinent to the present occasion, that I cannot forbear transcribing the passage:

"It has always been my observation in disputes, especially in that of kindness and friendship, that all reproaches, though ever so just, serve to no end but making the breach wider. I cannot help being of opinion, that, however insignificant we may be, there is a power above, that puts a period to our happiness or unhappiness. If any body had told me eight years ago, that after such great success, and after you had been a faithful servant twenty-seven years, that even in the Queen's lifetime we should be obliged to seek happiness in a retired life, I could not have believed that possible."

1710. "tion. However, for my own part, I must "humbly beg leave to assure your Majesty, I "will never give the least obstruction to your
"measures, or to any Ministers you shall please "to employ. And I must beg further, to "make two humble requests to your Majesty;
"the one, that you will allow me to pass the "remainder of my life always out of London,
"where I may find most ease and quiet. The "other, that you would keep this letter, and
"read it again about next Christmas, and then "be pleased to make your own judgment, who "hath given you the best and most faithful ad"vice."

This letter made no impression upon the Queen, who, two days before she received it, being already fixed in her choice, delivered, on the 14th of April, the Staff and Key to the Duke of Shrewsbury, who gave the Ministers very positive assurances, that his principles were the same they had been during the last Reign, and were in no respect altered. Upon which he desired to enter into confidences with them; but there was now too much ground given for suspicion.

About the beginning of June, the design of turning out the Earl of Sunderland from the post of Secretary of State began to be talked of. As soon as this design reached the Duke of Marlborough, who was then abroad at the head of the army, he wrote a very moving letter to the Queen, representing the very ill consequences it would necessarily have upon all affairs abroad, to have his son-in-law, against whose fidelity nothing could be objected, and in whom the Allies had so intire a confidence, turned out of her service in the middle of a campaign; and begging it as a reward of all his past services, that she would at least delay her resolution till the campaign was ended. The Duchess of Marlborough was likewise urged by some friends to try to say something, to divert, if possible, such a stroke; because it was given out, that the Queen would do this chiefly on the Duchess's account, that she might feel the effects of her displeasure in so sensible and tender a point. No consideration proper to herself could have induced the Duchess to trouble the Queen again after that last conversation: But she was overcome by the consideration of the Duke of Marlborough, the Earl of Sunderland, and the public interest, and wrote to the Queen, on the 7th of June 1710, begging, for the Duke of Marlborough's sake, that her Majesty would not give him such a blow, of which she dreaded the consequence; putting her Majesty in mind of her letter about the Duke upon the victory of Blenheim, and adding the most solemn assurances, that she had not so much as a wish to remove Mrs. Masbam; and that all the noise, which had been about an address for that purpose, had been occasioned by the Duke of Marlborough's discontents at that time. To this the Queen wrote a very short and harsh answer, complaining, that the Duchess had broke her promise of not saying any thing of Politics or of Mrs. Masbam, and concluding, that it was plain from this ill usage, what she was to expect for the future. The Duchess upon this wrote a second letter, in which she assured her Majesty, that she should not have troubled her with the first, but that she had heard it reported, that that the persecution, begun against the Duke of Marlborough and his Family, was chiefly occasioned by her Majesty's displeasure and aversion to her, as having promoted an address against Mrs. Masbam: That it was only to vindicate herself from that asperson, that she had presumed to trouble her Majesty: That she could not imagine it could be interpreted as an offence, to vindicate herself from what was now made the pretence for turning out the Earl of Sunderland, and pushing the Duke of Marlborough to extremities: That she had no reason to think, that the assuring her Majesty, that she would never have any hand in any thing against Mrs. Masbam, could have been construed as an ungrateful speaking about her; or called a continuation of ill usage: That she thought this was rather a complying with her Majesty's inclination, and saying what she could not but approve: That all the politics in her letter was her concern for the Duke; making it her last request, that her Majesty would only defer the blow till the end of the campaign. This (she added) she begged upon her knees, and left her Majesty to judge, whether, after such an expression, it was likely that she should ever enter into any thing that could displease her.

Whether the Duchess's interfering in this matter hastened the execution of the design, is not known; but it is certain, that it did not retard it, the Lord Sunderland was, on the 14th of June, dismissed the office, and the Seals given, the next day, to the Lord Dartmouth, one of the Lord's Commissioners of trade and plantations, and son-in-law to the Earl of Nottingham. On this occasion several great men, who wished well to their country, and who feared, that the Duke of Marlborough might, in disgust, quit the service, immediately wrote him a joint-letter in the following terms:

My Lord,
June 14, 1710.
"We should not have given your Grace the "trouble of this joint-letter, but for the great "concern and uneasiness in which we find you,
"on account of my Lord Sunderland, by your "letter of the 20th to my Lord-Treasurer,
"which he has communicated to us. That "letter, as moving and reasonable as it was,
"has not hindered the Seals from being taken
"this morning from my Lord Sunderland. No "wonder then, if the utmost endeavours, which "could be used to prevent it, and the strong "arguments, which have been made of the ill
"consequences that must attend such steps both
"at home and abroad, have met with so little "success. We find ourselves so much afflicted "with this misfortune, that we cannot but be "extremely sensible of the great mortification
"this must give you at this critical juncture,
"when you are every moment hazarding your "life in the service of your country, and whilst "the fate of Europe depends, in so great a de"gree, on your conduct and good success: But "we are also as fully convinced, that it is im"possible for your Grace to quit the service at "this time, without the utmost hazard to the "whole Alliance. And we must therefore "conjure you, by the glory you have already
"obtained, by the many services you have done
"your Queen and Country, by the expectation
"you have justly raised in all Europe, and by "all that is dear and tender to you at home,
"whose

This we look upon as the most necessary step, that can be taken to prevent the dissolution of this Parliament. Your Grace's compliance with this our earnest request would be the greatest obligation to us, and all that wish well to our country. And, you may depend upon it, that the contrary will be the greatest satisfaction to your enemies." (1)

The Tories elated at this change. Hist. of Eur.

The High-Church party were much pleased and elated upon this alteration, which they looked upon as a sure forerunner of greater changes; "extolling the Queen for asserting her just prerogative, and setting herself free from an arbitrary junctio, who kept her in an inglorious dependance on their will and caprice." And it was said, the Duke of Beaufort being, about this time, come to Court to pay his respects to her Majesty, told her, "That he was extremely glad he could now salute her Queen." On the other hand, the Whigs were the more alarmed, as the best part of their wealth was lodged in the Exchequer and public funds; and, as they rightly considered, that the removal of the Earl of Sunderland was but a step to come at the Lord-Treasurer, in whose capacity, punctuality, and integrity, the monied men reposed an entire confidence; and they foresaw that his being laid aside would very much affect the public credit, as it immediately did. Whereupon

The Bank interposed in favour of the Ministry.

Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Governor of the Bank of England; Nathaniel Gould, Deputy-Governor; Francis Byles and Sir William Scawen, two of the Directors, made their application to the Duke of Newcastle, Lord Privy-Seal, to whom having represented the dangers likely to attend the change of the Ministry, the Duke introduced them to the Queen, who told them, "That she, for some time before, had resolved to remove the Earl of Sunderland for particular reasons of State; but that she had not yet determined to make any other changes; and whenever she should, she would take care, that the public credit might not be injured thereby." Upon this it was reported, the Queen had declared, she designed to make no more Alterations in the Ministry, which immediately restored the public funds to their former value; but they soon began to fall again, and many foreigners withdrew their effects from England upon a strong report, that not only the Lord-Treasurer would be laid aside, but even the Parliament dissolved.

The Queen's Allies, and particularly the Emperor and the States, were very attentive to what passed in Great-Britain; and being apprehensive, that the Duke of Marlborough would either be removed, or so far disguised, as to lay down his command, which might bring a great prejudice to the common cause, Count Gallas, the Imperial Minister, and Monsieur de Vryberg, the Dutch Envoy, were directed, in a most respectful manner, to represent to the Queen, what ill influence the changing of the Ministry might have on affairs abroad. In answer to their memorials, Count Gallas was told that he might assure the Emperor, "whatever changes the Queen designed to make, she had resolved to continue the Duke of Marlborough in his employments; and desired, Prince Eugene, and the other Imperial Generals and Plenipotentiaries might act with him, with the same confidence as before." The answer which was given to Vryberg, was kept a secret; however, it was said, the Queen put a favourable construction on the interposition of the States, in favour of the Ministry, looking upon it as the effect of their zeal for the common cause, and the confidence they reposed in the Duke of Marlborough's conduct. These interpositions were represented by those who had never been versed in the Negotiations of Princes in an Alliance, as a bold intruding into the Queen's Councils; though nothing is more common, than for Princes to offer mutual advices (2).

The Queen had no sooner begun to change her Ministry by displacing the Earl of Sunderland, than the French were attentive how to turn it to their advantage. The Earl's removal was quickly inserted in the Paris Gazette, with the particular notice, that he was son-in-law to the Duke of Marlborough. Their other newspapers were likewise filled with all the domestic feuds and contentions of the parties in Great-Britain, which were related with an air of triumph, and helped very much to raise the spirits of the French.

On the 8th of August, the very day after the Queen had expressed her desire to the Earl of Godolphin himself, that he would continue in her service; she dismissed him; and her letter of order to him to break his Staff was sent by no worthier a messenger than a man in a livery, to be left with his Lordship's porter (3). The Queen indeed confessed to those, who expostulated with her upon this occasion, "That she was sorry for it, but could not help it." The next day it was declared that the Queen had appointed Earl Paulet, Mr. Robert Harley, Mr. Henry Paget, Sir Thomas Mansel, and Mr. Robert Benson, Commissioners of the Treasury. Though Lord Paulet was the first in form, Mr. Harley was the Person with whom the secret was lodged; and it was visible, he was the chief Minister, being at the same time made Chancellor

(2) The Dutch, as well as the Bank, were severely reflected upon by the Tories, for intermeddling in an affair of this nature; and at the same time, they handed about a harsh answer, which they pretended the Queen gave to Vryberg's memorial: "I am surprised a matter of this kind should come from the States. It is the greatest insult that ever was offered to the Crown of England. However, it shall not lessen my Esteem of my Allies, nor alter my resolution in my own affairs." Those, who framed this answer, had forgot that the Queen had interposed at the Court of Vienna in favour of the Emperor's Protestant subjects, and that the Parliament had desired her to apply to the Emperor, for sending Prince Eugene to command in Spain.

Sacheverell's progress into Wales.

In the mean while Dr. Sacheverel, being presented to a benefice in North-Wales, went down to take possession of it; as he passed through the counties, both going and coming, he was received and followed by such numbers, and entertained with such magnificence, that our Princes in their progresses have not been more run after than he was: Great fury and violence appeared on many occasions, though care was taken to give his followers no sort of provocation; he was looked on as the champion of the Church; and he shewed as much insolence on that occasion, as his party did folly (1). No notice was taken by the Government of all these tumultuous proceedings; they were rather encouraged than checked. All this was like a prelude to a greater scene, which was to be acted at Court.

The Parliament dissolved, and other changes in the Ministry. Burnet.

The Queen in September came to Council, and called for a proclamation to dissolve the Parliament, which Sir Simon Harcourt (made Attorney-General in the room of Sir James Montague who had quitted that post) had prepared. When it was read, the Lord-Chancellor Cropper offered to speak; but the Queen rising up would admit of no debate, and ordered the writs for a new Parliament to be got ready. About the same time she dismissed the Lord Sommers, and, in his room, made the Earl of Rocheſter Lord-President of the Council. She sent to the Duke of Devonſhire for the Lord-Steward's Staff, and gave it to the Duke of Buckingham. Mr. Boyle was removed from the post of Secretary of State, and Mr. Henry St. John had the Seals. The Earl of Derby was dismissed from being Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and was succeeded by the Lord Berkley. Upon all these removes, the Lord-Chancellor came, on the 23d of September, and delivered up the Great-Seal. The Queen did not expect this, and was surprized at it; and, not knowing how to dispose of it, she, with unusual earnestness, pressed him to keep it one day longer. The day following, having considered the matter with her favourites Mrs. Masſham and Mr. Harley, she received it very readily. At first she committed it to the custody of three Lords-Commissioners, Sir Thomas Trevor, Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas; Mr. Robert Tracy, Judge of the same Court; and Mr. Scroop, Baron of the Exchequer in Scotland; but it was soon after given to Sir Simon Harcourt. The Earl of Wharton delivered up his Commission of Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, which was given to the Duke of Ormond (2). The Earl of Orford, First Commissioner of the Admiralty, withdrew from that board;

(1) The particulars of this progress more at large were as follows: He went from London about the middle of May to Oxford, with a numerous attendance, and was welcomed and magnificently entertained by the Earl of Abingdon, Mr. Charles Bertie, Fellow of All-Souls College, Mr. Rouney, one of the Members of Parliament for that City, the Vice-Chancellor, the Heads of Houses, and most persons of distinction in the University. Here he continued the remainder of that month; and, on Thursday the first of June, set out, and came that night to Banbury, where the Mayor, Recorder, and Corporation, in their robes and formalities, with their mace before them, attended him at his inn, congratulated him upon his deliverance, making him a present of wine; and, in the evening, there were bonfires, ringing of bells, and all public expressions of joy. The next day, the Doctor dined at the Lord Willoughby's, and from thence went forward to Warwick, being met at a distance from the town by a body of horse, who conducted him in. The Mayor and Aldermen, with a great number of the Gentry and Inhabitants of that place, paid their respects to him at his inn, presented him with wine, and would have entertained him the day following; which he declined, and went that night to the Lord Craven's, and continued some days in that County. On the 12th of June, he was entertained at dinner by Sir William Boughton, together with the Lord Willoughby, Lord Craven, and divers other Gentlemen and Clergymen, who came to express their great joy and satisfaction to see the Doctor. Some days after he continued his progress, and, on the 23d, went thro' Wrexham, in the way to his living at Salatin, being met within a mile of the town by most of the Gentlemen in the County, and others, to the number of about two thousand. He lay that night at the House of Gerage Shakerley, Esq; and, next day, the Chancellor of the Diocese gave orders for his institution and induction, which was performed some days after. The Doctor having been invited to Shrewsbury, he went thither the 23d of July, being met at Memford bridge three miles from the town, by Corbet Knafston, Esq; Mr. Owen, Mr. Cresset, Mr. Cresswell, Mr. Mitten, and all the neighbouring Gentlemen and others, and was conducted to Shrewsbury by about five thousand horse. After he had been nobly entertained there, he went to Mr. Owen's at Condover, where he was also magnificently treated; and then proceeded to Bridge-north, in which place he could not fail making a pompous entry, Mr. R. Cresswell, jun. a professed Jacobite, who designed to stand for Member of Parliament for that place, having sent a circular letter to the Clergy round about, and others who were well-wishers to the Doctor's doctrine, desiring them to accompany him into town, and favour him with their company at dinner. According to this invitation, most of the neighbouring Clergy and Gentlemen repaired to Bridge-north on the 5th of July; so that, when Dr. Sacheverel came near the town, he was met by Mr. Cresswell, at the head of about four thousand horse, and near three thousand foot, most of them with white knots, edged with gold, and three leaves of gilt laurel in their hats; the hedges, two miles from the town, being dressed with flowers, and lined with people, and the two steeples adorned with fifty pounds worth of flags and colours. The Doctor being likewise invited to Ludlow, he repaired thither the 7th of July, being met by great numbers of men on horseback, and a vast multitude on foot, with drums beating, trumpets sounding, and colours flying; and, being conducted to the apartment prepared for him, was most magnificently entertained. But this was the last stage of the Doctor's triumph; for, expecting to be received at Worcester with the same honours and respects, which had been paid him in other places, he set out from Ludlow, in order to repair thither, but met with some flights and affronts in some towns through which he had passed. His disappointment and mortification were still more remarkable at Worcester. Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of that See, having given express orders to the Clergy of his Diocese against paying any respect to the Doctor, which were punctually obeyed.

(2) The Lord Wharton had held a Parliament at Dublin before he resigned, which he had opened the 19th of May with a speech, recommending Union among themselves, and a zeal for the Protestant Intere-

1710. board; but the other four Commissioners, Sir John Leake, Sir George Byng, Mr. Dodington, and Mr. Metbuen were continued; to whom were added Sir William Drake and Mr. Aislaby. Mr. George Granville, a near relation of the Earl of Bath, was appointed Secretary at war, in the room of Mr. Robert Walpole; and Mr. Manley was made Surveyor-General, in the room of Mr. Samuel Travers; and Mr. Arthur Moore was made one of the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations. Mr. Robert Raymond, an eminent Lawyer of Gray's-Inn, was appointed Solicitor-General in the room of Mr. Eyre, who, on the 5th of May, had kissed the Queen's hand, and been knighted, in order to be made one of the Judges of the Queen's-Bench, in the room of Sir Henry Gould, deceased; and Sir Edward Northey was made Attorney-General. Dr. Keble, Dean of Worcester, who, of late, had grown into great confidence with Mr. Harley, was nominated to succeed Dr. Hall, deceased, in the Bishoprick of Bristol; and Dr. Byss to succeed Dr. Bull deceased, in the See of St. David. The Duke of Hamilton was appointed Lord Lieutenant of the County Palatine of Lancaster; the Earl of Portmore was made Commander in chief of her Majesty's forces in Portugal in the room of the Earl of Galway; the Lord Winchelsea took the post of Lieutenant-General; and General Webb made Governor of the Isle of Wight.

So sudden and so entire a change in the Ministry is scarce to be found in our history, especially where men of great abilities had served with such zeal and success, that the administration of all affairs, both at home and abroad, in their hands, was not only without exception, but had raised the admiration of all Europe. All this rose purely from the great credit of the new favourites, and the Queen's personal dislike to the old ones. The Queen was much delighted with all these changes, and seemed to think she was freed from the chains, which the old Ministry held her in. She spoke of it to several persons, as a captivity which she had been long under. The Duke of Somerset had very much alienated the Queen's mind from the old Ministry; but he was so displeased with the dissolution of the Parliament, and the new model of the Ministry, that, though he continued some time Master of the Horse, he refused to sit any more in Council, and complained openly of the artifices which had been used to make him instrumental to other people's designs.

On the 28th of September the Queen went to Hampton-Court, having the same day ordered the Seals to be put to a Commission for renewing the Lieutenancy of the City of London; in which several Whigs, who were in the former, were left out, and Tories put in their places. This new Commission was chiefly designed, both to prevent Sir Gilbert Heathcote, an Alderman near the chair, and Governor of the Bank (who had given offence to the Court by his application to the Queen in favour of the late Ministry) from being chosen Lord-Mayor, and to strengthen the interest of the High-Church party in the election of Parliament men for the Capital City, which generally has a great influence upon other elections. But that Commission was opened too late to have the intended Effect; for, the election for a Lord-Mayor coming on the 29th of September, according to custom, the majority appeared for Sir Gilbert Heathcote and Sir Robert Beacroft; and though a poll was demanded, and great interest made by the Tory-party for Sir Richard Hoare, yet the two first had the majority of voices; and, being on the 5th of October, returned by the Common-Hall, the Court of Aldermen, on the 11th, chose Sir Gilbert Heathcote Lord-Mayor for the year ensuing; but in this point he had but common justice done him, there having been an agreement made some years before between the Aldermen of London, to chuse him who was next the chair, to prevent animosities and disputes. On the 10th of October, the Queen's Commission for a new Lieutenancy was opened at Guild-Hall, when Sir Samuel Garrard, then Lord-Mayor, Sir Francis Child, Sir John Parsons, Sir Robert Bedingfield, Sir William Withers, and Sir Richard Hoare, were chosen Colonels of the six City-regiments. About a fortnight after the new Lieutenancy of London presented an address to the Queen, who took that opportunity to desire them, "as they had great fortunes of their own, that they would use their endeavours to support the public credit." It was expected, that this recommendation would have had a good effect, and engaged the Tory-party

A and Protestant Succession. But this did not hinder the enemies to both, from defacing the statue of King William, on the 25th of June, which had been erected by the City of Dublin, after the battle of the Boyne. They twisted the sword that was in one hand, wrested the truncheon out of the other, daubed the face with dirt, and offered it other indignities. The address, on this occasion, of the commons of Ireland, deserves to be remembered; after taking notice of the Lord Wharton's concern for their preservation from the enemies of their happy Establishment, who envied their late glorious Sovereign the honour of a statue, erected as a testimony how much was owing to their Deliverer from Popery and Slavery: They added, "His memory must be ever dear to all men, except those who desire to bring our religion, lives and properties into the same dangers from which his courage and conduct so bravely and seasonably rescued us. And such we unanimously declare all those to be, who, on any pretence whatsoever, endeavour to reflect on the justice of the late happy Revolution, the memory of God's great instrument in effecting it, or the necessary means made use of in bringing it about. Had their most intemperate and maliciously accomplished their design, by entirely demolishing and destroying that monument of our gratitude; yet, are we persuaded, that his name would always be distinguished with honour, and continued dear to a People delivered, by him, from Popish superstition, and Popish slavery; and to whose reign we are indebted for those inestimable laws, which exclude all Popish successors, and settle the Crown upon our most gracious Queen, and the Husbands of her body, being Protestants; and, for want of such allies, on the most illustrious House of Hanover. So that if we have any true regard for her Majesty's Title, for our most Holy Religion, or for our civil Liberties, we cannot sufficiently acknowledge your Excellency's most generous care, to detect so base and barbarous a fact, nor omit any opportunity of expressing our detestation of those, whose repeated indignities, offered to the memory of our great Deliverer, are sufficient indications of their being enemies to our happy Constitution in Church and State, and of their opposition to the Pretender." The City of Dublin entered the Statue to be repaired, for which they had the thanks of the House of Commons.

1710. party in the City, either to advance money to the Government, or to use their utmost endeavours to support the public funds. But neither of these happened; and so the Bank, East-India, Annuities, and other Stocks continued sinking, which gave the Ministry no small uneasiness; the rather, because some bills of Exchange, drawn from Genoa for remittances into Spain, happened at this juncture to be protested. Mr Harley, the new Chancellor of the Exchequer, sent his Agents into the City, who found means to engage several rich Merchants and Bankers, particularly Mr John Lambert, a French Refugee, to supply the urgent necessities of the Government.

The election of Parliament-men.

By this time the elections for Parliament-men were over in several places; and by the first returns it appeared, that, amongst the new Members, the number of the Whigs was near equal with that of the Tories; which, as was then given out, answered the expectation and desires of the new Managers. For having gained their chief aim, which was to remove the late Lord-Treasurer and his friends, it was by many believed, that they designed to carry things even between both parties; and therefore wished only for such a Majority of the High-Church in the House of Commons, as might countenance the new scheme; and whom, on the other hand, they might easily check by means of their own creatures, if an unreasonable zeal for the Church should prompt them to make any motions against the Toleration. If this was the real intention of the new Ministry, or of Mr Harley in particular, the chief Author of the late changes; it soon appeared, that they were either mistaken in their computation, or disappointed in their wishes; and that the new Members of the High-Church party far out-numbered those of the contrary side; which, besides the influence of the Court, was owing to several other causes. For, in the first place, many of the Whig Gentlemen, who either could not be induced to believe, that the last Parliament would be dissolved, till the blow was given; or who, in case of a dissolution, thought themselves secure of being re-chosen, had neglected making an interest; whilst those, who designed to oppose them, had early taken all the necessary measures to carry their point. Secondly, the ferment, raised by Dr Sacbeverel's trial, was now rather increased than abated, being industriously fomented and propagated throughout the Kingdom, in order to influence elections; which it did effectually, and in a more visible manner, in the Cities and Boroughs, through which that Divine had made his triumphant progress in the summer. Thirdly, all the inferior Clergy, a few excepted, thinking themselves attacked through the sides of Dr Sacbeverel, were more than ordinarily zealous and diligent in promoting the interest of such, as they thought best affected to the Church; not only without any regard to the necessary qualifications of personal merit or estate in the Candidates, but in several instances, in breach of the common duties of gratitude, strenuously opposing their very Patrons and Benefactors. Besides a course, for some months, of very inflaming sermons, they went about from house to house, pressing their people to shew, on this great occasion, their zeal for the Church, and now or never to save it. They also told them, in what ill hands the Queen had been kept, as in captivity; and that it was a charity; as well as their duty, to free her from the power, which the late Ministry exercised over her. In the last place, there was a vast concourse of rude multitudes brought together, who behaved themselves in so boisterous a manner, that it was not safe, and in many places not possible, for those, who had a right to vote, to come and give their votes for a Whig. Open violence was used in several places. This was so general through the whole Kingdom, all at the same time, that it was visible, that the thing had been concerted for some time, and the proper methods and tools had been prepared for it. The influence of the mob was, in a particular manner, remarkable in the election for the City of Westminster; where Mr Medicot and Mr Cress being set up by the High-Church party, some of those, who offered to give their voices for their Competitors, General Stanhope and Sir Henry Dutton Colt, were knocked down and wounded, which obliged many of their party to return home without polling; so the two first Candidates had a vast majority. The Whigs expected, that the election of the City of London would balance that of Westminster; and indeed, the first day of the poll, their Candidates had a considerable advantage; but such industry was used by the then Lord-Mayor and the Aldermen of the High-Church party, in bringing many Citizens upon the livery, and engaging their votes, that, upon closing the books, Sir William Wilters, Sir Richard Hoare, Sir George Newland, and Mr John Calf, all four of that party, having the majority of votes, were declared duly elected. After the poll was ended, there were extraordinary rejoicings throughout the City, by illuminations, bonfires, ringing of bells, &c. and the tumultuous mob were so exalted and enraged against those, who seemed not to partake in the public joy, that they broke all the windows they saw unlighted, without distinction; so that many houses of the Church-party were damaged, as well as those of the Whigs, and in particular that of Sir Richard Hoare, one of the four, for whose sakes these rejoicings were made. Some days before, the mob was guilty of a still greater instance of outrage; for, as Sir Gilbert Heathcote, one of the Whig Candidates, and Lord-Mayor elect, was going out of Guild-Hall, they not only insulted him with reproachful language, but one of them spit in his face.

Though the Tories had boasted, that none of the Managers against Dr Sacbeverel would be rechosen Members of Parliament; yet, notwithstanding the utmost endeavours, that were used to prevent it, Sir Joseph Jekyll, Sir Peter King, Mr Lechmere, and Mr Walpole, were returned; as was also General Stanhope for Cockermouth, though he lost his election at Westminster: However, there were few Whigs returned, against whom petitions were not offered; there were in all about a hundred, and, by the first steps after the meeting of the Parliament, the majority made it appear, that they intended to clear the House of all who were suspected to be of that party. As for the elections in Scotland, the sixteen Peers returned were the Dukes of Hamilton and Arbuthnot; the Marquis of Annandale; the Earls of Mareischal, Eglington, Mar, Loudoun, Hume, Kinoulde, Northesk, Orkney, Roseberry, Illy; the Lord Viscount Kellie; and the Lords Balmoro 1710. rino and Blantyre. And the elections of the Commons were much upon an equal foot between Whigs and Tories.

On the 30th of October, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Lord-Mayor of London, was, according to custom, sworn at the Exchequer in Westminster; but the pageantry, and some other parts of the usual solemnity, were omitted, as he well knew, he was not acceptable to the common people, some of whom were so bold as to insult him in the cavalcade. On the 6th of November, the Queen came from Hampton-Court to St James's Palace, where, the next day, she kept the general Thanksgiving, for the successes of the last campaign, in her Royal Chapel.

Two days after, a remarkable advertisement, signed Henry St John, was published in the London Gazette, importing, "That, some evil-disigning persons having unfcrewed and taken away several iron bolts out of the great timbers of the West roof of the Cathedral Church of St Paul, her Majesty, for the better discovery of the offenders, was pleased to promise her most gracious pardon, and a reward of fifty pounds, to any person concerned therein, who should discover his accomplices." This advertisement occasioned the report of a plot to destroy the Queen and the Court, by the fall of the roof of St Paul's, on the Thanksgiving-day, when it was supposed her Majesty would have gone thither; which pretended screw-plot (as it was afterwards called) many of the Tories and Emisaries of the new Ministry were ready enough to charge upon the Whigs. But upon enquiry it appeared, that the missing of the iron pins was owing to the neglect of some workmen, who thought the timbers sufficiently fastened without them.

Third Parliament of Great-Britain. Pr. H. C. Mr Bromley chosen Speaker.

The Parliament being met on the 25th of November, the Commons, by direction from the Throne, proceeded to the choice of a Speaker, which, as it was generally expected, fell, without any opposition, on Mr Bromley. He had, for many years past, been chosen Members for the University of Oxford; was sure of all the votes of the Church-party, of which he had been one of the most constant and resolute leaders, particularly in the two first Parliaments of this Reign, when he brought in, and strenuously supported, the Occasional Conformity bill. Sir Thomas Hanmer and Mr Smith, formerly Speaker, and another Member, were at first proposed; but this was only to try the temper of the House; for, as soon as Mr Bromley was named, the general voice was for him. The Queen, being, on the 27th of November, come to the House of Peers, made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Queen's Speech.

"I Have, by calling this Parliament, made appear the confidence I place in the duty and affections of my subjects; and I meet you here with the greatest satisfaction, having no reason to doubt, but that I shall find such returns, as will add new life to our friends, and intirely disappoint the hopes of our enemies.

"To this end I shall recommend to you what is absolutely necessary for our common safety.

"The carrying on the War in all its parts, but particularly in Spain, with the utmost 1710. "vigour, is the likeliest means, with God's blessing, to procure a safe and honourable Peace for Us and all our Allies, whose support and interest I have truly at heart.

"For this purpose I must ask from you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, the necessary Supplies for the next year's service: And let me put you in mind, that nothing will add so much to their efficacy, as unanimity and dispatch.

"I cannot, without great concern, mention to you, that the Navy, and other Offices, are burthened with heavy debts, which so far affect the public service, that I most earnestly desire you to find some way to answer those demands, and to prevent the like for the time to come: The justice of Parliament, in satisfying former engagements, being the certain way for preserving and establishing national credit.

"I am sensibly touched with what my people suffer by this long and expensive war, to which, when it shall please God to put an end, the flourishing condition of my subjects shall be as much my care, as their safety is at present.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The eyes both of friends and enemies are upon you. The way to give spirit to the one, and to defeat the restless malice of the other, is to proceed in such manner, as becomes a British Parliament.

"I shall, in the plainest words, tell you my intention; and I do this with the greatest satisfaction, because I depend upon their being agreeable to you.

"I am resolved to support and encourage the Church of England, as by law established:

"To preserve the British Constitution, according to the Union: And to maintain the Indulgence by law allowed to scrupulous consciences.

"And, that all these may be transmitted to posterity, I shall employ none but such, as are heartily for the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, the interest of which Family no person can be more truly concerned for than myself.

"These are my resolutions; and your concurrence with me in a steady pursuit of them, will best manifest your zeal for our Religion, for the interest of our Country, for your own Safety, and for my Honour."

The Queen, in this speech (the sentiments whereof were supposed to come from Mr Harley) took no notice of the successes of the last campaign, as she had always done in her former speeches; and it was much observed, that, instead of promising to maintain the Toleration, she had, in Sacheverel's language, said, she would maintain the Indulgence, granted by law, to scrupulous consciences. The Lords presented an address of an odd composition to the Queen, which shewed, it was not drawn by those who had penned their former addresses. Instead of promising, they would do all that was possible towards a vigorous prosecution of the war, in order to an honourable peace, they only promised to concur in all reasonable measures to that end, which seemed to import a limitation, as if they had apprehended, that unreasonable things might

The address of the Commons.
Fr. H. C.
Vol. IV.

"These are the ends (namely, prosecution of the War, safety of the Church, indulgence to scrupulous Consciences, preservation of the Union, adherence to the Protestant Succession) truly worthy your Majesty's pursuit; and we do, with all humility, represent to your Majesty, that the most effectual way to give spirit to your friends, and defeat the restless malice of your enemies, will be, by discountenancing all persons of such principles, and avoiding all measures of such tendency, as may weaken your Majesty's Title and Government, the settlement of the Crown in the illustrious House of Hanover, and advance the hopes of the Pretender; and all other principles and measures, that have lately threatened your Royal Crown and Dignity, which, whenever they prevail, will prove fatal to our whole Constitution, both in Church and State."

But this address had but little or no effect in relation to the public funds; most of the Whigs and Monied Men, being still uneasy, whilst the Doctrine of Absolute Passive Obedience and of Hereditary Right, wholly inconsistent with the late Revolution and the Hanover Succession, were countenanced; not to mention their just apprehensions, that the Duke of Marlborough would be either laid aside, or made so uneasy, as to be obliged to resign his command. This jealousy was increased upon what happened, on the 28th of November, in the House of Peers, where the Earl of Scarborough having made a motion, that the thanks of the House should be returned to the Duke, some objections were raised against it by the Duke of Argyle, and the Duke of Marlborough's friends, being apprehensive, if the question were put, it would be carried in the negative, said, it would be time enough to speak to that matter, when the Duke was come home. The next day a complaint was made by the Earl of Rochester against the Lord-Keeper Harcourt, for taking upon him to introduce the Scots Lords to the Queen, being himself no Peer by Patent. But, the late Lord-Chancellor Cowper maintainings, he had a right to act as he had done, no further notice was taken of it. The Commons readily granted the supplies for the next year's service, and gave such dispatch to the Land-tax bill, that it received the Royal Assent before the short recess at Christmas.

Motion to thank the Duke of Marlborough dropped.

Earl of Peterborough appointed to go to Vienna,

About the beginning of December the Queen appointed the Earl of Peterborough to go to Vienna, to concert measures with the Imperial Court for the vigorous prosecution of the war, particularly in Spain, which, at this juncture, seemed to be the Court's favourite project, though not generally approved. For many observed, that this was the very thing, which the French King had been aiming at in the late negotiations, namely, to make a separate peace, exclusive of Spain, in order to carry the stress of the war into that country, where, whatever engagement he entered into, he might underhand assist his Grandson, who, having the affections of the people, might prosecute the war with great advantage over the Allies, whereby the French King would ease himself of the war in Flanders, which distressed him most, and threatened the very heart of his Dominions. About the same time Earl Rivers was sent to the Court of Hanover, from whence he was lately returned. It was also declared, that the Queen had, on the 12th of December, named Mr Richard Hill to be her Envoy-Extraordinary to the United Provinces, and to the Council of State appointed for the Government of the Spanish Low-Countries, in the room of Lieutenant-General Cadogan, who was recalled. The military men were not so surprized at this change, as when they heard, that the Commissions of Lieutenant-General Meredith, Major-General Maccartney, and Brigadier Honeywood were superseded, upon an information laid before the Queen, that these three Gentlemen had, in their cups, drank Damnation and Confusion to the New Ministry, and to those, who had any hand in turning out of the Old (1). Some persons, who, about this time, came over from Flanders, extenuated the crime of those three Gentlemen, averring, "they only drank a health to the Duke of Marlborough, and confusion to all his enemies;" which is usual in all armies, out of respect to the Commander in chief. But, whether this excuse was well-grounded or not, the new Ministers thought it necessary to make an example, in order to keep within bounds the Generals, and other Officers of the army, some of whom, it was said, dropped doubtful expressions of standing by their General. And this might administer the greater cause of suspicion at this juncture, because the design of making a General for life was laid to the charge of the Old Ministry in a pamphlet, called Faults on both sides, written by Mr Clements, and countenanced by some Great Men, and particularly the Earl of Peterborough. Not many days after the Earl of Hertford, son to the Duke of Somerset, was made Governor of Tinnmouth-fort, in the room of General Meredith, who, about this time, had a further mortification put upon him, his place of Gentleman of the horse to the Queen being given to Mr Conyers Darcy, brother to the Earl of Holderness. On the 13th of December the Dukes of Beaufort and Hamilton were sworn of her Majesty's Privy-Council; and, about the same time, Sir James Wisbart and Mr George Clarke were made Commissioners of the Admiralty, in the room of Mr Melbuen and Mr Doddington; and Mr Whitworth, who was Envoy to the Czar of Muscovy, was appointed Ambassador Extraordinary to the same Court. The Queen likewise appointed the Earl of Abingdon Justice in Eyre, in the room of the Earl of Warton, and his Countess one of the Ladies of the Bed-chamber. Not many days after the Queen knighted Sir Con-

1710. stantine Phipps, one of Dr Sacheverel's Counsel in his late trial, and made him Lord-Chancellor of Ireland.

The Duke of Marlborough, having embarked in Holland, arrived, the 28th of December, at London. Upon his entrance into the City about five in the evening, his coach was attended by a great Number of people with links and flambeaux, who by their acclamations expressed their joy at his return. The Duke thought it prudence, at this juncture, to avoid the least shew of popularity, and therefore ordered his coach, instead of driving directly to St James's, to go to Montague-House, from whence, after having rested an hour or two, he went out by a private door. Upon his arrival at St James's, he immediately waited upon the Queen, who discoursed with him about half an hour; after which, he retired to his apartment.

The Duke assisted at a Committee of the Privy-Council the next morning; and, afterwards, received the visits of the Earl of Rochester, President of the Council, the Earl Portland, first Commissioner of the Treasury, the Secretaries of State, and other persons in the Ministry. It was, however, for many days a question with the public, whether he had any interview with Mr Harley, who had now the greatest share, both in the Queen's confidence, and in the management of affairs. Those, who pretended to know the secret of the Court, seemed persuaded, that the Queen had resolved to remove all coldness, that might be between them; and the event justified their conjecture.

The uncertainty, whether the Duke of Marlborough would be continued in his command in Flanders, cast, in the mean time, a fresh damp on the public credit. It was therefore the general wish and expectation of the most wealthy and substantial Citizens, that, in order to remove that doubt, the Duke should receive the thanks, if not of both, at least of either of the two Houses of Parliament. But the Duke's friends in the House of Peers, having already failed in one motion for it, were unwilling to attempt it a second time; especially, as they found the majority of the House inclined to pass that compliment on the Earl of Peterborough. And, as for his friends in the House of Commons, they found their number too small to venture to attempt it at all. For this the Duke had been prepared by the Queen, who, upon his coming over, told him, he was not to expect the thanks of the two Houses as formerly. She added, that she expected he should live well with her Ministers, but did not think fit to say any thing of the reasons she had for making those changes in the Ministry (1). However, the Duke shewed no resentments for all the ill usage he met with; and, having been much pressed by the States and the other Allies to continue in the command of the army, he told the Bishop of *Salisbury, he resolved, upon that account, to be patient, and to submit to every thing, in order to the carrying on the war; and, finding the Queen's prepossession against his Ducheys was not to be overcome, he carried a surrender of all her places to the Queen. She was Groom of the Stole, had the Robes and the Privy-purse; in all which she had served with great œconomy and fidelity to the Queen, and justice to those who dealt with the Crown. The Ducheys of Somerſet had the two first places, and Mrs Majham the last.

The Queen's birth-day, Feb. 6. was this year solemnized with extraordinary magnificence; but it was observed, that the Duke of Marlborough did not appear at the festival, having, with the Queen's leave, set out four days before for Blenheim-House, with the Marquis de Peschal Governor of Brussels, lately come from Flanders, and Monsieur de Seiffan, on whom the Queen afterwards conferred a noble gratuity for his gallant, though unsuccessful, attempt the last summer, against Port de Cette, in order to assist the Cevennois.

During the short recess of the Parliament, the news came of the ill success in Spain; and, this giving an handle to examine into that part of the conduct of the late Ministry, the Queen was advised to lay hold of it; and therefore, without staying till she heard from her own Ministers or her Allies, as was usual, she laid the matter before the Parliament, as the public news brought it from Paris, which was afterwards found to be false in many particulars. On the 2d of January, Mr Secretary St John delivered to the Commons a message from the Queen, acquainting them, "That there had been an action in Spain, very much to the disadvantage of King Charles's affairs, which having fallen, particularly on the English forces, the Queen had immediately given directions for sending and procuring troops to repair this loss, not doubting but the Parliament would approve thereof." The like message was sent to the Lords (2); and both Houses returned their thanks for it; the Commons assuring her at the same time, "That they were perfectly satisfied in her great care; intirely depended upon her wisdom; and would effectually support her Majesty in her measures for retrieving the loss in Spain." And the Lords observing, "That, as this misfortune might have been occasioned by some preceding mismanagement, they would use their utmost endeavours to discover it, so as to prevent the like for the future." And they immediately entered into an inquiry concerning the affairs of Spain. They began it with an address to the Queen, to delay, for some days, the Earl of Peterborough's journey to Vienna, that they might make use of such lights and informations, as he was able to give them concerning those affairs. This was readily granted, and the Earl, in answer to five questions proposed to him in a Committee of the whole House, gave a long recital of the affairs of Spain, loading

(1) The Duke, instead of having the thanks of either House, had the mortification to see a scurrilous letter published, supposed to be sent to the Mayor of London, and containing, what the Author called, Reasons why a certain great General had not the thanks of either of the two Houses of Parliament, &c.

(2) Bishop Ewmet says, that, in her message, the Queen said, she hoped they would approve of the orders she had given. This (says he) was a mean expression from the Sovereign, not used in former messages, and seemed below the dignity of the Crown. II. 558.

(1) This

1710. loading the Earl of Galway with all the miscarriages in that war (1). And, in particular, he said, that in a Council of war in Valencia, in the middle of January 1706-7, the Earl of Galway had pressed the pushing an offensive war for that year; and that the Lord Tyravley and Stanbope had concurred with him in that: Whereas he himself was for lying on a defensive war for that year in Spain: He said, this resolution was carried by those three, against the King of Spain's own mind: and he imputed all the misfortunes that followed in Spain, to this resolution so taken. Stanbope had given an account of the debates in that Council to the Queen; and the Earl of Sunderland, in answer to his letter, had wrote by the Queen's order, that she approved of their pressing for an offensive war; and they were ordered to persist in that. The Earl of Sunderland said, in that letter, that the Queen took notice, that they three (meaning the Earl of Galway, Lord Tyravley, and Stanbope) were the only persons that were for acting offensively: And that little regard was to be had to the Earl of Peterborough's opposition. Upon the strength of this letter, the Earl of Peterborough affirmed, that the whole Council of war was against an offensive war: He laid the blame, not only of the battle of Almanza, and all that followed in Spain, upon those resolutions, but likewise the miscarriage of the design on Toulon; for he told them of a great design, he had concerted with the Duke of Savoy, and of the use that might have been made of some of the troops in Spain, if a defensive war had been agreed to there. The Earl of Galway and the Lord Tyravley were sent for; and they were asked an account of that Council at Valencia. They said, there were many Councils held there about that time; and that both the Portuguese Ambassador and General, and the Envoy of the States, agreed with them in their opinions, for an offensive war; and they named some Spaniards, that were of the same mind: They also said, that all along, even to the battle of Almanza, in all their resolutions, the majority of the Council of war voted for every thing that was done, and that they were directed to persist in their opinions, by letters wrote to them, in the Queen's name, by the Secretaries of State: That as to the words, in the Earl of Sunderland's letter, that spoke of them, as the only persons that were of that opinion; these were understood by them, as belonging only to the Queen's subjects, and that they related more immediately to the Earl of Peterborough, who opposed that resolution, but not to the rest of the Council of war; for the majority of them was of their mind (2).

As the Lord Galway said, his memory might have failed him in some important particulars, he desired that he might be allowed to give in writing what he had delivered by word of mouth; which being granted, he gave in two papers; the one related to his own conduct from his first setting out for Portugal, till the time he was recalled; the other was an answer to the recital given in writing also by the Earl of Peterborough, with other papers (3).

After several debates (at which the Queen was present) the House of Lords was so disposed, that the majority believed every thing said by the Earl of Peterborough, and it was carried, 'That he had given a very faithful, just, and honourable account of the Councils of war in Valencia, and that the Earl of Galway, Lord Tyravley, and General Stanbope, insisting in a conference held at Valencia, some time in January, 1706-7, in the presence of the King of Spain; and the Queen's name being used in maintenance of their opinions for an offensive war, contrary to the King of Spain's opinion, and that of all the General Officers and public Ministers, except the Marquis das Minas; and the opinion of the Earl of Galway, Lord Tyravley, and General Stanbope, being pursued in the operations of the following campaign, was the unhappy occasion of the battle of Almanza, and one great cause of our misfortunes in Spain, and of the disappointment of the Duke of Savoy's expedition before Toulon, concerted with her Majesty.'

From this censure on the Earl of Galway, The late Ministry censured. Burnet. the debate was carried to that, which was chiefly aimed at, to put a censure on the ministry here. So it was moved, that an address should be made to the Queen, to free those, who were under an oath of secrecy, from that tie, that a full account might be laid before the House of all their consultations: The Queen granted this readily; and came to the House, which was understood to be on design to favour that, which was aimed at. Upon this the Duke of Marlborough, the Earls of Godolphin and Sunderland, and the Lord Cowper shewed, that, considering the force sent over to Spain under the Lord Rivers, they thought an offensive war was advisable; that the expence of that war was so great, and the prospect was so promising, that they could not but 1710. but think an offensive war necessary; and that to advise a defensive one, would have made them liable to a just censure, as designing to protract the war. The design on Toulon was no way intermixed with the affairs of Spain; the Earl of Peterborough fancied he was in that secret, and had indeed proposed the bringing over some troops from Spain on that design, and had offered a scheme to the Duke of Savoy, in which that was mentioned, and had sent that over to England. But though the Duke of Savoy suffered that Lord to amuse himself with his own project, which he had concerted for the attempt on Toulon; that Duke had declared he would not undertake it, if it was not managed with the utmost secrecy, which was sacredly kept, and communicated only to those, to whom it must be trusted for the execution of it. No troops from Spain were to be employed in that service, nor did it miscarry for want of men. These Lords further said, they gave their opinions in Council, according to the best of their judgment; their intentions were very sincere for the service of the Queen, and to bring the war to a speedy conclusion. However it was voted, after a warm debate, 'That it appeared by the lord Sunderland's letter, that the carrying on the war offensively in Spain was approved and directed by the Ministers, notwithstanding the design of attempting Toulon, which the Ministers, at that time, knew was concerted with the Duke of Savoy; and therefore were justly to be blamed for contributing to all our misfortunes in Spain, and to the disappointment of the expedition against Toulon. That the Earl of Peterborough, during the time he had the honour of commanding the army in Spain, did perform many great and eminent services; and, if the opinion he gave in the Council of war at Valencia had been followed, it might very probably have prevented the misfortunes, that had happened since in Spain.' The Lords of the High-Church party having, by the help of the Scots, who all voted on that side, carried these questions, the Earl of Wharton moved, that such Lords, as were against them, might enter their protests, which was readily granted (1).

Reflections
on it.

Here was a new and strange precedent of censuring a resolution taken in Council; and of desiring the Queen to order all, that had passed in Council, to be laid before the House: In all the hot debates in King Charles the first's Reign, in which many resolutions taken in Council were justly censurable, yet the passing any censure on them was never attempted by men, who were no way partial in favour of the prerogative: But they understood well what our Constitution was in that point: A resolution in Council is only the Sovereign's act, who, upon hearing his Counsellors deliver their opinions, forms his own resolution: A Counsellor may indeed be liable to censure, for what he may say at that board; but the resolution taken there has been hitherto treated with a silent respect; but, by this precedent, it will be hereafter subject to a Parliamentary enquiry. The Queen was so desirous to have a censure fixed on her former Ministry, that she did not enough consider the wound given to the prerogative, by the way in which it was done.

After these proceedings it was moved by the Duke of Buckingham, that the thanks of the House should be given to the Earl of Peterborough, for his remarkable and eminent services; which being ordered, the Lord-Keeper Harcourt addressed himself to the Earl, in a speech, wherein he obliquely reflected on the rewards that had been received by the Duke of Marlborough:

'Such is your Lordship's known generosity and truly noble temper, that I assure myself, the present I am now offering to your Lordship is the more acceptable, as it comes pure and unmixed, and is unattended with any other reward, which your Lordship might justly think would be an allay to it.'

The next morning the Earl set out for Vienno, and the Lords, not content with what had been done, entered, on the last Day of January, into an enquiry about the force we had in Spain at the time of the battle of Almanza, and it was found not to exceed fourteen thousand men, though the Parliament had voted twenty-nine thousand*. 'This seemed to be a crying thing, and tragical declarations were made upon it.† But, in truth, that vote had passed only in the January before the battle of Almanza, which was fought on the 14th of April following. Now it was not possible to levy and transport men in so short a time. It was made appear, that all the money, given by the Parliament for that service, was applied to it, and that extraordinary diligence was used, both in forwarding the levies, and their transportation.

Dissentient

Because that, concerning the Army of the Allies in Spain, was to receive so great an addition of troops by the supply sent under the Earl Rivers, the general desire and expectation of the Kingdom to have the war brought to a speedy conclusion, and all other circumstances of the war, as it then stood, we are of opinion, that an offensive war was then fittest for those in her Majesty's service to advise; and we do not find reason, by any thing arising on the examinations and debates to be of another opinion, the occasion of fighting the battle of Almanza depending, as we conceive, on causes subsequent to that advice; the ill success of it, as we apprehend, being justly attributed to other manifest reasons, and the real design on Toulon, as finally adjusted with the Duke of Savoy, not requiring, as appears to us, the assistance of any forces from Spain.

1710. They were sent from Ireland, the passage from thence being safest and most speedy. All this and a great deal more to the same purpose was said, but it signified nothing (1); for, though no examination had been made, but into that single point of the numbers at Almanza, they came to a general vote, That the late Ministry had been negligent, in the management of the war in Spain, to the great prejudice of the Nation; and they then ordered all their proceedings and votes to be put in an address, and laid before the Queen: And though they had made no inquiry into the expence of that war, nor into the application of the money, given by the Parliament for it, yet in their address they mentioned the great profusion of money in that service. This they thought would touch the Nation very sensibly; and they hoped the thing would be easily believed on their word. Protests were made against every vote in the whole progress of this matter: Some of these carried such reflections on the votes of the House, that they were expunged.

Never (says a certain Author *) was any thing carried on in the House of Lords so little to their honour as this was; some, who voted with the rest, seemed ashamed of it: They said, somewhat was to be done to justify the Queen's change of the Ministry; and every thing elsewhere had been so well conducted, as to be above all censure: So, the misfortune of Almanza being a visible thing, they resolved to lay the load there. The management of the public treasure was exact and unexceptionable; so that the single misfortune of the whole war was to be magnified; some were more easily drawn to concur in these votes, because, by the act of Grace, all those, who had been concerned in the administration, were covered from prosecution and punishment: So this was represented to some, as a compliment that would be very acceptable to the Queen, and by which no person could be hurt. They loaded singly the Earl of Galway, with the loss of the battle of Almanza, though it was resolved on in a Council of war, and he had behaved himself in it with all the bravery and conduct, that could be expected from a great General, and had made a good retreat, and secured Catalonia with unexpressible diligence.

The Earl of Galway was also censured for not insisting on the point of honour in the precedence to be given to the English troops, as soon as the Portuguese army entered into Spain. The Earl being indisposed with the Gout, the Lords sent him a question in writing: 'Why, whilst he commanded the British troops in Spain, he gave the right to the Portuguese?' To this he answered, 'That, by the treaty with Portugal, the troops of that Crown were to have the right in their own country, and that, in order to engage them to march to Madrid, he was obliged to allow them the same honour, for otherwise they would never have stirred out of Portugal.' It is certain, if he had made the least struggle about it, the Portuguese, who were not easily prevailed on to enter into Spain, would have gladly enough laid hold of any occasion, which such a dispute would have given them, and have turned back upon it: And so, by his insisting on such a punctilio, the whole design would have been lost. We had likewise, in our treaty with them, yielded expressly the point of the flag in those seas, for which alone, on other occasions, we have engaged in wars; so he had no reason to contest a lesser point. However, the Lords thought fit to resolve, by a majority of sixty-six against forty-four, 'That the Earl of Galway, in yielding the post of her Majesty's troops to the Portuguese in Spain, acted contrary to the honour of the Imperial Crown of Great-Britain.' This was the conclusion of the inquiries made by the House of Lords, a representation of which was, in an address, presented to the Queen on the 10th of February.

In the mean time, the Commons were no less intent upon what seemed to be the principal business of this Session, to cast an Odium on the late Ministry. To this end, on the 3d of January, Mr Harley informed the House, that, in the examinations relating to the Navy, some very considerable abuses were discovered in the Victualling; and that a Member of the House was named therein. The Commons, after these examinations were laid before them, voted, on the 15th of February, "That there had been many notorious embezzlements and scandalous abuses in the management of her Majesty's brewhouse, and in contracts for furnishing beer, to the defrauding of the public, and injury of the seamen. That Thomas Ridge (Member of the House) having contracted to furnish five thousand five hundred and thirteen tun of beer upon his own account, and two thousand seven hundred and four tun of beer, in partnership with Mr Dixon, and having received bills for the whole, although he had delivered out but three thousand two hundred and thirteen tun on the first, and one thousand two hundred and sixty-nine tuns on the latter contract, be expelled the House: And that an address be presented to her Majesty, to cause Mr Ridge to be prosecuted for the same." However, this Gentleman was not prosecuted, but continued to serve the Navy as before; for, upon examination it appeared, that in fact the public suffered no wrong. The case stood thus: The service of the fleet had of late lain for the most part in the Mediterranean, where the difference of climate rendered the beer sent from hence useless; and the seamen, being not able to drink it there, required wine and water, which is ordinarily used on board the fleets in those parts. But as the Victualling-Office can, in their accounts, charge beer only, it was allowed to the seamen by the Office to take money of the Brewer, wherewith to buy wine in the Streights. Thus, though the beer was not delivered, and the seamen drank wine, yet the Nation paid for no more than the allowance of beer. Many other Brewers were complained of on the same account, but

(1) Bishop Burnet too justly observes here, When resolutions are taken up before-hand, the debating concerning them is only a piece of form used to come at the question with some decency: And there was so little of that observed at this time, that the Duke of Buckingham said in plain words, that they had the majority, and would make use of it, as he had observed done by others, when they had it on their side.

(1) The

1710 11. but it was plain this was only a shew of zeal, and a seeming discovery of fraudulent practices, when in reality there was no such thing, or at least the abuse was such, that it was suffered to go on as avowedly as ever.

*Two Lotteries
Burnet.
Pr. II. C.*

The money did not come into the Treasury so readily as formerly, neither upon the act of four shillings in the pound, nor on the duty laid on malt: So to raise a quick Supply, there were two bills passed, for raising three millions and a half by two lotteries, the first of one million five hundred thousand pounds; and the second of two millions, to be paid back in thirty-two years; and for a fund, to answer this, duties were laid on hops, candles, leather, cards, and dice, and on the postage on letters. In one branch of this, the House of Commons seemed to break in upon a rule, that had hitherto passed for a sacred one. When the duty upon leather was first proposed, it was rejected by a majority, and so, by their usual orders, it was not to be offered again during that Session: But, after a little practice upon some Members, the same duty was proposed, with this variation, that skins and tanned hides should be so charged; this was leather in another name. The Lotteries were soon filled up; so, by this means, money came into the Treasury; and indeed this method has never yet failed of raising a speedy supply (1). There was no more asked, though, in the beginning of the Session, the House had voted a million more than these bills amounted to; which made some conclude, there was a secret negotiation and prospect of peace.

of the Palatines.
Burnet.
Pr. H. C.*

The Commons, finding the encouragement given to the Palatines, was displeasing to the people, resolved to inquire into that matter. In order to this, a petition was procured from the inhabitants of St Olave and other parishes, "Complaining of the great number of Palatines inhabiting in one House, whereby it was feared some contagious distemper might happen, and, having not wherewithal to subsist themselves, were likely to become chargeable to the parish!" This petition was immediately referred to the consideration of a Committee, appointed for that purpose, with instructions to inquire, "Upon what invitation or encouragement the Palatines came over, and what monies were expended in bringing them into Great-Britain, and for maintaining them here, and by whom paid." As the design was now formed to load the late Administration all that was possible, it was pretended, that, in the whole affair of the Palatines, there was a design against the Church, and, to increase the numbers and strength of the Dissenters. The Queen was addressed for the papers relating to the bringing over and subsisting the Palatines; and at last the House agreed to the following resolutions of their Committee, "That the inviting and bringing over into this Kingdom the poor Palatines, of all Religions, at the public expence, was an extravagant and unreasonable charge to the Kingdom, and a scandalous misapplication of the public money, tending to the increase and oppression of the Poor of this Kingdom, and of dangerous consequence to the Constitution in Church and State. 2. That whoever advised the bringing over the poor Palatines into this Kingdom, was an enemy to the Queen and Kingdom." And because a letter written by the Earl of Sunderland, in the Queen's name, to the Council of Trade, was laid before them, by which they were ordered to consider of the best methods of disposing of the Palatines; it was moved to lay the load of that matter on him in some severe votes. But this was put off for that time, and afterwards, by several adjournments delayed, till at last it was let fall.

While the heat, raised by this inquiry, was kept up, the Commons passed a bill to repeal the act for a general Naturalization of all Protestants, which had passed two years before; pretending that it gave the encouragement to the Palatines to come over, though none of them had made use of that act, in order to their Naturalization. This was sent up to the Lords; and the Lord Guernsey, and some others, entertained them with tragical declamations on the subject; yet, upon the first reading of the bill, it was rejected, to the great joy of all the foreign Protestants. It is remarkable, if the bill was designed to prevent the French Refugees from enjoying the benefit of the Naturalization, it had in some measure a contrary effect: For whereas, since the passing of the act for a general Naturalization, scarce fifteen hundred of them took the advantage of it; above two thousand were naturalized after the motion for repealing it was made, till it was rejected by the Lords. A bill, that was formerly often attempted, for disabling Members of the House of Commons to hold places, had also the same fate.

However, another bill for qualifying Members, by having six hundred pounds a year for a Knight of the Shire, and three hundred pounds a year for a Burgess, succeeded better: The design of this was to exclude Courtiers, Military Men, and Merchants, from sitting in the House of Commons, in hopes, that, this being settled, the land-interest would be the prevailing consideration in all their consultations. They did not extend these qualifications to Scotland; it being pretended, that, estates there being generally small, it would not be easy to find men so qualified capable to serve. This was thought to strike at an essential part of our Constitution, touching the freedom of elections: And it had been, as often as it was attempted, opposed by the Ministry, though it had a fair appearance of securing liberty, when all was lodged with men of estates: Yet our Gentry was become so ignorant, and so corrupt, that many apprehended the ill effects of this; and that the interest of trade, which indeed supports that of the land, would

(1) The scheme of the lottery was drawn by Mr John Blount, Scrivener of London, who was employed by the Lords of the Treasury; which, being approved, was inserted in the lottery-bill. When it was advertised, on the 10th of March, that the payments would begin to be taken in at Moorers-Hall on the 13th, it was found, that about two hundred and sixty-six thousand pounds had been subscribed at the Bank of England, above the first payment of the whole sum of one million and a half.

(1) False

1710-11. would neither be understood nor regarded. But the new Ministers resolved to be popular with those who promoted it; so it passed, and was much magnified, as a main part of our security for the future.

Another bill passed, not much to the honour of those who promoted it, for the importation of French wine. The interest of the Nation lay against this so visibly, that nothing but the luxury of those, who loved that liquor, could have carried such a motion through the two Houses. But, though the bill passed, it was like to have no effect; for it was provided, that the wine should be imported in natural vessels; and the King of France had forbid it to be exported in any vessels but his own. It seems he reckoned, that our desire of drinking his wine would carry us to take it on such terms, as he should prescribe.

In the House of Commons there appeared a new combination of Tories of the highest form, who thought the Court was yet in some management with the Whigs, and did not come up to their height, which they imputed to Mr Harley; upon which account they began to form themselves in opposition to him, and expressed their jealousy of him on several occasions, sometimes publicly. But an odd accident, that had almost been fatal, proved happy to him. The Marquis de Guiscard, of whom a large account has been given *, enjoyed his pay as Colonel, till some time after the battle of Almanza; when that ceased, he solicited to have a settled pension in the time of the late Ministry; but his intimacy with some persons, who had been removed from their employments, particularly Mr St John, with whom he entered into a strict confidence and community of pleasures, did not at all promote his affair. When Mr St John, by the great change at Court, was advanced to the post of Secretary of State, the Marquis expected to have found a great support in him. But as all friendships, that are not grounded on virtue, are ever short-lived, the Secretary, who had some time before quarrelled with the Marquis about a mistress, or rather a child, which neither of them would own, was hardly prevailed with to speak in his favour. However, upon his faint recommendation, the Queen ordered him a pension of five hundred pounds a year; but Mr Harley, who never liked Guiscard, not only reduced his pension to four hundred pounds, but declined to have it put upon a fixed establishment. The Marquis endeavoured several times to apply to the Queen for redress; but being denied access, and highly disgusted with the usage he received from those very persons, whom he had looked upon as his intimate friends, he tried to make his peace with the Court of France, and, in order to that, wrote to Monsieur Moreau, a Banker in Paris. His letter being directed to a person in Portugal, under the cover of the Earl of Portmore, his Lordship, suspecting something, opened one of the packets, and, finding in it a dangerous correspondence, sent it back to his Lady, the Countess of Dorchester, who delivered it to Mr Harley; and by her means another packet, which Guiscard would have transmitted to Por- tugal, was intercepted. It was pretended by some, that those letters contained only loose reflections on the weakness and mean capacity of the present Ministry; but, whatever was the purport of them, the Marquis was, on the 8th of March, apprehended in St James's Park for high-treason, by virtue of a warrant from Mr Secretary St John. He was so surprized and disordered, that he desired the Messenger, who disarmed him, to kill him: And, being brought to the Cockpit in the height of despair, he took the resolution to make his ruin fatal to those, who occasioned it; and, seeing in the room where he was confined a penknife, which lay among pens in a standish, he took it up unperceived by the Messengers, who watched him. A Committee of Council being summoned on this extraordinary occasion, and the Lord-Keeper Harcourt, the Earl of Roche-ster, the Dukes of Buckingham, Newcastle, and Ormond, Earl Paulet, Mr Harley, and the three Secretaries of State, the Duke of Queensberry, the Lord Dartmouth, and Mr St John, being met, the Marquis was brought before them to be examined. Mr St John, asked him several questions about his corresponding with France, to which he returned evasive answers, with an assured countenance. But when Mr St John asked him, Whether he knew Mr Moreau, Banker at Paris? producing, at the same time, the intercepted letters, the Marquis appeared very much surprized. Finding himself discovered, and despairing of a pardon, he resolved to put his black design in execution. It was the general opinion, that his design was to make his first attempt upon Mr St John; which appears the more probable, because, as soon as he thought himself in a manner convicted of the crime, for which he was apprehended, he desired to speak with him in private; but Mr Secretary told him, That was impracticable and unusual: That he was before the Committee of the Council, as a criminal; and if he had any thing to offer, it must be said to them all. The Marquis persisting in his desire to speak only to Mr St John, they went to ring the bell, to call in the Messengers to carry him away; which he observing, said, That's hard; not one word (1). Being disappointed in his design against Mr St John, who sat out of his reach, he stepped towards the table, as if he intended to say something to Mr Harley; and, stooping down, said, Then have at thee (2); and stabbed him about the middle of the breast; but the penknife, lighting on the bone, broke about half an inch from the handle; which Guiscard not perceiving, redoubled the blow, and with a great force struck Mr Harley not far from the first wound. When Mr St John saw Mr Harley fall, he cried out, The villain has killed Mr Harley; and drawing his sword immediately, as did also the Duke of Newcastle, and some others, they gave Guiscard several wounds. But when they saw Mr Harley get up, and heard Earl Paulet cry out, not to kill Guiscard, they gave over making passes at him. Some of the Privy-Counsellors secured themselves with chairs against the rage of the assassin, who seemed to threaten them all. Others ran out of the room to call for help; and the Messengers

1710 11. Messengers and Door-keepers having rushed in, and offering to lay hold on Guiscard, he struggled for a while, and overthrew some of his assailants; but, at last, Wilcox, one of the Queen's Messengers, a very strong man, grappled with him, and gave him several bruises, particularly one in the back, which was afterwards judged to have occasioned his death.

Mr Harley's wound was presently searched, and appeared to be a very slight one, yet he was long in the surgeon's hands. Some imputed this to an ill habit of body; others thought it was an artifice, to make it seem more dangerous than indeed it was. Guiscard's wounds were deeper, and not easily managed; for at first he was sullen, and seemed resolved to die; yet after a day he submitted himself to the surgeons; but did not complain of a wound in his back till it gangrened; and of that he died. It was not known what particulars were in his letters, nor was it known what he confessed.

This accident was of great use to Mr Harley; for the party formed against him were ashamed to push a man, who was thus assassinated by one, that was studying to recommend himself to the Court of France, and who was believed to have formed a design against the Queen's person (1); whose health was at this time much shaken, she having had three fits of an ague, and the last a severe one; but the progress of the disease was stopped by the bark.

The day after Mr Harley received his wound both Houses of Parliament agreed upon an address to the Queen, wherein they expressed their great concern for the most barbarous and villainous attempt made upon the person of Mr Harley; adding, 'That they had reason to believe, that his fidelity to her Majesty, and zeal for her service, had drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of popery and faction; and besought her Majesty to take all possible care of her sacred person; and, for that purpose, to give directions for causing Papists to be removed from the cities of London and Westminster.' The Queen took this advice very kindly, promised to give the proper directions, according to the desire of both Houses, and recommended to them to make a law, to punish with death such villainous attempts on the lives of Magistrates in the lawful execution of their office, though the mischiefs designed should not take effect. Upon which an act was passed this Session, 'to make an attempt on the life of a Privy-Counsellor to be felony without benefit of the Clergy.' On the other hand, a proclamation was published, strictly to put in execution the laws against Papists. And, when Mr Harley came first to the House of Commons after his recovery, he was by their order congratulated upon it by Mr Bromley, their Speaker, in a set flattering speech, wherein he prayed, 'That the same providence, that had wonderfully preserved him from some unparalleled attempts, and had raised him up to be an instrument of great good at a very critical juncture, when it was much wanted, might continue still to preserve so invaluable a life, for the perfecting of what was so happily begun; that they might owe to his counsels, and to his conduct, the maintenance and firm establishment of our constitution in Church and State.'

In the beginning of May, died suddenly the Earl of Rockingham, the Queen's Uncle, and Mr Harley, being rid of the only competitor in her favour, soon became Prime-Minister. Upon his recovery she created him Baron of Wigmore, and Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, two of the most noble titles in the English Hierarchy. The Veres had been Earls of Oxford many ages, and the title of Mortimer had been in the Royal Family. Preambles to patents of honour usually carry in them a short account of the dignity of the family, and of the services of the person advanced: But his preamble was very pompous, and set him out in the most extravagant characters that flatterers could invent; in particular it said, that he had redeemed the nation from robbery, had restored credit, and had rendered the public great service in a course of many years: All this was set out in too fulsome rhetoric, and, being prepared by his own direction, pleased him so much, that, whereas all other patents had been only read in the House of Lords, this was printed. He was also made Lord-Treasurer, (2) and he had the chief, if not the sole, direction of every thing. It soon appeared that his strength lay principally in managing parties, and in engaging weak people, by rewards and promises, to depend upon him; but that he

(2) When, on the 1st of June, he came to take the Oaths in the Court of Chancery, the Lord-Keeper Harcourt addressed himself to him in the following speech, which surpassed even Mr Bromley's:

My Lord of Oxford,

"The Queen, who does every thing with the greatest wisdom, has given a proof of it in the honours she has lately conferred on you, which are exactly suited to your deserts and qualifications.

"My Lord, The title, which you now bear, could not have been so justly placed on any other of her Majesty's subjects. Some of that ancient blood, which fills your veins, is derived from the Veres; and you have shewed yourself as ready to sacrifice it for the safety of your Prince, and the good of your Country, and as fearless of danger on the most trying occasions, as ever any of that brave and loyal House were. Nor is that title less suited to you, as it carries in it a relation to one of the chief seats

"of learning; for even your enemies, my Lord (if any such there still are) must own, that the love of letters, and the encouragement of those, who excel in them, is one distinguishing part of your character.

"My Lord, The high station of Lord-Treasurer of Great-Britain, to which her Majesty has called you, is the just reward of your eminent services. You have been the great instrument of restoring the public credit, and relieving this Nation from the heavy pressure and ignominy of an immense debt, under which it languished: and you are now intrusted with the power of securing us from a relapse into the same ill state, out of which you have rescued us. This great office, my Lord, is every way worthy of you; particularly on the account of those many difficulties, with which the faithful discharge of it must be unavoidably attended, and which require a genius like your's to matter them. The only difficulty, which even you, my Lord, may find insuperable, is how to deserve better of the Crown and Kingdom after this advancement, than you did before it."

1711. neither thoroughly understood the business of the Treasury, nor the conduct of foreign affairs. But he trusted to his interest in the Queen, and her favourite Mrs Masham.

A design against King William's grants mis-carries. Burnet. Pr. H. L. The Tories still continued to pursue the memory of King William; they complained of the grants made by him, though these were far short of those, that had been made by King Charles the 1st; but that they might distinguish between those, whom they intended to favour, and others, against whom they were set, they brought in a bill, empowering some persons to examine all the grants made by him, and to report both the value of them, and the considerations upon which they were made: This was the method, that had succeeded with them before, with relation to Ireland; so the bringing in this bill was looked on, as a sure step, for carrying the resumption of all the grants, that they had a mind to make void. When the bill was sent up to the Lords, the design appeared to be an unjust malice, both against the memory of King William, and against those who had best served him; and therefore, upon the first reading, the bill was rejected (1).

Inquiries into the public accounts. Burnet. Pr. H. C. The Commons turned their malice next against the Earl of Godolphin. A Committee (of which, Mr Edward Harley, Auditor of the Imprest was Chairman) having been appointed to inquire how far the several Imprest Accountants had passed their respective accounts; the Commons found by their report, that the Supplies given by Parliament were not all returned, and the accounts of many millions were not yet passed in the Exchequer; therefore they passed a vote, 'That of the monies granted by Parliament, and issued for the public service to Christmas 1710, there remains unaccounted for, the sum of above thirty-five millions, for great part of which no account has so much as been laid before the Auditors, and the rest not prosecuted by the Accountants and finished.'

This was a vast sum; but, to make it up, some accounts in King Charles's time were thrown into the heap; the Lord Ranelagh's accounts of the former reign were the greatest part; and it appeared, that in no time accounts were so regularly brought up, as in the Queen's reign. Mr Bridges's accounts, of fourteen or fifteen millions, were the great item, of which, not above half a million was passed: But there were accounts of above eleven millions brought in, though not passed in form, through the great caution and exactness of the Duke of Newcastle, at whose office they were to pass; and he was very slow, and would allow nothing, without hearing counsel on every article. The truth is, the methods of passing accounts were so sure, that they were very slow; and it was not possible, for the proper officers, to find time and leisure to pass the accounts that were already in their hands. Upon this, though the Earl of Godolphin had managed the Treasury, with an uncorruptedness, fidelity, and diligence, that were so unexceptionable, that it was not possible to fix any censure on his administration; yet, because many accounts stood out, the Commons passed several angry votes on that subject: But, however, since nothing had appeared in all the examination made by the Committee, that reflected on him, or on any of the Whigs, they would not publish the report, though it was ordered to be printed*, for by that it would * See Pr. H. C. IV. 206. have appeared who had served well, and who had served ill (2).

In the beginning of April, the Dauphin of The Empire and the Emperor Joseph both died of the small-pox. When notice came of the Emperor's death, the Queen sent, on the 20th of April, a message to both Houses, importing, "That she had come to a resolution to support the interest of the House of Austria, and to use her utmost endeavours to get the King of Spain made Emperor: That the States-General had concurred with her Majesty; and that she had taken the most proper measures to engage all those, who had a share in this election, and were in the interest of the common 1711. "mon cause, to join with her in bringing this great work to a good issue: And she had an intire confidence in the affection and duty of her Parliament, that, with their assistance, she should be enabled to make a happy conclusion of the war in a safe and honourable peace." This produced a joint address from both Houses in almost the same language as the message, both which are the more remarkable, as the message gave some intimation of the project, which the new Ministry formed upon the death of the Emperor, and which they afterwards published, to make a treaty with the Emperor and the West-Indies to King Philip; not only because the regaining of them for King Charles was attended with insuperable difficulties, but also because, in their opinion, the same, if practicable, would destroy the balance of Europe, the settling of which was the chief aim of the Grand Alliance. And, both Houses of Parliament having, in that address, shewn a disposition to approve any measures which her Majesty should think proper to procure a peace, the Ministry thought themselves armed with sufficient authority to pursue their scheme.

An act for the South-Sea trade.
Barnet.
Pr. H. C.

The last thing settled by the Parliament, was the creating a new fund for a trade with Spain. The Commons, on the 20th of January, had appointed a Committee to examine the debts of the Navy; and, about two months after, they reported, that these debts amounted to above five millions. This great debt upon the Navy was occasioned partly by the deficiency of the funds appointed for the service at sea, but chiefly by the necessity of applying such supplies as were given, without appropriating clauses, to the service abroad, where it was impossible to carry it on by credit, without ready money; by which means it had risen up to so many millions, and the discount on Navy-bills was very high (1). All the debts, which were thrown into one Stock, amounting in the whole to 9,471,325*l.* and a fund was formed for paying an interest or annuity of 6 per cent. till the principal should be paid, which interest amounted to the annual sum of 568,279*l.* 10*s.* For the raising of this sum, all the duties upon wines, vinegar, and tobacco, India goods, wrought silks, whale-fins, &c. were, after the year 1716, continued for ever, and till then the Parliament was to make an annual provision for the interest. With this fund was also granted the monopoly of a supposed trade to the South-Sea or coast of Peru in America; the several proprietors of the Navy-bills, Debentures, and other public securities, being to be incorporated for that purpose. This grant may justly be called chimerical, since the projector knew he was entering upon a negotiation of peace, which, by the cession of Spain and the West-Indies, would for ever exclude the English from the privileges of trading to Peru and Mexico. Accordingly instead of such trade, King Philip, upon the conclusion of the peace, gave the pre-

In the same manner he states the accounts of Mintons, Snitting, Mazon, Povey, Munksworthy, and Savery; by which it appears, that, of the thirty-five millions, above thirty millions were accounted for, though not all paid, and that the total to be accounted for amounted only to 4,330,135*l.* which, Mr. Munksworthy observes, was much short of a year's Supply. He says further on this subject, "No Accomptants could be found, who were to render in account under fifteen months, nor some under eighteen; yet this vote takes in all accounts to the first meeting of the Committee; but there is no mention made from what period of time they did commence. To have been particular, in every respect, was too much for the compass of a vote; so that there are accounts from King Charles, King James, and King William's Reigns, in the principal branches of the expence in all the revenue brought in, to make up and swell the general account; and this is, by many thousands of people, without doors, imputed to the late Ministers. He then exposes the partiality of the House of Commons, of which he was himself a Member, in ordering so unjust a vote to be printed: Adding, "And now if I may be allowed to suppose what I think I have fully proved, that many irregularities, and unavoidable delays, attend the passing of some accounts, which no care or industry can prevent. If it happen, that the nature of the services, and the method of payment in some offices, being inconsistent with the course of the Exchequer, require Privy-Seals, and are the work of longer time than is limited for paying accounts; if it appears, that these irregularities, incident to accounts, are yet necessary for the accommodation of the service, and not to be avoided without infinite prejudice to the management; and if it appears, that the security of the public does not entirely depend upon the actual passing of accounts, provided they have been daily rendered, all which he fully makes out, I hope people will begin to be satisfied, that the Nation has not been cheated of thirty-five millions."

(1) A full account of this matter was soon after published in a letter about the debts of the Navy, by which it appeared, that the public money had been managed with the utmost fidelity; and it was made evident, that, when there was not money enough to answer all the expence of the war, it was necessary to apply to that which pressed: So this debt was contracted by an inevitable necessity, and all reasonable persons were fully satisfied with this account of it. The Author of the letter thus shews the reasonableness of including the Extra-Services in the accounts of the Navy (besides which, he makes the charge upon the late Ministers to amount only to a little above five thousand pounds) "I must (says he) make one observation more to you: That as the debts of the Navy have annually increased, an annual account of it has been laid before the House of Commons, who were constantly informed how far the provision, made for the preceding year, had fallen short of answering the expence; but being sensible, that the more pressing Supplies were as much could be well raised within the year, they still thought it more advisable to leave the extraordinary charges as a grow-

1711. carious licence to send a ship or two thither yearly, limiting them both as to tonnage and value of cargo. This scheme produced what is called the South-Sea Company (1).

The flatterers of the new Ministers made great use of this to magnify them, and to asperse the old Ministry. But the Earl of Godolphin's unblemished integrity was such, that no imputation of any sort could be fastened on him; and therefore, to keep up a clamour, they reflected on the expence he had run the Nation into, upon the early successes in 1706, which were very justly acknowledged, and cleared in the succeeding Session, as hath been related. But that affair was now revived, and it was said to be an invasion of the great right of the Commons in giving supplies, to enter on designs, and to engage the Nation in expence not provided for by Parliament. This was aggravated with many tragical expressions as a subversion of the Constitution; and at the end of the Sessions an inflaming representation about this and the thirty-five millions, of which the accounts were not yet passed, was presented by the Commons to the Queen, wherein they tell her, 'That they had not only raised the necessary supplies, but discharged the heavy debts so long and so justly complained of, and traced the causes thereof: That in several years the service had been enlarged beyond the bounds prescribed by Parliament: That the surplusage of some funds had not been applied to answer the deficiency of others; but other uses were found out, such as were neither voted nor addressed for by Parliament, which therefore we judge a misapplication of publick money. The debt of the Navy has arisen from a liberty, that has been taken of transferring money, issued for that service, to other uses, particularly for provisions for the land-forces in Spain and Portugal. To this we must add, the many notorious embezzlements in your Majesty's brew-house; and that the Commissioners for victualling have been guilty of great negligence; that the Receivers of the land-tax were not obliged to make due and punctual payments.' Then they added, 'Thus far have we proceeded in discovering some of those causes, which have brought so great a weight of debts upon the Nation; and we might have made a much greater progress in our inquiries, if the accounts of the publick money had been regularly passed; but, to our great surprize and concern, we find, "That they, who of late years have had the management of your Majesty's Treasury, and ought to have compelled the several Accomptants duly to pass their respective accounts, have been guilty of so notorious a breach of trust, and of so high an injustice to the Nation, that of the monies granted by Parliament, and issued for the publick service to Christmas 1710, there remains unaccounted for the sum of thirty-five millions, three hundred and two thousand, one hundred and seven pounds; for a great part of which no accounts have so much as been laid before the Auditors: And for the rest, though some accounts have been brought in, yet they have not been prosecuted by the Accomptants and finished." This has made it impracticable for us to arrive at so exact a knowledge of the State of the Nation, with regard to the publick money, as we wished, and might have expected; and your Majesty will please to consider, in such an immense sum unaccounted for, how many embezzlements may be concealed, and how justly it is to be suspected, that so scandalous a remissness has been allowed with no other design. We humbly beseech your Majesty, that you will give immediate and effectual directions for the compelling the several Imprest Accomptants speedily to pass their accounts; and, in the mean time, we humbly hope your Majesty will approve the resolution of your Commons, "That such of the Accomptants, who have ing debt, than to increase the public burden upon the people, by enlarging the usual provisions for the Navy. And in the Parliament before the last, a full account of the Navy-debt being called for, the late Ministers were so far from being blamed upon this subject, that, after a full consideration, and long debate about the causes and methods of contracting that debt, the House came to a resolution in their favour, and went as far in approving their conduct and management, as any subsequent Parliament has gone in censuring them: And, when the justice of two different Parliaments comes to be the question, I must not take upon me to determine between them, but will only make this short remark: That, from such time, at least, as the sense of the House was known upon this occasion, the late Ministry cannot be thought blameable for proceeding in their usual method, when they were supported by authority and approbation of Parliament.'

"neglected their duty in prosecuting their accounts, ought no longer to be intrusted with receiving the publick money." From all these evil practices, and waste designs of some persons, who had, by false professions of love to their country, insinuated themselves into your Royal favour, irreparable mischief had accrued to the publick, had not your Majesty, in your great wisdom, reasonably discovered the fatal tendency of such measures; and, out of your singular goodness to your people, removed from the administration of affairs, those who had so ill answered the favourable opinion your Majesty had conceived of them, and in so many instances grossly abused the great trust reposed in them. Your people could, with greater patience, have suffered the manifold injuries done to themselves, by the frauds and depredations of such evil Ministers, had not the same men proceeded to treat your sacred person with undutifulness and disregard; but as the interests of your Majesty and your People are inseparable, and are, by your Majesty and your good Subjects, inseparably pursued, the wrong, which those men had done to the publick, drew upon them your Royal displeasure; and their irreverence towards your Majesty justly exposed them to the indignation of your people.

This representation was artfully spread through the nation, by which weaker minds were possessed, that it was not easy to undeceive them, even by the fullest and clearest evidences; the Nation seemed still infatuated beyond the power of conviction.

The Parliament is prorogued.

On the 12th of June the Queen came to the House of Peers, and, having given the Royal assent to ten publick and seven private bills, made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Queen's speech to both Houses.
F. H. C.

"I T is with great pleasure I tell you, at the end of this Session, that you have fully made good all the assurances you gave me at the beginning of it.
"This I look upon as a further pledge of my subjects duty and affection, which is the firmest support of my Throne.
"I thank you Gentlemen of the House of Commons, in a particular manner for what you have done. You have complied with my desire in granting a supply for building many new Churches, and you have not only enabled me to carry on the war, but have made effectual provision for paying those heavy debts, which were almost grown an insupportable burthen to the public; and this at a time, when our enemies every where pleased themselves with the hopes, that the supplies for the service of the current year could not have been found. You have disappointed them in all respects; and by the great sums you have raised, the greatest ever granted to any Prince in one Session, you have restored the public credit, which I will take care to preserve by a frugal management.
"The world must now be satisfied, that nothing can be too difficult for a Parliament, filled with so much zeal for the true interest of the nation in Church and State.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The satisfaction I take in the power, with "which God has intrusted me, is to employ it for the protection and good of all my people, whose prosperity I have as much at heart, as ever any of my predecessors had.

"You see the happy effects of a mutual confidence between me and my Subjects. I shall look upon any attempt to lessen it, as a step towards dissolving my Government.

"The temper you have shewn, will, I hope, convince those, who have the misfortune to differ from our Church, that their Liberty is not in danger.

"It is needless for me to repeat the assurances of my earnest concern for the Succession of the House of Hanover, and of my fixed resolution to support and encourage the Church of England, as by law established.

"You are now returning to your several countries; and I expect from you, that you will further recommend yourselves to me, by studying to promote the public peace and quiet."

At the close of this speech, Lord-Keeper Barnet. Harcourt prorogued the Parliament to the 10th of July. Thus ended this Session, and all considering persons had a melancholy prospect, when they saw what might be apprehended from the two Sessions, that were yet to come of the same Parliament.

The Convocation was opened the 25th of November, the same day in which the Parliament met; and Dr Atterbury, in preference to Dr Kennet, was chosen Prolocutor by a great majority. The Queen sent a letter to the Archbishop, dated December 12, in which she signified her hopes, that the consultations of the Clergy might be of use to repress the attempts of persons of loose and prophane principles, and prevent the like for the future: And promised she would give them all fitting encouragement, to proceed in the dispatch of such business as properly belonged to them, and grant them such powers as should be thought requisite for carrying on so good a work; confiding in them that her Royal intentions would not be frustrated, by unreasonable disputes about unnecessary forms and methods of proceeding. Soon after the Queen sent a licence by the Lord Dartmouth, under the Broad-Seal, to sit and do business in as ample a manner as was ever granted since the Reformation. By this licence, the Queen empowered them to enter upon such consultations as the present state of the Church required, and particularly to consider of such matters as she should lay before them, limiting them to a Quorum; that the Archbishop, the Bishop of London, or the Bishop of Bath and Wells, should be present, and agree to their resolutions: With this licence, there was a letter directed to the Archbishop, in which the Convocation was ordered, to lay before the Queen an account of the late excessive growth of infidelity and heresy among us; and to consider how to redress abuses in excommunications; how rural Deans might be made more effectual; how Terriers might be made and preserved more exactly; and how the abuses in licences for marriage might be corrected.

In this whole matter, neither the Archbishop nor any of the Bishops were so much as consulted with; and some things in the licence were new: The Archbishop was not named the Pre-Exception to the licence.

1711. sident of the Convocation, as was usual in former licences; and, in these, the Archbishop's presence and consent alone was made necessary, except in case of sickness, and then the Archbishop had named some Bishops to preside, as his Commissaries: And, in that case, the Convocation was limited to his Commissaries, which still lodged the presidentship and the negative with the Archbishop: This was according to the primitive pattern, to limit the Clergy of a province to do nothing, without the consent of the Metropolitan; but it was a thing new and unheard-of, to limit the Convocation to any of their own body, who had no deputation from the Archbishop. So a report of this being made, by a Committee that was appointed to search the records, it was laid before the Queen: And she sent the Bishops a message to let them know, that she did not intend that those, whom she had named to be of the Quorum, should either preside, or have a negative upon their deliberation, tho' the contrary was plainly insinuated in the licence. The Archbishop was so ill of the gout, that after their first meetings he could come no more: So was also the Bishop of London; upon which the Bishop of Bath and Wells, seeing how inviously he was distinguished from his brethren, in which he had not been consulted, pretended ill health, and the Convocation was at a stand, till a new licence was sent them, in which the Bishops of Winchester, Bristol, and St Davids, were added to be of the Quorum. The two last were newly consecrated, and had been in no functions in the Church before: So the Queen not only passed over all the Bishops made in King William's Reign, but a great many of those named by herself, and set the two last in a distinction above all their brethren. All this was directed by Atterbury, who had the confidence of the chief Minister; and, because the other Bishops had maintained a good correspondence with the former Ministry, it was thought fit to put marks of the Queen's distrust upon them, that it might appear, with whom her Royal favour and trust was lodged.

A representation drawn for the Queen. The Convocation entered on the consideration of the matters referred to them by the Queen: And a Committee was appointed to draw a representation of the present state of the Church, and of Religion among us; but, after some heads were agreed on, Atterbury procured, that the drawing of this might be left to him: And he drew up a most virulent declamation, defaming all the Administration from the time of the Revolution: Into this he brought many impious principles and practices, that had been little heard of or known, but were now to be published, if this should be laid before the Queen. The Lower-House agreed to his draught; but the Bishops laid it aside, and ordered another representation to be drawn in more general and more modest terms. It was not settled, which of these draughts should be made use of, or whether any representation at all should be made to the Queen: For it was known, that the design in asking one was only to have an aspersi-cast, both on the former Ministry and on the former Reign. Several provisions were prepared, with relation to the other particulars in the Queen's letter: But none of these were agreed to by both Houses (1).

An incident happened, which diverted their thoughts to another matter. Mr Whiston, the Mathematical Professor in Cambridge, a learned man, of a sober and exemplary life, but much addicted to search after Paradoxes, endeavoured to revive the *Arian Heresy, though he pretended to differ from Arius in several particulars. He found his notions favoured by the Apostolical Constitutions; so he reckoned them a part, and the chief part of the Canon of the Scriptures. For these tenets he was censured at Cambridge, and expelled the University: Upon that he wrote a vindication of himself and his doctrine, and dedicated it to the Convocation, promising a larger work on these subjects. The uncontested way of proceeding in such a case was, that the Bishop of the Diocese, in which he lived, should cite him into his Court, in order to his conviction or censure, from whose sentence an appeal lay to the Archbishop, and from him to the Crown: Or the Archbishop might proceed in the first instance in a Court of audience. But there were no clear precedents of any proceedings in Convocation, where the jurisdiction was contested, a reference made by the High-Commission to the Convocation, where the party submitted to do penance, being the only precedent that appeared in history, and even of this there was no record: So that, it not being thought a clear warrant for their proceeding, the Bishops were at a stand. The act, that settled the course of appeals in King Henry the Eighth's time, made no mention of sentences in Convocation; and yet, by the act in the first of Queen Elizabeth, that defined what should be judged Heresy, that judgment was declared to be in the Crown: By all this (which the Archbishop laid before the Bishops in a letter, that he wrote to them on this occasion) it seemed doubtful, whether the Convocation could, in the first instance, proceed against a man for Heresy: And their proceedings, if they were not warranted by law, might involve them in a Præmunire. So the Upper-House, in an address, prayed the Queen to ask the opinions of the Judges, and such others as she thought fit, concerning these doubts, that they might know how the law stood in this matter.

Eight of the Judges, with the Attorney and Solicitor-General (Northey and Raymond) gave their opinion, that the Convocation had a jurisdiction, and might proceed in such a case; but brought no express law or precedent to support their opinion. They only observed, that the law-books spoke of the Convocation, as having jurisdiction; and they did not see that it was ever taken from them: They were also of opinion, that an appeal lay from the sentence of Convocation to the Crown; but they reserved to themselves a power to change their mind, in case, upon an argument that might be made for a pro-

Different opinions about the Power of the Convocation.

(1) During these proceedings died Dr Aldrich, Dean of Christ-Church in Oxford. He was a polite and learned Divine, and a warm Stickler for the Church and Hereditary Right. His zeal, in those respects, had 1711. a prohibition, they should see cause for it. Four of the Judges were positively of a contrary opinion, and maintained it from the Statutes made at the Reformation. The Queen, having received these different opinions, sent them to the Archbishop, to be laid before the two Houses of Convocation; and, without taking any notice of the diversity between them, she wrote that, there being now no doubt to be made of their jurisdiction, she did expect that they should proceed in the matter before them. In this it was visible, that they, who advised the Queen to write that letter, considered more their own humour, than her honour. However, two doubts still remained, even supposing the Convocation had a jurisdiction: The first was, Of whom the Court was to be composed, whether only of the Bishops, or what share the Lower-House had in this judiciary authority: The other was, By what Delegates, in case of an appeal, their sentence was to be examined: Were no Bishops to be in the Court of Delegates? Or was the sentence of the Archbishop and his twenty-one Suffragan Bishops, with the Clergy of the Province, to be judged by the Archbishop of York and his three Suffragan Bishops? These difficulties appearing to be so great, the Bishops resolved to begin with that, in which they had, by the Queen's licence, an undisputable authority: which was to examine and censure the book, and to see if his doctrine was not contrary to the Scriptures, and the first four General Councils, which is the measure set by law, to judge Hereby. They drew out some propositions from his book, which seemed plainly to be the reviving of Arianism; and censured them as such. These they sent down to the Lower-House, who, though they excepted to one proposition, yet censured the rest in the same manner. This the Archbishop (being still disabled by the gout) sent by one of the Bishops to the Queen for her assent, who promised to consider of it: But she did not send an answer till the Convocation came to an end; neither, at their next meeting the winter following, did any answer come from her, and therefore, two Bishops being sent to ask it, she could not tell what was become of the Archbishop's paper; so a new extract of the censure was again sent to her; but she did not think fit to send any answer, and Woburn's affair remained undecided, though he published a large work in four Volumes Octavo, justifying his doctrine, and maintaining the Canonicalness of the Apostolical Constitutions, preferring their authority not only to the Epistles, but even to the Gospels. But, in this last point, he has made no Profelytes, though he has used his utmost efforts to support it.

The Lower-House would not enter into the consideration of the representation, sent down to them by the Bishops; so none was agreed on, 1711. to be presented to the Queen: But both were printed, and severe reflections were made, in several tracts, on that which was drawn by the Lower-House, or rather by Atterbury. The Bishops went through all the matters, recommended to them by the Queen; and drew up a scheme of regulations on them all: But neither were these agreed to, by the Lower-House; for their spirits were so exasperated, that nothing sent by the Bishops could be agreeable to them.

The parish of Greenwich having petitioned A bill for the House of Commons for assistance in rebuilding their Church, a Committee was appointed to examine the petition, and an instruction was given them to consider what Churches were wanting within the Cities of London and Westminster. Upon this, the Lower-House of Convocation sent a solemn message by their Prolocutor to the Commons, to thank them for this instance of their regard to the welfare of the Established Church, and to offer such lights, as they were able to afford in relation to the extreme want of Churches in London and Westminster. The Commons immediately resolved, That they would receive all such informations, as should be offered in this case, by the Lower-House of Convocation; and would have a particular regard to such applications, as should at any time be made to them from the Clergy in Convocation assembled, according to the ancient usage, together with the Parliament. Pursuant to this resolution, quickened by a recommendation from the Queen (who had been addressed by the Convocation) they passed a bill for the building fifty new Churches, and gave the duty of one shilling a chaldron upon coals, from September 29, 1716, to September 29, 1719, for raising the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand pounds for that purpose. This duty had been reserved for building St Paul's, which was now finished. This was the least that could be expected from a House of Commons, chosen, in great measure, by the zeal and influence of the Clergy, especially, as it was apparent, that, in the Suburbs of London, there were above two hundred thousand people more than could possibly resort to the Churches already built. Soon after this, the Session of Parliament and Convocation both came to an end.

The Duke of Marlborough being continued The Duke in the command of the British forces in Flanders inclined many to hope, that a reconciliation was effected between him and the new Ministry. But this was so far from being the case, Hist. of Europe.

that there was no longer any confidence between him and those that managed affairs at Court; and consequently little was to be expected from the continuation of the war, when the chief Conductor of it was in so uneasy a situation (1). How-

(1) Dr Hart, the Duke of Marlborough's Attendant Chaplain, then in Flanders, and who was in his secrets, describes the Duke's situation in the following manner:

“That little more harmony was to be expected between two rivals in power, than between a falling and a rising Favourite. Some persons, says he, would still pretend to put a good face upon the matter, and do not question, from the Duke of Marlborough's past successes, that he will yet frighten our enemies into an honourable peace. But, I am afraid, he is not likely to do so much at this time, when the enemy are encouraged to take heart afresh; the Allies are full of jealousies and fears, and himself extremely mortified. Things are not the same, any more than the usage he meets with. When he is uneasy in his thoughts, undetermined in the favour of his Sovereign, and vilely misrepresented to the people; when his want of interest at home makes it impossible for the Allies to depend upon the hopes he gives them; when he is without authority in the army, where it is made criminal to espouse his interest; and to fly in his face is the surest means 1711. However, to carry matters on the more smoothly, the Queen wrote a kind letter to the States about the Duke, whose conduct she declared herself to be intirely satisfied with; and assured them, that, according to their desires, she would order the Duke forthwith to go over to Holland. Accordingly, on the 18th of February, he set out from St James's, with a positive assurance, that the payment of the troops under his command would be as effectually taken care of by the new Ministers, as it had been by the old; and, embarking at Harwich the next day, arrived at the Hague on the 4th of March, N. S. to the great satisfaction of the States.

While all things were preparing on both sides for the opening of the campaign, many consultations were held on several weighty affairs, particularly in relation to the assembling a body of troops, to preserve the neutrality of the Empire, which was in imminent danger of being broke by the King of Sweden's refusing to come into the measures already agreed on for that purpose. After several Conferences it was resolved, that her Britannic Majesty and the States-General should employ in that service the eight Palatine battalions in their pay, and provide the other four, that would be still wanting to complete their quota's, where they might best be spared, without affecting the common cause.

There was, at this juncture, another affair of no small consequence in agitation at the Hague. For when the Allies expected to hear, that the King of Prussia's troops were on their march into the field, that Prince's Ministers declared, that, unless their Master had full satisfaction given him, as to the Arrears due to his forces, and the Succession of the late King William, as Prince of Orange, his troops should not march out of their winter-quarters. The Allies were somewhat surprized at this unexpected declaration; but, the Deputies of the States having had several Conferences with the Prussian Ministers, an agreement was concluded, containing in substance, "that the Arrears should be paid in four months time: That, notwithstanding the House of Dieren had been adjudged, by sentence of a court of Judicature, to the House of Nassau, the States consented, that his Prussian Majesty should continue to make use of it: And that the Council, who had administered the revenue of the succession of Orange, since the death of the late King, should be obliged speedily to give an account of the same." As soon as the Deputies had made this Declaration, the King of Prussia approved of the agreement, and his troops began their march for the Netherlands.

The Duke of Marlborough expected with great impatience the arrival of Prince Eugene, who was for some time detained at Vienna by the coming of a Turkish Aga, with a particular Commission from the Ottoman Port, to remove any jealousy, that might be entertained at the Imperial Court, from the warlike preparations, which the Turks were making at this time against Muscovy and Poland. In the mean while the Duke was daily in Conference with the Deputies of the States, to concert the operations of the war; and, it being thought of the utmost importance to be in the field before the enemy, it was resolved, to cause detachments from all the garrisons to canton along the Scarpe, and between that river and the canal of Droway, whereby a great body might in a few hours be formed, and ready to march; which, with great diligence and secrecy, was put in execution, under the direction of Lieutenant-General Cadogan.

On the other hand, the French forces beginning about the middle of April to assemble near Cambray and Arras, the Duke set out from the Hague, and arrived in three days at Tournay, near which place the troops were incamped in several bodies. At a Council of war, it was resolved, that these troops should join, and form the army; which was done at Orchies, between Lille and Droway. The next day the Duke of Marlborough passed the Scarpe, and incamped between Droway and Boucbain, and found, that the enemy had assembled a numerous army behind the Samsel, in a most advantageous post, which was judged inaccessible. Nothing material happened till the 9th of May, when three thousand French, detached from Valenciennes and Condé, attacked a convoy of forty-five boats, laden with hay and oats, which set out for Tournay under a guard of two battalions commanded by Brigadier Chambrier. But, the garrison of St Amand advancing to the assistance of the guard, the enemy retired, having first set on fire twelve of the boats, with the loss of about an hundred men killed and wounded; and the Allies lost about the same number.

The Duke of Marlborough continued in his camp, where he expected the rest of the troops, which were to form his army, and the arrival of Prince Eugene. That Prince was obliged to stay some days at Frankfurt, to concert with the Elector of Mentz the necessary measures for the security of the empire, upon the unexpected death of the Emperor Joseph; after which he proceeded to the Court of the Elector Palatine, to regulate several matters with that Prince, who, as one of the Vicars of the Empire, was to have the chief administration thereof during the Interregnum. By this means Prince Eugene did not join the grand army till the 23d of May. The Duke and Prince were resolved to continue in their camp as long as possible, in hopes that the scarcity of forage would oblige the enemy to decamp; for, after the several attempts, that were made at the post of Arleux, which was taken and retaken, there was no likelihood to force their lines.

In the mean time the French hoping, that the Elector of Bavaria had many friends in the Empire, who would declare for him; and believing, that the Germans, being deprived of their General in chief, would hearken to a neutrality, if that Elector appeared in Germany at the head of a powerful army; resolved to send him means to advancement; when it is meritorious in his Officers to cabal against him; and the most factious will be thought the most deserving; With what heart can a man in these circumstances serve? Or, what success can be expected from him, when he is made to

For Villars thought his lines so secure and impenetrable, that he boasted, they were the Ne plus ultra of the Duke of Marlborough. These lines began at Bouchain, on the Scheld, and were continued along the Sanfet and the Scarpe to Arras, and from thence along the Upper Scarpe and the river Ugy to the Canche, the opening between those rivers being intrenched and fortified with all possible care by a large ditch, defended with redoubts and other works.

The preparations of the enemy alarming the Empire, Prince Eugene received positive orders from Vienna to march with the Imperial and Palatine troops to the Upper Rhine, for securing Germany. Upon this the two armies decamped, the 14th of June, and repassed the Scarpe, Prince Eugene taking his way towards Tournay, and the Duke of Marlborough marching towards the plains of Lens, in sight of the French, who did not offer to insult his rear. The Duke continued there till the 20th of July, when he advanced towards Aire, to make the enemy believe, that he designed to besiege St Omer, or attack their lines on that side. This obliged Villars to re-inforce the garrison of that place, and to draw all his troops to defend his lines between the Scarpe and the Canche, which both armies believed the Duke designed to attack, because of the preparations he had made. The Duke, upon a view of the enemy's lines, finding it would be too hazardous to endeavour to force them, resolved upon a stratagem. To make the enemy believe, he really intended to attack them, he ordered twelve hundred men out, to make roads and bridges in the front, and advanced, with the whole army to Rebreuve, and from thence to Villars-Brulin, within two leagues of the lines. Here he set all his troops to work in making fascines, and gave out, that he intended to attack the lines the next morning. Villars was so fully persuaded of it, that he sent orders to a strong detachment, commanded by Count d'Estain, which had been sent upon a secret expedition, to halt at Perenne, and to the garrisons of Ypres and St Omer, to join his army, which he drew together behind the lines. The Duke, to amuse the enemy more effectually, went, the 4th of August, N. S. by break of day, with several of the General Officers and two thousand horse, to take a nearer view of the situation of the enemy's camp; but his real design, when he advanced from Colé, near Aire, was to endeavour to get within the enemy's lines, by attempting the passage of the Sanfet by Arloux, which he believed was unguarded, as indeed it happened to be. To this end he ordered Cadogan and Hompesch to repair, with all expedition, to Douay, and assemble some troops that were left there on purpose, which, with a detachment of that and the neighbouring garrisons of Lille and St Amand, made a body of three and twenty battalions and seventeen squadrons. Their farther orders were to march directly with their troops to Arloux, and endeavour to pass the Sanfet, while the Duke himself would advance with the whole army to support them. And, that nothing might retard this extraordinary march, Brigadier Sutton was sent beforehand with the artillery and pontoons to make bridges over the Scarpe near Vitry, and over the canal of Arloux, near Goulezin. 1711.

These things were managed so privately, and the feint carried on so well, that the Confederate Generals themselves thought of nothing but attacking the lines the next morning. These amusements had so good an effect upon Villars, that he kept his troops under arms night and day, and reinforced them with all the strength he could possibly draw together, on that side, not leaving any number of troops in the posts he had upon the Sanfet.

The Confederate army, in the mean time, were expecting orders to march, which were not given till six in the evening. The march was to begin between eight and nine, as soon as it was dark enough to strike their tents, without being seen by the enemy; but, whether the march was to be to the right or left, was not known. They were only told, that the several columns, which the army was to march in, should find an officer at the head of each, at such an hour, who should lead them the way they were to take, when the time came. About nine the whole army, to their great surprize, were ordered to march by the left, in four columns, without beat of drum; and the Duke himself, with the horse of the left wing, led the van, and advanced with such extraordinary expedition, that, the next morning by five, he passed the Scarpe at Vitry. Here he received advice, that Hompesch had passed the Sanfet without opposition, and taken possession of the passes on that river, and on the Scheld at Oisy, the French having, some time before, withdrawn the detachments they had on that side. The Duke, upon this, hastened his march, left the enemy should get there before him; and at the same time dispatched orders to the grand army, to pursue their march with the utmost diligence. The Duke, with his van-guard of fifty squadrons, having passed the Scarpe, hastened towards Arloux and Baré Bacbeaul, where he arrived before eight of the clock, and the heads of the columns joined him there about ten, having marched above ten leagues without halting, a thing scarce to be paralleled in history.

Villars, though he had notice of this unexpected march of the Confederate army about eleven at night, was so possessed with the belief that the design was to attack his lines near Avesnes le Comte, that he waited till two the next morning for certain intelligence. Then he decamped with his whole army, and, putting himself at the head of the King's household, marched all night with such diligence, that he appeared with the head of his line about eleven o'clock, soon after the Duke of Marlborough had joined Count Hompesch, and passed with twenty squadrons through the defile of Marquion. But, when he saw the Duke was advancing with his horse to attack him, he retreated to the main body of his army, which was, by that time, advanced to the high road between Arras and Cambray. Mean while the Allies advanced with all possible diligence, and, having all passed, the army incamped upon the Scheld between Oisy and Estrun.

Thus the Confederate army entered the French lines, which they had so vainly boasted to be impenetrable; the boldest attempt, that had been made during the whole war: And the honour

1711. honour of it was the greater to the Duke of Marlborough, as his army was not only weakened by the detachment, which Prince Eugene had carried to the Rhine, but by the calling over five thousand of the best troops in his army for an expedition designed by sea; so that the enemy were superior to him in number. This raised his character beyond all that he had done formerly; the design was so well laid, and so happily executed, that, in all men's opinions, it passed for a master-piece of military skill, the honour of it falling intirely on the Duke of Marlborough, no other persons having any share, except in the execution.

The next day, August 6, whilst the Allies expected the enemy lying upon their arms, advice was brought to the Duke of Marlborough, that they were in motion towards the Scheld, in order to pass it at Crevecœur, and incamp between Cambrai and Bouchain, to prevent the siege of the latter. The Duke detached forty squadrons, with orders to fall upon their rear; but they found it impracticable, by reason of the morais that was between them: And, a Council of war being called, the Field-deputies of the States-General proposed to pursue the enemy, and hazard a battle, since this surprize had put them in no small disorder. The Duke of Marlborough was of a different opinion. He thought the attempt might be too hazardous: The army was much fatigued with so long a march, in which the cavalry had been eight and forty hours on horseback, alighting only twice, about an hour each time, to feed their horses. The French were fresh, having had a much nearer march within their lines, than the Confederates round them; and the Allies were not in a condition for action, till some time were allowed for refreshment. Besides, the Duke foresaw, in case of a misfortune, their being within the enemy's lines might be fatal.

The Duke having disapproved of the proposal made by the Deputies, it was expected he should make another. Accordingly he proposed the besieging of Bouchain, which he thought would oblige the French to endeavour to raise the siege; and that might give occasion to their engaging on more equal terms; or it would bring both a disreputation and a discouragement on their army, if a place of such importance should be taken in their sight. But both the Dutch Deputies and the General Officers thought the enterprize too bold, yet they submitted to his judgment. It seemed impracticable to take a place situated in morais well fortified, with a good garrison in it, in sight of a superior army; for the French lay within a mile of them. There was also great danger from the excursions, which the garrisons of Valenciennes and Condé might make, to cut off their provisions, which were to come from Tournay. All about the Duke endeavoured to divert him from so dangerous an undertaking, since a misfortune in his conduct would have furnished his enemies with the advantages they waited for. All this he was sensible of; but he had laid the scheme so well, that he resolved to venture on it. But, before this resolution was executed, the Duke dispatched Brigadier Sutton to England with the news, that he had without the loss of a man entered those lines, which had cost the enemy so much time and labour to fortify, and of the strength of which they had so much boasted. The Field-deputies sent also an account of that affair to the States-General. The news was received in Holland with an universal joy, and no encomiums were too great for the conductor of the great design; but the satisfaction was not so general in England. When Sutton arrived at Whitehall, with an account of the Duke of Marlborough's passing the French lines, it gave his friends indeed the greater joy, because his enemies had given out, that nothing would be done this year in Flanders, because, as they pretended, he was resolved no affair should succeed under the present administration, if he could help it. But, his enemies, being disappointed, endeavoured to lessen the glory of the action, pretending, he had only removed his army from a plentiful to a starving camp. But this malicious suggestion was soon confuted, as well by the sequel of his success, as by the applause, all Europe gave to his conduct; while Villars was openly reflected on, both in his own army and at Paris.

Pursuant to the resolution taken in the Council of war, the siege of Bouchain was undertaken, the difficulty of which may be judged from the situation of the place. Bouchain is a fortified Town, standing at the confluence of the Sanset and the Selle into the Scheld. The Sanset parts the Upper Town from the Lower, forms an inundation between that and the Selle, and fills the ditches which surround the works between the Upper and Lower Towns. The Selle divides the Lower Town in two Parts, and, between the Lower Town and the Scheld, is a horn-work which covers two separate bastions, and which is cut in two by a ditch supplied by the Scheld. Notwithstanding these, and several other difficulties, the place was invested the 10th of August, N. S. by thirty battalions, and twelve squadrons, commanded by General Fagel. Marshal Villars tried to throw more men into the town by a narrow causeway (called the Cow-path) thro' the morais; but the Duke of Marlborough took his measures so well, that he was guarded against every thing, and drove the French from that advantageous post. He saw what the event of this siege might be; and therefore bestirred himself with unusual application, and was more fatigued in the course of this siege, than he had been at any time during the whole war. The trenches were vigorously carried on, and by the batteries and bombs the town was soon laid in ruins. Villars did all he could to raise the Siege, but to no purpose. When he saw that could not be done, he endeavoured to surprize Doway. To that end, he sent a detachment of ten thousand men under Albergotti (the late Governor of Doway) and thought fit to be there himself in person. They marched the 7th of September in the evening; and, about one in the morning, they were discovered by a patrol of the Confederate horse, who sent intelligence of it to Count Hompelsh; so that orders were immediately given to the Officers in the Out-posts to be upon their guard: But, in the mean time, the enemy advanced towards the gate of St Eloy, where they designed to scale the wall; and several of their boats, filled with soldiers, passed over the inundation to favour the attempt, and came so near the works, that, being challenged by the Centinels, they answered, They were the Governor's fishermen; which the garrison mistrusting, and, at the same time

Those in the inundation left their boats behind, and made what haste they could to join their main body, which marched back, and repassed the Sanfel, with great precipitation, having lost a considerable number of their men by defection.

surrenders.

Villars having failed in all his attempts to relieve Bouchain, the garrison, after twenty days from the opening of the trenches, capitulated, and could obtain no better terms, than to be made prisoners of war. The garrison, consisting at first of six thousand men, was reduced to less than three thousand. The Governor pretended, he was in a condition to have defended himself some days longer; but the soldiers, finding Villars did not attempt to relieve the place, obliged him to capitulate.

The success of this memorable siege, so difficult in all its circumstances, improved the bravery and resolution of the Confederate troops; so that they never expressed so much eagerness for coming to a fair engagement with the enemy. The Duke's stratagem in passing the lines without the loss of a man; the cutting off the communication of the enemy with Bouchain; the manner of the Duke's investing the town with an inferior army; his casting up lines, making regular forts, raising batteries, laying bridges over a river, making a morass passable, and providing for the security of his convoys, against a superior army on the one side, and the numerous garrisons of Condé and Valenciennes on the other, were enterprizes that shewed the great military skill of the Undertaker. As this was reckoned the most extraordinary thing in the whole history of the war, so the honour of it was acknowledged to belong entirely to the Duke of Marlborough; as the blame of a miscarriage in it must have fallen singly on him (1). Villars's conduct on this occasion was much censured, but by means of Madam Maintenon (whose favourite Villars was) it was approved by the King of France.

Whilst the works and breaches of Bouchain were repairing, the Duke of Marlborough sent the Earl of Albemarle to the Hague, to regulate the operations for the remaining part of the campaign with the States; and as he judged, the enemy might be troublesome in the winter, to the conquered places near them, without the reduction of Quefnoy, to obtain their concurrence for the siege of that place. But the States, considering how far the season was spent, and the difficulties which must attend such an enterprize in the sight of the enemy's army, especially in a country, where they had destroyed all the forage, they rejected the proposal. They agreed however, that most of their troops should be quartered in the frontier-towns, not only, that they might be ready to take the field early in the spring, but also to hinder the enemy from making any new lines during the winter, and oblige them, at the same time, to continue their troops upon their frontiers, where they would find it very difficult to subsist them. The Duke, who had been acquainted with the negotiations, that were carrying on in England, by Monsieur Mehner, from the French Court, and the proposals he had given in to the Ministry from his Master, could not but perceive, that the States had this also for an inducement, to make no more sieges during the remainder of the campaign, in order to spare their troops till they saw what would be the result of the negotiations; though they did not think fit to insert it among their other arguments for putting an end to it. The Duke therefore set the forces at work to level the approaches, fill up the breaches, and put the town of Bouchain into a posture of defence; which was not finished till about three weeks after its surrender, through the badness of the weather, which very much incommoded both the French and the Allies, who continued incamped to see each other drawn off to their winter quarters. As soon as Bouchain was put in a good posture of defence, both the armies began to separate, having already greatly suffered by the continual rains, and the scarcity of forage.

This was the last service which the Duke of Marlborough ever performed in the field. The Allies were now in possession of the Moselle, almost to the inlet of the Sambre, and the Scheld, beyond Tournay, and of the Lys, so far as it is navigable. And besides the conquests of Bavaria, Cologne, and other countries in Germany, they had also reduced so much of Guelerland, as had formerly been left to Spain by the treaty of Münster; and likewise Limburg, Brabant, Mechlin, Flanders; and two thirds of Hainault, with their strong holds, the conquest of which was thought almost impracticable. By the taking of Bouchain, and the progress of the Confederate army on the Scarpe and the Lys, they were become masters of two rivers, which, by the means of the Duile, and its Canal, had been serviceable to the French for many years in their continual invasions of the Spanish Netherlands, of which they were now altogether deprived. All these important conquests the Allies had made during the course of this war under the conduct of the Duke of Marlborough, who having given the necessary orders for securing the navigation of the Scarpe to Doway, and covering the workmen employed in fortifying several posts on that river, and on the Scheld, left the army on the 27th of October, and, after some stay at the Hague, landed in England, on the 17th of November, O. S.

As the affair of Spain had been so much preferred from the throne, and so much insisted on all the last Session of Parliament, and as the Commons had given 1,500,000 l. for that service, (a sum far beyond all that had been granted in any preceding session) it was expected matters would have been carried there in another manner than formerly. The Duke of Argyle having been recalled from the service in Flanders (where he

After the surrender at Brihuega, there were, as hath been related, but three English regiments left, Lepel's dragoons, with Richards's and Du Bourgoy's regiment of foot, and these had almost been destroyed at the battle of Villa Viciosa. However, they were in great measure compleated again by the dragoons and foot that made their escape from their confinement. But there was no money to subsist them; and if the Catalans, in whose towns they were quartered, had not been so humane as they were, they must have been starved. There had been no remittances from England in above six months, till the beginning of February, when the Pay-master received bills for thirty-two thousand pounds only, though the establishment in Spain amounted yearly to one million one hundred thousand pounds and upwards. As this small sum bore no proportion to what subsistence was due, so it did not suffice to give any relief to those who were in want, and therefore they must have perished, had it not been for the good nature of the people of Catalonia.

During the winter, General Stanhope had been endeavouring to get an exchange of prisoners; but the Court of Madrid was so averse to it, and so unwilling the English should obtain their liberty while the war continued, that, instead of agreeing to it, Stanhope was removed from the City of Valladolid to a poor fisher-town in Asturia, and afterwards to Pan, the Capital of Bearn, in France, where he continued till all the prisoners on both sides were released.

Sir John Norris came with the fleet at the beginning of March from Port-Mabon to Barcelona, and a great Council of war was held at the palace, in King Charles's presence, about the situation of affairs, and the operations of the next campaign. Soon after, Major-General Webbham arrived at Barcelona, and superseded Lepel in the command of the forces. He was followed by a few regiments of foot from Ireland, and two from Gibraltar, that were re-implaced by some that came from that Kingdom.

The Duke of Argyle was expected with great impatience, by whose presence it was hoped (says our Author*) all our wants, which were very great, would be supplied: For no money had been returned, except the inconsiderable sum before-mentioned. Some bills indeed were drawn by a Banker of London upon our English Merchants, but these were protested. The Duke of Argyle (who, in his way to Spain, came, the 4th of April, to the Hague, and went on his journey without visiting the Duke of Marlborough) staid some time at Genoa, expecting the remittances he was promised before he left England, but none came, which made him very uneasy. However, he came away with two men of war, and landed at Barcelona the 29th of May, and had his first audience of King Charles as Ambassador and Plenipotentiary the next day. The Duke employed all his time in putting the British troops into the best condition he could; but still no remittances came. The enemy had marched out of their quarters some time before; and were advancing towards the Urgel; so it was thought high time for our army to be in motion, to oppose their progress. As no money came, the Duke was obliged to borrow ten thousand pounds on his own credit, which was but of little service.

Vendosme's army was in so ill a condition, that Staremberg, if he had been supported, promised himself great advantages. He marched towards the enemy with the Spanish and the Germans, and the Duke of Argyle with the English. The considerable pass of Prato del Rey was the scene of action this campaign; it was regularly and warmly attacked by the Duke of Vendosme, and as vigorously defended by our Generals. At last, the enemy was obliged to retire, and leave us in possession of the pass. The Duke of Argyle was soon after seized with a violent fever, and obliged to return to Barcelona, where it was a long time before he was perfectly recovered. In the beginning of June, Sir John Jennings, with a fleet, arrived before Barcelona, and superseded Sir John Norris, who sailed back to England.

The Duke of Vendosme ordered the castles of Venasque, Arens, and Cardona to be invested, but without success. The siege of Cardona was obstinately persisted in. This castle stands upon a high hill near the mountains. The garrison being soon reduced to great extremities, Staremberg ordered a convoy of provisions to be got ready, and five hundred grenadiers, supported by some regiments, to see it safe into the castle. The command of the grenadiers fell upon Colonel Edward Stanhope, who attacked part of a French Brigade that was posted in the way to the gate of the castle, and, having routed them, saw all the provisions delivered into the place. After which, the Colonel drew his grenadiers upon a rising ground on the side of the castle, to refresh them, and going too near the eminence, under which the enemy had retired, a soldier shot him through the body, of which wound he soon after died (1). By the help of this convoy, the garrison held out till the end of December, when Staremberg sent some bodies to raise the siege, who succeeded so well in their attempt, that they killed two thousand of the Besiegers, and forced their camp; so that they not only raised the siege, but made themselves masters of the enemy's artillery, ammunition, and baggage: and the Duke of Vendosme's army was so diminished, that, if Staremberg had received the assistance, which he expected from England, he would have penetrated far into Spain. But nothing was done, after all the zeal expressed by the Parliament and Ministry, for retrieving matters on that side. The Duke of Argyle wrote over heavy complaints that he was not supported, by the failing of the remittances he had expected.

The election of King Charles to be Emperor. Burnet.

The Emperor's death, as it immediately opened to King Charles the Succession to the hereditary Dominions, so a disposition appeared unanimously, among all the Electors, to chuse him Emperor. However, he staid in Barcelona till September, and then leaving his Queen there, to support his affairs in Spain, he sailed over to Italy. He staid some weeks at Milan, where the Duke of Savoy came to him; and it was said, that all matters in debate were adjusted between them. It was hoped, this campaign would have produced something in those parts advantageous to the common cause, upon the agreement made before the Emperor Joseph's death, who, a few days before he was taken ill, granted to the Duke of Savoy the possession of the fiefs in Montserrat. And Mr St John, when he moved in the House of Commons for the Subsidies to the Duke of Savoy, said, all our hopes of success this year lay in that quarter, for in Flanders we could do nothing. The Duke indeed took the field, forced his way into Savoy, and penetrated as far as the Rhine; but, upon what views it was not then known, he stopped his course, and, after a short campaign, repassed the mountains.

The election of the Emperor came on at Frankfurt, where some electors came in person, others sent their Deputies; some weeks were spent in preparing the capitulations; great applications were made to them, to receive Deputies from the Electors of Bavaria and Cologne; but they were rejected, for they were under the Ban of the Empire; nor were they pleased with the interposition of the Pope's Nuncio, who gave them much trouble in that matter; but they persisted in refusing to admit them. Frankfurt lay so near the frontier of the Empire, that it was apprehended, the French might have made an attempt that way; for they drew some detachments from their army in Flanders, to increase their forces on the Rhine, as has been related. This it was that obliged the Court of Vienna to send orders to Prince Eugene to march with a detachment from Flanders towards the Rhine. He came in good time to secure the electors at Frankfurt; who being now safe, from the fear of any insult, went on slowly in all that they thought fit to propose, previous to an election; and concluded unanimously to chuse Charles, who was now declared Emperor by the name of Charles the Sixth: He went from Milan to Inspruck, and from thence to Frankfurt, where he was crowned with the usual solemnity. Thus that matter was happily ended, and no action happened on the Rhine all this campaign.

The endeavours used to adjust the disputes about the Succession of the late King William were rendered unsuccessful by a fatal accident. An accommodation was attempted in the beginning of the spring, and the King of Prussia repairing to the Hague soon after, to press the conclusion of that affair, the Prince of Nassau-Frieseland, the other party, was earnestly desired by him to come thither also. The Prince complied, though not without some reluctance to leave the Confederate army in the middle of the campaign. But, upon the 14th of June, N. S. being come to Moerdike in his way to the Hague, and being obliged to ferry over the Ames, by reason of the fatigue of his journey, and the rain, which fell in great abundance, he chose to continue in his coach with Mr Hilken, his Master of Horse, and Colonel of his Guards. A sudden tempestuous wind arose, with which, and the disturbance of the water occasioned by it, the horses were so frightened, that they immediately leaped overboard, and dragged the coach into the Ames; so that the Prince and his Companion were soon drowned, notwithstanding all the endeavours of one of his servants, who lost his life in attempting to save his Master's. The death of this Prince, who was eminent for his bravery, and great qualities, was universally lamented by the States, and the Inhabitants of the United-Provinces, and, particularly, by the army, who had been eye-witnesses of his conduct and resolution in the memorable sieges of Lisle, Douay, and Mons, the battle of Oudenarde, and chiefly in that of Blaregnies.

The war between the Turks and the Czar came to a quick end. The Czar advanced with his army so far into Moldavia, that he was cut off from his provisions. An engagement followed, in which both sides pretended they had the advantage. It is certain, the Czar found he was reduced to great extremities, for he proposed, in order to a peace, to surrender Azoph, with some other places, and demanded, that the King of Sweden might be sent home to his own country. The Grand Vizier was glad to obtain so speedy a conclusion of the war; and, notwithstanding the great opposition made by the King of Sweden, he concluded a peace with the Muscovites, not without suspicion of his being corrupted by money. The King of Sweden, being highly offended at this, charged the Grand Vizier with neglecting the great advantages he had over the Czar, since he and his whole army were at mercy; and he prevailed so far at the Porte, that upon it the Grand Vizier was deposed, and there was an appearance of a war ready to break out the next year; for the Czar delayed the rendering Azoph, and the other places agreed to be delivered up; pretending, that the King of Sweden was not sent home, according to agreement; yet, to prevent a new war, all the places were at length given up.

Towards the end of this year the Danes and Saxons broke in by concert upon Pomerania, resolving to besiege Stralsund; but every thing necessary for a siege came so slowly from Denmark, that no progress was made, though the troops lay near the place for some months; and in that time the Swedes landed a considerable body of men in the isle of Rugen. At last the Besiegers, being in want of every thing, were forced to raise the siege, and to retire from that neighbourhood in the beginning of January. They fate down next before Wismar; but that attempt likewise miscarried, which rendered the conduct of the King of Denmark very contemptible, who thus obstinately carried on a war, at a time, that the plague swept away a third part of the people of Copenhagen, with as little conduct as success.

No action happened at sea this year, for the French fitted out no fleet. All they did this French summer was the sending a Squadron of fourteen or fifteen men of war under the command of Du Guay Trouin in America, where they already had another squadron, commanded by Du Casse.

expedition to Brazil.

1711. Du Guay's expedition was for some time kept secret; but, at last it was known, that, having entered the Bay of Rio de Janeiro in Brazil, he obliged the Portuguese to run ashore, and set on fire their men of war in that Port; after which he made himself master of the town of St Sebastian; and, having kept possession of it two months, sailed from thence the 13th of November, carrying away six hundred ten thousand Crusadoes, besides a great quantity of sugar, and other rich plunder, which they valued at seven millions of livres, and pretended, that the whole loss sustained by the Portuguese amounted to five and twenty millions. On the other hand, the French made this year some unsuccessful attempts on the Leeward Islands; and, about the same time, Commodore Littleton took a Spanish Galleon, and another ship of twenty-six guns, richly laden, in the West Indies.

The Canada expedition. Hist. of Europe.

An expedition was designed by sea for taking Quebec and Placentia in North America. This design was formed by Colonel Nicholson, who had taken possession of Newa Scotia, put a garrison into Port Royal, and called it Annapolis. The four Indian Chiefs, whom the Colonel had brought over with him in the spring of the year 1710, had also promoted it by representing the dangers our settlements on the Continent of America were threatened with from that quarter. Indeed, the driving the French out of those parts would have driven them also out of the Newfoundland trade entirely, and been a very great security to New-England and New-York. To execute this design, troops were sent for from Flanders, and, with others in England, put on board transports under the command of Brigadier Hill, brother to Mrs Malsbam, the new favourite, consisting of about five thousand men (1). A strong squadron of men of war under Sir Hovenden Walker was ordered to convoy the transport fleet (2). They all sailed from Plymouth the 4th of May, and arrived at Boston in New-England the fourth of June. General Hill and Admiral Walker going ashore, a Council of war was held, in which it was resolved to land the troops, the provisions which they expected to be furnished with at Boston not being in any readiness. The fleet upon their arrival here consisted of twelve men of war, forty transport ships, and six store-ships, with all manner of warlike stores, and a fine train of artillery, with forty horses for the use of the same, commanded by Colonel King, with proper officers. On the 20th of July, the British forces returned on board their respective ships, and were joined by two regiments of New-England and New-York, commanded by Colonel Veitch and Colonel Walton. On the 30th of July, the fleet sailed for the river of Canada, and Colonel Nicholson set out from Boston for New-York, from whence he proceeded to Albany, where the forces of New-York, Connecticut, and New-Jersey, about one thousand Palatines, and about one thousand Indians of the five nations, under the Cassiques, who had been in England, rendezvoused to the number of about four thousand men, commanded by Colonel Ingoldsbey,

Colonel Schuyler, and Colonel Whiting, who marched towards Canada the 28th of August. The fleet arrived at the mouth of the river Canada, on the 14th of the same month, and on the 18th (says Sir Hovenden Walker *) the wind blowing fresh at North-West, we put into Gaipe Bay, where we staid till the 20th, being afraid of losing company with the transports, that might be blown to the leeward; but, having got all of them together, we proceeded up part of the river of Canada, which is an hundred and thirty leagues long to Quebec, from the mouth of it. On the 21st it proved foggy, and continued so all night, and the day following, with little wind till the afternoon, when, in an extreme thick fog, it began to blow hard at East and East-South-East. We found ourselves then in a dangerous circumstance, having neither soundings, nor sight of land, to steer any course, or any anchorage within sixty leagues, and that not safe: So that the Pilots on board this ship, being the best in the fleet, were of opinion, that the Admiral should make a signal to bring to; which he did with our heads to the Southward, judging, by that, we might escape danger, and be driven by the stream in the mid-channel: But quite contrary, as we were with the wind Easterly, and our heads to the Southward, in two hours we found ourselves upon the North-shore among rocks and islands, where the whole fleet had like to have been lost. The men of war escaped, though with extremity hazard; but eight transports were cast away, with about eight hundred men, officers, soldiers, and seamen; and, had not the Admiral made the signal, as he did, it is very likely, that our loss would have been much greater. After this disaster, we continued thereabouts two or three days, seeing what men and other things we could get from the shore: After which it was determined by a consultation of sea-officers, to return back to some bay or harbour, where the fleet might safely ride till a further resolution should be taken. Accordingly, on the 14th of September, we arrived in the Spanish river Bay, and the General and Admiral called a Council of war of land and sea-officers, who considering we had but ten weeks provision for the fleet and army, and that the navigation in these parts of the world being so bad and dangerous, that, at this time of the year, we could not depend upon a supply of provisions from New-England, it was unanimously agreed to return home, without making further attempts elsewhere.

This account of the expedition to Canada was brought to England by Colonel Clayton, who arrived not many days before Sir Hovenden Walker, who came to Portsmouth with the fleet, and the remainder of the transports, the 9th of October. Six days after, the Edgar of seventy guns was blown up, with above four hundred men, besides a great many persons who were come on board to see their friends.

The ill success of this expedition was a great mortification to the new Ministry, it being their first undertaking, ill projected, and worse executed.

cuted in every step. It was the more liable to censure, because, at the very time, that the old Ministry were charged with entering on designs, which had not been laid before the Parliament, and for which no Supplies had been given, they projected this, even while a Session was yet going on, without communicating it to the Parliament; whereas what the former Ministry had done, this way, was upon emergencies, and successes after the end of the Session. Besides, the Parliament had just then declared it to be their sense, That to enlarge the service, or increase the charge beyond the bounds prescribed, and the Supplies granted, was illegal, and an invasion of their rights. The new Ministry did another thing to keep the design secret, which was to victual the fleet greatly short of what was necessary, leaving them to take in a fresh supply in New-England, which they would not beforehand give direction for (though the event shewed it was very necessary) for fear that also should occasion a discovery. This, in some measure, preserved the secrecy, but destroyed the design; for, though they had a very fortunate passage to New-England, much better than the fleet could ordinarily expect, yet they were so long detained there, that the proper season, it was said, was over, before any considerable quantity of provisions could be procured; and the whole was so short of what they wanted, that, when they failed in the design against Quebec, they were not able to succeed in the under-plot against Placentia, in which otherwise they apprehended no difficulty (1).

The Duke of Ormond held a Session of Parliament this summer at Dublin, where he was received with great acclamations. It is observable, that, during the Session, the Duke, Chancellor Phipps, and the majority of the Peers, did, on all occasions, visibly favour and countenance the High-Party, if not the friends to the Pretender, whilst the Commons strenuously asserted the Revolution-Principles, and shewed their firm adherence to the Protestant Succession. Of this there were several instances*, but none more remarkable than the dispute between the two Houses, relating to the application of the Commons in 1709 to the Queen, for five thousand pounds to build a library for Trinity-College (2). After the Session was over, Chancellor Phipps (who

(1) To all this may be added a gross imposition upon the public, in the fitting out of this expedition, which the Lord-Treasurer Harley himself owns, in his brief account of public affairs, laid before her Majesty in June 1714, where he observes as follows: 'On the 4th of June 1711, three days after the Treasurer was sworn, he was surprized with a demand of twenty-eight thousand thirty-six pounds and five shillings for arms and merchandize, said to be sent to Canada. When the Treasurer scrupled this, Mr Secretary St John and Mr Moore came to him with much passion upon this affair; and, about a fortnight after, the Secretary of State signed the Queen's positive pleasure to have that money paid; and, accordingly, her Majesty signed a warrant, June 21, and the Treasurer not being able then, with all his precaution, to discover further light, the money was paid July the 4th, 1711. Since the return from that expedition, the secret is discovered, and the Treasurer's suspicion justified; for the public was cheated of above twenty thousand pounds. There is reason to be more particular upon his head, because it is one of the things never to be forgiven the Treasurer; and Lord-Chancellor Harcourt told him more to that purpose, that no Government was worth serving, that would not let them make those advantages, and get such jobs. The Treasurer was forced to use all his skill and credit to keep the House of Commons from examining this affair last Parliament.

(2) This application was made by the Commons, 'because (as they said) the College had censured Forbes for aspersing the memory of King William, and for their steady adherence to the late Revolution, and for the encouragement of good Literature, and sound Revolution-Principles.' The Duke of Ormond, in his speech, having taken notice that the Queen had complied with this application, the Lords, in their address to the Queen among other things, said, 'Your Majesty has also extended your royal favour to the College of Dublin, and at such a juncture, as must testify to the world, that what your Majesty bestowed was not given to promote those principles upon which it was at first applied for.' The Commons incensed at these words came to the following resolutions: 'That the Lords, in this address, have highly infringed the rights, privileges, and liberties of the Commons, misrepresented her Majesty's gracious condescension to their humble application, and have unjustly insinuated (to the dishonour of this House) that the principles, for encouragement of which the application was made, were such, as her Majesty disapproved. That to insinuate, that the House of Commons, in their resolution, intended any other than the late happy Revolution brought about by King William III of glorious Memory, is false, scandalous, and malicious, highly and most unjustly reflecting on the loyalty, integrity, and honour of this House, and a great breach of the privileges thereof.' And, in their address to the Queen on this occasion, they inserted the following paragraphs:

'Being therefore most sensibly touched at heart, that our principles and good intentions should be thus injuriously represented, and out of a deep concern, lest the address of the Lords should have made any impression on her Majesty, to the disadvantage of her most dutiful Commons, they took this opportunity to lay before her Majesty these their humble and sincere assurances, that the principles, upon which they had applied to her Majesty for her bounty to the College of Dublin, in their address of the first of June 1709, were such, as they should never be ashamed to own, they being no other than those, to which they owed the preservation of their religion, lives, liberties, and properties, and more especially, that inestimable blessing of her Majesty's happy Reign over them. That the sound Revolution-Principles, mentioned in their address, neither had, nor can have, in the true construction of the words, any other meaning, than what related to the late happy Revolution; and that they had the utmost abhorrence and detestation of all principles, that tend to any other Revolution, or to weaken her Majesty's Parliamentary Right.'

The Commons, hearing the Lords intended to vindicate their address, voted, 'That whoever shall, by speaking, writing, or printing, arraign or condemn the principles of our late happy Revolution in 1688, is an enemy to our most gracious Queen, to our Constitution in Church and State, to the Hanover Succession, and a friend to the Pretender.' The next day, the Lords agreed on an address to the Queen, wherein they complained of the high indignities offered to them by the Commons, in these terms: 'How far the Commons have made good their professions to your Majesty of unanimity; how far they have pursued that temper recommended to them by your Majesty, we shall not determine: Yet, surely, had those professions been sincere, they would not (without any Conference demanded, or any opportunity given to us to explain ourselves, if we had been mistaken) have used us in a manner wholly unknown to former Parliaments, and in language more indecent, more opprobrious, than was given by another House of Commons, when they voted the House of Lords useless. However, your Majesty

The friends of the Pretender show themselves openly in Scotland. Hist. of Europe. Medal given by the Duchess of Gordon. Whilst the Commons of Ireland were strenuously asserting the Revolution-Principles, the opposite spirit of Jacobitism discovered itself in Scotland, encouraged very probably by the late numerous addresses in England, asserting the sole Hereditary Right. Upon this presumption, the Dukes of Gordon, a Roman Catholic, sent about the latter end of June to Mr Robert Bennet, Dean of the Faculty of Advocates, a silver medal, with a head on the right side, and this legend, Cujus est ? and on the reverse the British Islands, with this motto, Reddite †, as a present to the Faculty. This medal was first left in the hands of one of their servants, the Dean being cautious either to accept it, or place it in the Repository of Rarities, before he had consulted some of the members of the Faculty, to whom he showed the medal, formally telling them, That her Grace the Duchess of Gordon sent, as a present to them, the medal of King James the Eighth, whom they and the English called the Pretender; and he hoped, Thanks were to be returned to her Grace. Mr Alexander Stevenson answered, That the medal should be returned to her Grace, for the receiving it was throwing dirt on the face of the Government. He was seconded by Mr Robert Alexander of Black-House, who said, That the receiving of such a medal was owing a right contrary to her Majesty's. Mr Robert Frazer answered, 'That Oliver Cromwell's medal, who deserved to be hanged, and the arms of the Commonwealth of England, had been received; and why not this?' Upon this Mr Duncan Forbes, said, It was time enough to receive the medal, when the Pretender was hanged: To whom adhered Mr Joseph Hume, of Ninchale; Mr Hugh Dalrymple, son to the President; Mr James Ferguson, son to Sir John Ferguson of Kirkcubright; and Sir James Stuart of Goodtrees, the Queen's Solicitor. Then Mr Dundas of Arncliffe rose up, and made the following speech:

"Whatever these gentlemen may say of their loyalty, I think they affront the Queen, whom they pretend to honour, in disgracing her Brother, who is not only a Prince of the blood, but the first thereof; and, if blood can give any right, he is our undoubted Sovereign. I think too they call her Majesty's title in question, which is not our business to determine. Medals are the documents of history, to which all historians refer; and therefore, though I should give King William's stamp, with the Devil at his right ear, I see not how it could be refused, seeing an hundred years hence it would prove, that such a coin had been in England. But, Dean of Faculty, what needs further speeches? None oppose the receiving the medal, and returning thanks to her Grace, but a few pitiful scoundrel vermin, and musbrooms, not worthy our notice. Let us therefore proceed to name some of our number, to return our hearty thanks to the Duchess of Gordon." The Dean of the Faculty put it to the vote, and it was carried by a majority of sixty-three voices against twelve (there being seventy-five members present) that thanks should be returned to her Grace by Mr Dundas and Mr Horne of Westball. Dundas asking, In what terms he should return thanks? The Dean, in the name of the whole society, answered, That they would approve whatsoever Mr Dundas and Mr Horne thought convenient. Three days after Dundas returned her 'the most hearty thanks of the Faculty for all her favours, particularly in presenting them with a medal of their Sovereign Lord the King; hoping, and being confident, that her Grace would very soon have an opportunity to compliment the Faculty with a second medal, struck upon the Restoration of the King, and Royal Family, and the finishing Rebellion, usurping Tyranny, and Whiggery.' It was observed on this occasion, that the medal was not new; for the public had an account of its being dispersed in the Netherlands about a year before; and it was then the general opinion, that it was struck upon the hopes given by the Jacobites in England to their correspondents in

Majesty might justly approve the conduct of the College of Dublin in the late Revolution, we did, and do still humbly conceive, that your Majesty did not extend your bounty to them, to promote (in general) Revolution-Principles, principles, which, as explained by the pamphlets and libels publicly avowed by men of factious and seditious tempers, and particularly, by a sermon preached on the 30th of January, dedicated to this very House of Commons, without censure or animadversion, do, in a great measure, maintain and justify the execrable murder of King Charles I, your Royal Grandfather of blessed memory, and on which may be founded any rebellion against your Majesty or your Successors. Nor have the Commons, in our apprehension, vindicated themselves or their vote, by saying, That the sound Revolution-Principles, mentioned in their address, neither bad, nor can have, in the true construction of the words, any other meaning than what related to the late happy Revolution. For, however they may take upon themselves best to know their own meaning, yet we think it hard to deny us the right of judging, as well as they, of the true construction of the words; and we do take the liberty to say, That, the Commons having, in that vote, maintained the steady adherence of the Provost and Fellows of the College to the late Revolution, as one consideration of their application for the five thousand pounds since granted by your Majesty, the subsequent motive mentioned in that vote, viz. for the encouragement of sound Revolution-Principles, cannot, in good reason or grammar, be referred to the late Revolution, since adherence to the late Revolution was a distinct motive of itself; and it is the known nature of principles, to be as well the rule and guide of future as of past actions.

Moreover, the House of Lords, at the solicitation of the Bishops, did, the same day, agree to a representation and address against the Dissenters, wherein they suggested, 'That they had been enabled to propagate their Schism, and undermine the Church, by the misapplying her Majesty's bounty to them of twelve hundred pounds a year: And, therefore, they submitted it to her, whether she would put a stop to these growing evils, by withdrawing that bounty from them.' But the Queen did not think fit to do so.

1711. in France, that the British Nation was ready to declare for the Pretender; to which the distractions occasioned by Dr Sacheverell's sermon, and trial, and the asserting the Doctrines of Hereditary Right, and of absolute Passive Obedience, entirely opposite both to the late Revolution, and Protestant Succession, gave some air of probability. Nor was this medal scarce, but rather common; and, as for its intrinsic value, it did not exceed half a Crown; so that it could not be worth either the Dukes's while to present it, or the Faculty's to receive it, on the account of its being either new, or scarce, or valuable. And, if the Advocates designed it only as a curiosity, they might have easily procured it, and placed it among their collection, without formality and noise. But the Dukes's presenting it, and some of the Advocates receiving it with solemnity, and endeavouring to make it the act of the Faculty, by returning thanks to the Dukes in the name of the whole society, with so much ostentation, was certainly a publick and treasonable affront to her Majesty, a tacit arraignment of her title, and a striking at the settlement in the House of Hanover. Nor is it to be doubted, that the design of the Jacobites was to give reputation to their cause, by engaging so many Gentlemen of the Long-Robe to espouse it, as the readiest way to bring the common people into their measures; for, as these are generally led by example, they would be apt to conclude, that there could be no danger in following the pattern set them by those, who, of all men, ought best to understand the laws and constitution of their country. The timing of this transaction was likewise judged very remarkable; for it was soon after the assembly of the Kirk of Scotland had publicly declared themselves for the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover; and their sense being justly taken for that of the bulk of the Protestants in Scotland, whom they represent in an ecclesiastical capacity, it seemed, the Jacobite party there thought it necessary to balance them by the sense of the Ministers of law and justice in that country. This happened also immediately after her Majesty had declared in her speech at the close of the last Session of Parliament, "That it was needless for her to repeat the assurances of her earnest concern for the Succession of the House of Hanover." From whence it may be concluded, that, the Jacobites being sensible of the injury this declaration had done their cause, they might think, that the only way to retrieve it was by procuring for many Lawyers to declare for them. And, in the last place, this was done at a time, when the armies were in the field, and the Pretender reported to be gone from St Germain's, in order to embark in some port of France on the ocean; which might raise a well-grounded suspicion, that this was designed to favour a second invasion; the rather, because Dundas, in his compliment to the Dukes of Gordon, did not scruple to insinuate a speedy Restoration of the King, and the Royal Family.

Sir David Dalrymple, the Lord Advocate, gave The Faculty's account of this proceeding to the Duke of Queensberry, who dying about this time, the information was laid before the Queen by one of the other Secretaries; and the case was so flagrant, that there was no avoiding to send the Lord Advocate orders to enquire into it. Upon which the Faculty thought fit to disown Dundas, Horne, and the other Advocate, in their address concerning the medal, as done by a party at an occasional meeting, and not by general consent, declaring by a solemn act their affection to the Queen and her Government, and the Protestant Succession, and their detestation of all practices tending to give any encouragement to the Pretender.

It was for some time matter of doubt, whether the Government would be satisfied with this act of the Faculty. But the Court thought fit to make no further Inquiry into that affair. This lenity imboldened Dundas to write a vindication more treasonable, if possible, than their proceedings about the medal: But, before the publication, the Printer carried the copy of it to the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, who communicated it to Sir James Stuart, and he took care, that the Queen and Council should be informed of it: Upon which the paper was intirely suppressed. And Monsieur de Kreyenberg, Resident from the Elector of Hanover, having, by express orders, presented a memorial, for the prosecution of Dundas and his associates: The Government thought proper to remove Sir David Dalrymple from his office of Lord Advocate, on pretence he had been too remiss in prosecuting the Scots Medallists, and reappointed Sir James Stuart in that post, on account of his zeal in suppressing of Dundas's vindication. Though this gave some satisfaction to the friends of the Protestant Succession, yet it is observable, that Sir David Dalrymple was so far from being an enemy to it, that (as his particular acquaintance affirmed) he would have prosecuted the Medallists with greater severity than any whatever, had he not received secret instructions from a great man at Court not to stir in the affair (1).

(1) Nor were the Jacobites less busy in England; for, while these things passed in Scotland, they were very industrious in dispersing clandestinely a printed paper, intitled, An oath to an Invader, and abjuring the Invader, dissected and examined; containing eleven queries, levelled against the Revolution and the oath of Abjuration, now administered in Great-Britain, which was printed at the end of that paper. About that time, likewise, a news-paper took notice of a paragraph inserted in a written postscript to the Post-Boy, of the 5th of July 1711, sent to Dick's Coffee-house in Dublin, and (as may well be supposed) to many other places, which was as follows: "We are informed, that Mr White, alias Lesley, is gone to Switzerland, in order, if he can, to convert a certain young Gentleman, and bring him over from Popery to Protestantism. If he succeed, it is hoped,

"that there will be no experiment tried hereafter to run the hazard of making use of a Come-over: For those sort of Gentlemen ought no more to be trusted, than a staunch Whig should, although he swears, that he shall be for the Church and Monarchy; except those, who have been sensible of their errors, and, since their conversion, have merited the esteem of all honest men." This paragraph was founded upon a report, that the Pretender was, about that time, preparing to go for Switzerland; but he only went to the French army in Dauphine, and having staid there a few days, and conferred with the Duke of Berwick and the other Generals, he took a journey through Provence, Languedoc, and Guienne, the three finest Provinces of France, and so returned to his residence at St Germain's.

1711. All this while the Ministers in England used Titles and all possible means to strengthen themselves, and weaken their enemies, by advancing to honours and employments, such persons as they thought inclined to carry on their new measures. The Lord Raby was created Viscount and Earl of Stratford. He was the surviving head of the family of Wentworth-Woodhouse, in Yorkshire, but by a dispute between his Father, and the late Earl of Stratford, cut off from the estate. He was recalled from his long Embassy in Prussia, and sent Ambassador to Holland. The Lord Dartmouth was made Viscount Lewisbam, and Earl of Dartmouth; the Lord Ferrers, Earl Ferrers; Sir Simon Harcourt, Baron of Stanton-Harcourt; the Earl of Orrey, Baron Boyle of Marston; the Duke of Hamilton, Duke of Brandon, but, a caveat being entered against that patent, a stop was put to it for the present.

The Earl of Winchelsea was placed at the head of the Board of Trade; Earl Paulet was made Steward of the Household, in the room of the Duke of Buckingham, who was made President of the Council upon the death of the Earl of Rochester. Sir George Byng was declared Admiral of the White. Alderman Cass, was elected one of the Sheriffs of London, who, in the time of the Assassination-Plot, harboured Sir John Freind, in his house, where he was apprehended. The Lord Clermont, and his brother, Captain Middleton, sons to the Earl of Middleton, who were taken aboard the Salisbury, in the intended Invasion of Scotland, were admitted to bail after three years imprisonment.

In July the Duke of Newcastle died, whose death is said to be occasioned by a fall from his horse as he was hunting. He was the richest subject that had been in England for some ages, and had an estate of above forty thousand pounds a year, which he was much set upon increasing. The Office of Privy-Seal being vacant by his death, it was resolved, to give it to the Earl of Jersey. As this Earl had some correspondence in Paris and St Germain's, the conduct of the private Negotiation of peace was trusted to him, by the Lord-Treasurer Harley, who therefore made him Privy-Seal, but the Earl died suddenly the very day that office was given him. Upon his decease it was conferred on Dr Robinson, Bishop of Bristol, who was designed to be the Plenipotentiary in the Treaty that was now projecting. There having been a warm competition between the Duke of Hamilton and the Earl of Mar for the place of Secretary of State for Norib-Britain, vacant by the death of the Duke of Queenberry, it was thought fit to suppress that place.

In the mean time those at the helm carried on the Negotiation of peace, which they had clandestinely entered into with some agents of France, even before the old Ministers were removed. To this purpose Mr St John, and, as some affirmed, Mr Harley himself, had several private meetings with the Sieur Gaultier, an obscure French Priest, who, for some time, was protected by Count Gallas, the Imperial Minister, and suffered to say mass in his chapel, and who being afterwards employed in London by Count Tallard, to receive and forward his letters between Paris and Nottingham, began to be taken notice of, and assumed the title of Abbot. It was the opinion of many, that, when the Lord-Treasurer Harley formed the South-Sea project, he had verbal assurances given him, that France and Spain would grant to that Company, either some settlement, or, at least, a free trade in the Spanish West-Indies, provided a peace was concluded, by which King Philip should remain in possession of the Monarchy of Spain. These assurances were sufficient to engage the Treasurer, who saw the load, that the carrying on the war must bring upon him, and therefore he resolved to strike up a peace as soon as possible.

On the other hand, the emissaries of France gave out every where, that a secret Negotiation of peace was on foot: And the French Court was not wanting to cherish and improve the eager dispositions towards a peace, which they found in the new British Ministers. Accordingly Torcy transmitted into England some propositions, signed by himself, April 22d. N. S. with a remarkable preamble, importing, 'That, as it was not doubted but the (French) King was in a condition to maintain the war with glory, so it would not be esteemed a sign of weakness, that his Majesty broke the silence he had kept since the separation of the Conferences at Gertruydenberg; and that, before the opening of the campaign, he gave still new proofs of the desire, that he had always preserved, to procure the re-establishment of the repose of Europe. But that, after the experience he had made of the sentiments of those, who now governed the Republick of Holland, and of their endeavours to render the Negotiations fruitless, he was willing to address to the English nation the propositions he thought fit to make to end the war; and that, with this view, the King offered to treat of peace on the basis of the following conditions: 1. That the English should have real securities to exercise their commerce in Spain, to the Indies, and in the ports of the Mediterranean. 2. That a Barrier should be formed in the Low-Countries for the security of the Republick of Holland, and to the good liking of the Dutch. 3. That reasonable means should be sought out to satisfy the Allies of England and Holland. 4. That as the good estate of the affairs of the King of Spain furnished new expedients to end the differences touching that Monarchy, endeavours should be used to surmount the difficulties raised on this occasion. 5. That the Conferences to treat of peace should be immediately opened; and that the King's Plenipotentiaries should either treat with those of England and Holland alone, or jointly with those of their Allies, at the choice of England. 6. And that his Majesty proposed, the Cities of Apr. 27. Aix la Chapelle and Liege for the place of Treaty, O. S. referring it to England to chuse one of those two Cities.' These propositions Mr Secretary St John transmitted to the Lord Raby, the Queen's Ambassador at the Hague, with orders to communicate them to the Pensionary, and to assure that Minister, 'that the Queen was resolved in making peace, as in making war, to act in perfect concert with the States; and desired, that the secret might be kept among as few as possible. He confessed, that the terms of the several propositions were very general; that there was an air of complaisance shewn to England, and the contrary to Holland, which might be of ill consequence, but could be of none, as long as the Queen and States took care to understand each other, and to act with as little reserve as became two powers so nearly allied in interest; and he

1711. he desired the Pensionary to be assured, that this rule should on the part of England be inviolably observed.' In answer to these orders, the Lord Raby, acquainted Mr St John, 'That the Pensionary had, with those of the States, who had been formerly employed in the Negotiations of peace, considered Torcy's propositions, and the obliging manner, in which her Majesty was pleased to communicate them: That they thanked her Majesty for her confidence in them; and assured her, that their's was reciprocal, and that, as her Majesty had promised, she would make no step towards a peace, but in concert with them, they desired she might be assured of the same on their part, and that they would make no step in that, or any other kind of Negotiation, which regarded the mutual interest of both nations, but in communication and concert with her Majesty. That they urged the necessity of an intire confidence one with the other at this critical juncture; and declared themselves weary of the war, which they endeavoured to conceal from the enemy, lest he should make his advantage by it; and that they were ready to join in any measures, which her Majesty should think proper, to obtain a good peace: But that they looked upon these propositions as yet in the same manner as the Secretary did, to be very dark and general, and designed to create jealousies between her Majesty, that Republick, and the Allies: But they depended upon her Majesty's justice and prudence, to prevent any such ill effect; and hoped she would make the French explain more particularly the several points contained in them.' But, notwithstanding these mutual assurances, there was not the least communication to the States of the Negotiations, which were carrying on for above five months together, betwixt England and France, till after the special Preliminaries, and the seven general ones were signed and sent to them. In the mean time the Lord Raby, not being as yet let into the secret, freely declared in a letter, 'That he thought it advisable and necessary to go open with the States in this matter of the propositions; and in another, acquainted the Secretary, that all the letters from France agreed, that all the hopes the French had, was to sow jealousies among the Allies.' And in a third repeats his advice, 'That we must act cautiously with the States, that they might have no reason to accuse us for taking the least measures without them.' But it was not long before Mr St John prepared him to have other sentiments of the manner of carrying on this Negotiation, and in a letter acquainted him, 'That it was her Majesty's pleasure, he should make all possible haste to come over, since her service might better dispense with his absence, at this point of time, than it would perhaps do at another; and since they must now expect to have very soon upon the tapis many intrigues, concerning which the Queen thought it expedient, that he should confer with the Ministers in England; her Majesty designed, upon his arrival, to give him the promotion in Peerage, which he had desired.' The Secretary then frankly told him, 'That Great-Britain had gone so much too far in weaving her interest into that of the continent, that it would prove no easy task to disentangle our affairs, without tearing or rending.' The Lord Raby took the hint, and assured Mr St John, that he would venture any thing, and undertake any thing to serve the Queen: That the Secretary might venture boldly to trust him with the real intentions, and be assured, that he would not make further use of them, than according to his instructions. He told the Secretary likewise, that if the thing was actually gone no further than it appeared, and France had not yet explained; and he had a mind, that he should come over for the Queen's service, he was ready to come in a yacht, frigate, packet-boat, or any way; and concluded, in short, that the Secretary might dispose of him as he pleased, for all his desire was to serve her Majesty to her satisfaction, and he should never grudge any danger and pains.' This voluntary and frank declaration, he desired in a particular manner, might, with his humble compliments, be communicated to the Duke of Shrovesbury and Mr Harley.

All transactions betwixt England and France during this time, except two or three papers, are intirely suppressed, which, in the Earl of Strafford's Instructions of October the 1st, 1711, are said to have been carried on by papers sent backward and forward, and much time spent therein. However, the English Ministers sent over privately to France one of their agents, Mr Prior; but though the subject and success of his clandestine Negotiations were for some time kept secret, yet his journey could not. For having first gone into Kent, and thence into Suffolk to give a visit to his friend Sir Thomas Hanmer, and so into France; upon his return from thence, about the beginning of August in a small vessel, that set him ashore at Deal, going under a borrowed name, and not producing his pass, he was discovered, and stopped by the Custom-House Officers, till he was released by orders from above. This adventure being noised abroad, Count Gallas, the Imperial Minister, thought it his duty to expostulate about it with the Earl of Oxford, who told him, 'That he had no reason to be alarmed, for the Queen would never make a peace derogatory from her engagements with her Allies.' On the other hand, in order to palliate the clandestine Negotiation between Great-Britain and France, which was no longer a mystery, and to feel the pulse of the Nation about a peace, the agents of the British Ministers published a pamphlet, intitled, A new journey to Paris: Together with some secret transactions between the French King and an English Gentleman (1). This account, under the fictitious name of Mr Du Baudrier, was sup-

(1) The Author of this piece acquaints his friend, 'That about two months before the French King, resolving once more to give peace to Europe, offered the Court of England, to send a Minister as far as Boulogne, who should be there met by some persons from England, to treat the overtures of a peace. That upon notice, that this was agreed to, the King dispatched a person, who went by the name of Monsieur de la Basside, to Boulogne, where he took lodgings at one Mr des Marais, a Silk-merchant, married to an English woman, who formerly waited on the Ladies of the Earls of Portland and Yersey, when Ambassadors there in the time of King William. That, on the 14th of July, N. S. a person, who was afterwards known to be

1711. posed by some to be written by Daniel De Foe, and by others ascribed to Jonathan Swift, who had for some years before attached himself to the Whig-party, but, being disappointed in his hopes of preferment, and particularly of being Chaplain to the Earl of Wharton, when he was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, went over to the Tories upon the change of the Ministry in 1710, and with Mr Prior, Dr Freind, Mr Oldisworth, and some others, was employed in writing a weekly paper, called the Examiner, in defence of the new Ministry. Mr Prior was instructed to communicate to the Court of France some private propositions dated July the 1st, importing in substance, 'That Great-Britain would make no peace, but what should be to the satisfaction of all her Allies, according to their agreements and treaties: That the trade of Holland should be restored, and the Dutch have a barrier, as well as the Emperor, and Duke of Savoy, for their security. That care should be taken to keep the balance in Italy; and that the Crowns of France and Spain should never be united. In relation to Great-Britain, that our commerce should be settled to the satisfaction of the British subjects: The Government to be acknowledged in France, as now settled in Great-Britain: Dunkirk to be demolished: The Assiento to be enjoyed by Great-Britain, after the peace, as the French had it at present: Newfoundland to be entirely given up to the English; but the trade of Hudson's Bay to be continued in the hands of the French and English; and all things in America to remain in the state they should be found in at the conclusion of the peace. That all advantages of trade, granted to the French by the Spaniards should be equally granted to the British Subjects: And, in the last place, that the secret should be inviolably kept, till allowed to be divulged by the mutual consent of both parties concerned.'

With these propositions Mr Prior went to France in the beginning of July; had a power signed by the Queen; was ordered to return immediately, if the French started any difficulties, and was particularly directed to see, if they had full powers from Spain. The French, not finding him sufficiently impowered to treat, were cautious of disclosing their thoughts to him; for, upon his arrival in France, Torcy, in a letter to Mr St John, told him, 'That he saw with great pleasure Mr Prior return, after an interval of so many years: That he could have wished, he had had greater liberty to employ those talents, which he was persuaded he would have made a good use of; but that he hoped Monsieur Mefnager would supply what he could not do.' Accordingly, Mefnager, Deputy of the Council of Commerce in France, accompanied by another Gentleman (said to be the Abbé du Bois) attended Mr Prior into England, and (being vested with full powers to treat, conclude, and sign with such Ministers, as should be authorized in due form, not by Britain only, but by any of the Princes and Estates then in war with France) he had frequent conferences with the Queen's Ministers, particularly the Lord-Treasurer, Mr St John, the Duke of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Dartmouth. At one of their meetings, which was held at Mr Prior's House, by order of the Lords of the Committee of Council, and unknown to the Queen, then at Windſor, Mefnager delivered to these four British Ministers the French King's answer to the demands last sent over by England; which, according to Mr St John's Letter to the Queen of the 20th of September, complied with every article, except the eighth, relating to North America. He added, 'They found, however, that they should be able to compound this point in the manner, which her Majesty, some time before, resolved to pass it be Mr Prior, coming directly to the door, and inquiring for Monsieur de la Bastide (the name and place having been before concerted) was immediately shewn to Monsieur —, where they were shut up for three hours without any refreshment, though Mr Prior had rid post from Calais that day, in a great deal of rain. That, the next morning, the author of this account, being recommended to Mr Prior by Monsieur des Morais, was admitted to wait on him in the capacity both of a Secretary and Valet de Chambre; after which, he learned further particulars of Mr Prior's journey to Boulogne. That it was reported, that, some time before the peace of Ryswick, King William did dispatch this very Gentleman to Paris upon the same account, for which he now came. That having received his instructions from the English Court, under pretence of taking a short journey of pleasure, and visiting Sir Thomas Hammer in the County of Suffolk, he left his house on Sunday night, the 11th of July, N. S. taking none of his servants with him. That Mr M—, who had already prepared a bark on the coast of Dever, took Mr Prior disguised in his chariot. That they lay, on Monday night, the 12th of July, at the Earl of Jersey's house in Kent; arrived early, the next day, at Dover; drove directly to the shore; and Mr Prior, having got aboard the vessel, arrived at Calais about eleven at night; was entertained that night by the Governor with great respect, and set out pretty late next morning for Boulogne, where, for four days, he had twolong conferences every day with Monsieur de la Bastide, from ten to one at noon, and from six till nine in the evening. That, on the third morning, the Writer of this account was ordered to attend early; observed Mr Prior to have a pleasant countenance; and was commanded to be ready at an hour's warning for a journey to England; but, upon the fourth evening, all this was changed. That, on the 18th, Mr Prior set out with Mr de la Bastide, in the latter's chaise, for Paris, where they arrived, Tuesday the 20th, and Mr de la Bastide conducted Mr Prior to a private lodging, in the Rue St Louis, prepared for his reception, where the author had orders to say, that the Gentleman, to whom he belonged, was called Monsieur Matthews; but afterwards, at Verſailles, he overheard, that his real name was Mr Prior. That Mr de la Bastide would have had Mr Matthews to have gone with him next morning to Verſailles, but could not prevail with him to comply. That Mr de la Bastide returned the same evening, from Verſailles, and, after an hour's warm conference, went with Mr Prior in a chariot and six horses to Verſailles, where they arrived about eleven at night, and alighted at a Vineyard adjoining to Madam de Maintenon's gardens, whereof Mr de la Bastide had the key. That the clock struck two before they came out; and then the coachman drove away to a small house at the end of the town, where Mr de la Bastide left Mr Prior with his attendant, who observed him to be very thoughtful. That, the next morning, Thursday the 22d, about ten o'clock, Mr de la Bastide came; and the house being small, and the Writer's apartment divided from Mr Prior's only by a thin wainscot, he could easily hear what they said, when they raised their voice. That, after some time, he could hear Monsieur de la Bastide say with warmth, 'Bon Dieu, &c. Good God! Were ever such de-

That the propositions to be sent to Holland, as the foundation of a General Treaty, they had likewise received from him; and that, which was thought most liable to exception, had been very much mended. That, my Lord-Treasurer having, however, proposed some further alterations, in order to make the whole more palatable abroad, and Monsieur Mefnager seemingly inclined to agree to them, the Lords of the Council were to consider of them the next morning. That, this being the present situation of the Treaty, all her servants were unanimously of opinion, that a warrant and full powers should that night be transmitted to her Majesty, in order to pass the Great-Seal the next morning: And that Mr Prior should be added to those empowered to sign; because he, having personally treated with Monsieur de Torcy, was the best witness they could produce of the sense, in which the general preliminary engagements were entered into. Besides which, as he was the best versed in matters of Trade of all her Majesty's Ministers trusted in this secret, if she thought fit to employ him in the future Treaty of Commerce, it would be of consequence, that he had been a party concerned in that Convention, which must be the rule of that Treaty. He concluded, "That the rest of the Plenipotentiaries were all those, who had the honour to sit in her Majesty's Cabinet-Council;" namely, the Earl of Oxford, the Duke of Buckingham, the Bishop of Bristol, the Duke of Shrewsbury, Earl Pawlet, the Earl of Dartmouth, and Mr Secretary St John. But, though the warrant, antedated three days, was signed by the Queen, directing the Lord-Keeper to affix the Great-Seal to an instrument thereto annexed, meaning the full powers; yet most of those, who so readily concurred in treating with the Minister of France, declined becoming parties, when the Treaty was to be concluded; and to the special Preliminaries between Great-Britain and France, signed by Mefnager, on the 27th of September, were accepted and signed only by the Earl of Dartmouth and Mr Secretary St John, by virtue of a warrant directed to them two only, and signed by the Queen. And it is observable, that neither this, nor any one paper of powers and instructions, throughout this whole affair was countersigned by any one Minister, but the Queen's name exposed to cover all, in case this clandestine Negotiation should at last prove abortive, and be afterwards inquired into: And, the English Ministry having every where extolled the great advantages that were granted to Great-Britain, France made a proper use of it, and declared, "That those articles were an eventual or conditional Treaty only; and that the French King would not be obliged to make them good, but in case of the signing of a general peace." In this sense Mefnager signed them; and by this means the Queen was brought into this dilemma, either to go on through all adventures in the measures of France, or they had it in their power, by divulging the secret, and exposing such a notorious breach of national faith, to make what advantage they thought fit among the Allies; who, from this time, must think themselves disengaged from the Queen, if they could find their own account in separate measures. The same day, that the special Preliminaries were thus accepted, another set of General Preliminary Articles on the Part of France were signed by Mefnager; as was also a separate article in favour of the Duke of Savoy, "whereby the French King promised to restore to that Prince the territories, which belonged to him at the beginning of the present war; and to consent,

"mands made of a great Monarch, unless you were at the gates of the Metropolis? For the love of God, Monsieur Prior, relax something, if your instructions will permit you, else I shall despair of any good success in our Negotiation. Is it not enough, that our King will abandon his Grandson, but he must lend his own arm to pull him out of the Throne? Why did you not open yourself to me at Boulogne? Why are you more inexorable here at Verailles? You have risen in your demands, by seeing Madam Maintenon's desire for a peace. As able as you are to continue the war, consider which is to be most preferred, the good of your Country, or the particular advantage of your General; for he will be the only gainer among your subjects." That Mr Prior spoke so softly, he could not be well understood; but, upon parting, the Writer heard him say, "If you insist still on those difficulties, my next audience will be that of leave." That, three hours after, Mr de la Basside returned with a countenance more composed, and dined with Mr Prior, who entertained him with much pleasantry; and, among other things, said, "that Monsieur, (meaning the King) if he were a private man, would be the most agreeable person in the world. Did you mind how obligingly he inquired, whether our famous Chevalier Newton was still living? He told me, my good friends, poor Despreaux, was dead since I was in France, and asked me after Queen Anne's health." Which confirmed the Relator in his opinion, that Mr Prior had an audience the night before of the King. That, about ten that evening, Mr de la Basside came to take Mr Prior to go to the same place they were at before, where they staid about two hours. That, being returned, Mr Prior appeared somewhat disaffected; and, when he came into his chamber, he threw off his hat in some passion, folded his arms, and walked up and down the room for above an hour, extremely pensive. That, on Friday, the 23d, Mr de la Basside staid the afternoon with Mr Prior, and, about eight o'clock, they went to the rendezvous; and, in an hour and a half's time, Mr Prior, with Mr de la Basside, another Gentleman and a Lady, came into the walk. That, as Mr Prior was taking his leave of those persons, the lady said, "Monsieur songez vous, &c. Consider this night on what we have said to you." And that the Gentleman seconded her, saying, "Ouy, ouy, Monsieur, songez vous en pour la dernier fois: Ay, ay, Sir, consider for the last time." To which Monsieur Matthews answered briskly in going out, "Sire, tout ou rien; Sir, all or none, as I have had the honour to tell your Majesty before." That, on Saturday the 24th, Mr de la Basside came to Mr Prior with a smiling countenance, embraced him with much joy, and told him, "Courage, Monsieur, no travelling to day; Madam Maintenon will have me once more conduct you to her." That, about ten o'clock at night, they went forth, and returned about one in the morning; and Mr Prior having taken his leave of Mr de la Basside, set out in a chaise for Calais, where he arrived on Wednesday the 28th, in the evening; and, the next morning, the writer of this account took his leave of Mr Prior, who thanked him in the civilest manner, and very nobly made him a present of fifty pistoles. And that the same day, July the 29th, N. S. Mr Prior having put to sea with a fair wind, it was supposed, in a few hours, he landed in England.

1711. consent, that there be also yielded to him such other places in Italy, as should be found agreeable to the sense of the treaties between him and his Allies.¹ From this a perfect confidence was established between the two Ministries of England and France; and, in the letters written in the month of October, a mutual sincerity was recommended and engaged for, and, that a perfect unanimity should be maintained for accomplishing the work. The Earl of Strafford's Instructions, in order to his immediate return into Holland, were now preparing, and dated October 1, O. S. and as an early proof of the confidence, which Mr St John reposed in the French Minister, he acquainted Torcy by his letter of October 2, O. S. that the Earl of Strafford was going for Holland, and said, Your Minister, (meaning Mefnager, who was then going back to France, and carried this letter) is fully informed in what the Earl of Strafford is to propose to the States. Such intelligence of the Queen's Counsels, which Mr St John confessed he had given to the Ministers of the Queen's enemies, seems very extraordinary; especially when it is considered, that the Earl of Strafford was sent over to preside the opening the general Conferences, with assurances of the greatest friendship and concern for the interests of the States on the part of the Queen, and by her authority to procure from France just satisfaction for all her Allies; and, in his instructions, was likewise directed to propose to the States a new scheme for carrying on the war, and to acquaint them with such resolutions, as the Queen had taken concerning it. In short, every article in his instructions was a specimen of the sincerity, with which the English Ministers intended to treat the Allies. He was instructed, that it must be the most careful endeavour and fixed principle of all the Confederates to hold fast together; and this immediately after a separate Treaty had been signed by Great-Britain; and, if the Ministers of Holland should express any uneasiness at their apprehensions of any such private agreement, he was ordered by evasive answers to avoid giving them satisfaction concerning it.

In the mean time Mefnager and his companion took their leave of the British Ministers, in order to return to France, extremely satisfied with their reception here, the Queen having honoured Mefnager with a private conversation in her closet, and, at his request, granted to Marshal Tallard (who was supposed to have laid the foundation of this Negotiation) the favour of going to France for four months upon his parole, which ended in his enlargement, without ransom (1).

The seven preliminary articles published. Five days after Mefnager's departure, the Ministers thought fit to communicate the preliminary articles, he had signed to Count Gallas, the Emperor's Minister, who treated them with much scorn, and caused an English translation of them to be published, on the 13th of October, in the Daily Courant, as follows:

Preliminary articles on the part of France, for effecting a general peace,

The King being willing to contribute all that is in his power, to the re-establishing of the general peace, his Majesty declares,

I. That he will acknowledge the Queen of Great-Britain in that quality, as also the Succession of that Crown, according to the present settlement.

II. That he will freely, and bonâ fide, consent to the taking all just and reasonable measures, for hindering that the Crowns of France and Spain may ever be united on the head of the same Prince; his Majesty being persuaded, that this excess of power would be contrary to the good and quiet of Europe.

III. The King's intention is, that all the parties engaged in the present war, without excepting any of them, may find their reasonable satisfaction in the Treaty of peace, which shall be made: That Commerce may be re-established and maintained for the future, to the advantage of Great-Britain, of Holland, and of the other Nations, who have been accustomed to exercise Commerce.

IV. As the King will likewise maintain exactly the observation of the peace, when it shall be concluded, and the object, the King proposes to himself, being to secure the frontiers of his Kingdom, without disturbing in any manner whatever the neighbouring States, he promises to agree, by the Treaty which shall be made, that the Dutch shall be put in possession of the fortified places, which shall be mentioned, in the Netherlands, to serve hereafter for a barrier; which may secure the quiet of the Republic of Holland against any enterprize from the part of France.

V. The King consents likewise, that a secure and convenient barrier should be formed for the Empire, and for the House of Austria.

VI. Notwithstanding Dunkirk cost the King very great sums, as well to purchase it, as to fortify it; and that it is further necessary to be at very considerable expence for razing the works, his Majesty is willing however to engage to cause them to be demolished, immediately after the conclusion of the peace, on condition, that, for the fortifications of that place, a proper equivalent, that may content him, be given him: And, as England cannot furnish that equivalent, the discussion of it shall be referred to the Conferences to be held for the Negotiation of the peace.

VII. When the Conferences for the Negotiation of the peace shall be formed, all the pretensions

(1) It was confidently reported, that Mefnager, by the encouragement he received from Mr St John, spoke to the Queen in favour of the Chevalier de St George, whom he called her Brother; that, her Majesty seemed not displeased with the discourse; and that before he left England, he obtained, by means of Mrs Mansham, a verbal promise, that private instructions should be sent to the British Plenipotentiaries, not to insist on the French King's giving up the interest of the Chevalier intirely. Moreover, a letter from a good hand in Paris, dated November 19, N. S. imported, That, upon Mefnager's return thither, he was very sanguine, and affected publicly to affirm, that the peace was as good as concluded; and that, in particular, he laid great emphasis on the advantages granted in favour of the Prince of Wales; which to some people appeared very unlikely, especially when they compared the weight of such an affair with the abilities of Monsieur Mefnager, who was never accounted a great genius. Boyer.

MESNAGER.

Soon after, Count Gallas received a message from Mr Secretary St John in the Queen's name, that he should come no more to Court, his behaviour of late not being agreeable to her Majesty, but, that whatever should for the future be presented to her from his Imperial Majesty by the hands of another Minister, should be very well received.* He was further told, he might go away when he thought fit. This proceeding was severe and unusual; for the common method, when a provocation was given by a public Minister, was to complain of him, to his Master, and to desire him to be recalled. It was not then known upon what this was grounded; that which was surmized was, that Gaultier betrayed him, and discovered his secret correspondence, and the advertisements he sent the Emperor, to give him ill impressions of our Court; for which Gaultier was said to be rewarded with an Abbey in France (1).

The seven preliminaries were no sooner made public, than they were severely animadverted upon in several pamphlets, and defended in others; and being communicated to the States-General by the Earl of Stratford, who arrived at the Hague on the 10th of October, extremely alarmed the States, as not being a sufficient foundation, upon which a Negotiation might be hazarded; they dreaded the fatal consequences of opening the general Conferences, before the articles offered by France were explained, and especially before they knew at all what they were to trust to for their own Barrier, and for their Commerce. These considerations made them, for some time, decline granting the Passports to the French Plenipotentiaries; and, in order to prevail with the Queen to have some regard to her Allies, and particularly in the two great articles of their Barrier and Commerce, they sent over Monsieur Buys, as Envoy Extraordinary, to intercede with her to alter her resolutions; and they made the same representations to the Earl of Stratford, but all to no purpose. For as Mr St

John declared, in his letter to that Earl, of the 9th of October, "Certain it is, that her Majesty has so far determined upon her measures, that those will deceive themselves, who may imagine by delay or other artifices to break them." And again, November the 2d, to the same Earl, "The Queen will not finally concert a plan for the prosecution of the war with the States, until they join with her in agreeing to open the Conferences of peace." And the Earl acquaints Mr St John, November the 15th, "That he had now told them, her Majesty's order to him was to declare, that she would look upon any delay as a refusal to comply with her propositions." In these circumstances the Dutch at last complied to grant the passports, and agreed to open the general Conferences at the time fixed by the Queen, January the 1st, 1711-12; and, pursuant to this resolution of the States, upon the pressing instances of the Queen, passports for the French Plenipotentiaries were sent to Buys, and delivered to Mr St John; and Utrecht was agreed upon to be the place for the general Conferences; at which the Bishop of Bristol Lord Privy-Seal, and the Earl of Stratford, were appointed Plenipotentiaries, whose instructions were settled and signed on the 23d of December, 1711. By these instructions the Plenipotentiaries were ordered, "That, if it should be thought proper to begin by the disposition of the Spanish Monarchy, they were to insist, that the security and reasonable satisfaction the Allies expected, and which his most Christian Majesty had promised, could not be obtained, if Spain and the West-Indies be allotted to any branch of the House of Bourbon." So that hitherto the Queen thought fit to declare in all public acts, that Spain and the West-Indies ought by no means to be left in the possession of the House of Bourbon, although in the special preliminaries, signed by the Earl of Dartmouth and Mr St John, on the 27th of September preceding, the King of France did expressly promise to make good the 6th article for himself and for the King of Spain, pursuant to the powers, which were then in his hands.

Upon the receipt of the Preliminaries signed by Monsieur Mesnager, which Count Gallas transmitted to the new Emperor at Milan, his Imperial Majesty wrote a circular letter to the Electors, and other Princes of the Empire, exhorting

(1) It is hard to express, how greatly the generality of people, and even some friends of the Ministry, were surprized at the publication of these Preliminaries, which they looked upon as captious, insidious, and insufficient to ground a Treaty upon; whereas they had been made to expect such glorious and advantageous terms for all the Allies, that the peace would be lasting, safe, and honourable. Hereupon, to calm the minds of the people, an addition of six other Preliminary articles were the same day made public in the Post-Boy, which were said to be agreed to by France, though they were not yet signed, nor communicated to the Ministers of the Allies.

These were in substance:

1. That the Kingdoms of Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, and the Duchy of Milan, with the Fortresses of Tuscany, which belonged to the Crown of Spain, and all Flanders, should remain for ever to the House of Austria.

2. That King Philip should have all Spain, with the Islands of Majorca and Minorca, and the West-Indies.

3. That, for the security of the English and Dutch trade at all times with Spain, King Philip will consent, that the city of Cadiz shall be always garrisoned by the English, with full liberty to the South-Sea Company, to establish themselves on the continent of that country, according to the act of Parliament.

4. That the fortifications of Dunkirk shall be demolished, and the harbour ruined.

5. That the Dutch may name Commissioners, to treat with the French Commissioners about regulating the necessary Barriers.

6. That satisfaction and security shall be given to the rest of the Allies at the general Congress.

With such fictions, it was thought proper to satisfy the people.

1711. horting them to perſiſt in the engagements of the grand Alliance; and at the ſame time he wrote another letter to the States to the ſame effect, but, with this additional deſire, “ That they would join counſels with him to induce the Queen of Great-Britain to reject thoſe propoſitions, and to continue the war; or, if a Negotiation with the enemy could not be avoided, that it might be on condition, that the preceding preliminaries, propoſed moſt of them by the enemy himſelf, might remain fixed, and without alteration: And that ſhe would not truſt the immortal glory ſhe had gained, and the certain welfare of her people, to the infidelity of the French promiſes.” Before this letter reached the Hague, Count de Goes, the Imperial Plenipotentiary there, preſented a memorial to the States, about the current report, “ That the Queen of Great-Britain had accepted the ſeven articles propoſed by France, judging them ſufficient for proceeding to a general Congreſs of peace; and preſſed their High Mightineſſes to conſent thereto, and to grant their paſſports for the Ambaſſadors of France. Wherefore he thought it his duty to aſk of their High Mightineſſes, Whether this report were true? And in caſe it was, to deſire them not to come to any reſolution, but in conjunction with his Imperial Majeſty, or his Miniſters, conformable to the ſixth article of the Grand Alliance.” The States returned a civil answer both to this memorial, and to the Emperor’s repreſentations; but the letter, which the Emperor wrote at the ſame time to the Queen of Great-Britain, and which was delivered by Monſieur Hoffman, did not meet with the like favourable return.

Many mercenary pens were ſet on work, to juſtify the proceedings of the new Miniſtry, and to deſame the Allies, more particularly the Dutch: This was done with much art, but with no regard to Truth, in a pamphlet intitled The Conduct of the Allies, and of the late Miniſtry: To which very full answers were written, detecting the thread of falſhood that ran through the work (1). It was now ſaid, England was ſo exhausted, that it was impoſſible to carry on the war: And, when King Charles was choſen Emperor, it was alſo ſaid, he would be too great and too dangerous to all his neighbours, if Spain were joined to the Emperor, and to the Hereditary Dominions: It was alſo zealouſly, though moſt falſly, inſufed into the minds of the people, that our Allies, moſt particularly the Dutch, had impoſed on us, and failed us on many occaſions. The Jacobites did, with the greater joy, entertain this proſpect of peace, becauſe the Dauphin had, in a viſit to St Germain, congratulated that Court upon it; which made them conclude, that it was to have a happy effect, with relation to the Pretender’s affairs.

Our Court denied this; and ſent the Earl Rivers to Hanover, to aſſure the Elector, that the Queen would take eſpecial care, to have the Succeſſion to the Crown ſecured to his family, by the Treaty that was to be opened: This made little Impreſſion on that Elector; for he ſaw clearly, that, if Spain and the West Indies were left to King Philip, the French would ſoon become the ſuperior power to all the reſt of Europe; that France would keep Spain in ſubjection, and, by the wealth they would fetch from the Indies, they would give law to all about them, and ſet what King they pleaſed on the Throne of England. Earl Rivers ſtaid a few days there, and brought an answer from the Elector in writing; yet the Elector apprehended, not without reaſon, that it might be ſifted; therefore his Miniſter the Baron de Boibmar, who The Elec- came over with the Duke of Marlborough on tor of Ha- the 18th of November, was ordered to deliver nover’s to Mr St John a long memorial, repreſenting memorial. the neceſſity of preſerving a perfect union be- Nov. 20. tween the Allies, while the peace ſhould be treat- O. S. ing; of their giving each other a mutual guaranty upon what ſhould therein be concluded; as alſo the pernicious conſequences, if Spain and the Indies were left to the Duke of Anjou (2). This memorial, a few days after it was delivered, was publiſhed in the Daily Courant of December the 5th, and received with great applauſe by all the well-wiſhers to the Proteſtant Succeſſion, who highly commended the Elector of Hanover for his reaſonable interpoſition in an affair, which ſo nearly concerned him. But, on the other hand, as it directly condemned the preſent ſcheme of peace, it gave no ſmall offence to the Miniſtry, whole agents openly exclaimed againſt it, ſuggeſting,

(1) On the 23d of October, being the firſt day of the Term, fourteen Bookſellers, Printers, or Publiſhers, who had been lately taken up and committed to the cuſtody of State-Meſſengers, by warrants from Mr Secretary St John, for printing and publiſhing pamphlets, libels, and ballads, ſome of which were indeed ſevere invectives againſt the Miniſtry, and others repreſented as ſuch, appeared at the bar of the Court of Queen’s Bench, where Mr Nicholas Lechmere, Counſel for Mr Darby, and Mr Hurt, two of the Printers, pleaded with great zeal againſt the ſeverity of committing people, without telling them their crimes; urging, That at this rate the Office of a Secretary of State would become a Spaniſh Inquiſition. But, at the requeſt of Attorney-General, all the ſaid Perſons were continued on their Recognizances till the laſt day of Term. Mr Darby and Mr Hurt were proteſtated on account of a tranſlation of a memorable paſſage in Tacitus about Cecilius Baſſus’s deceiving the Emperor Nero, with the promiſe of an imenſe but imaginary treaſure, which was inſerted in a paper called the Obſervator, and was deſigned as a reflection on the South-Sea project. Others were proteſtated on more criminal accounts, viz. for publiſhing ſeditious ballads, Numb. LXVII. Vol. IV.

called, A Welcome to the Medal, Credit-reſtored, Mat’s Peace, &c. Notwithſtanding theſe proteſtations, the pens of both parties were ſtill buſy, the one in exploding, and the other in vindicating, the preſent Negotiations of peace.

(2) It concludes thus: There is ground to hope, that, by remaining firmly united, the Allies may ſoon oblige France (with the bleſſing of God) to agree to reaſonable conditions; the extreme indigence that Crown is in, and the need ſhe has of peace, being very certain, and confirmed from all parts. The Almighty has bleſſed the arms of the Queen and of her Allies, with ſo many triumphs over their powerful enemy, to the end they may ſecure themſelves by a ſafe and advantageous peace, from all they have to fear from him; and it cannot be his pleaſure, that an enemy ſo exhausted, and vanquiſhed, as he has been on all occaſions, ſhould at laſt carry his deſigns by this war, and get out of it by a peace glorious to him, to the ruin of the victorious Allies, and to the deſtruction of the Liberty of all Europe; in acquiring by this peace the power of giving a King to Spain, of impoſing one upon Great-Britain, and of making the validity of the election of the Head of the Empire depend on his approbation.

1711. gesting, that it was very impolite in his Electoral Highness, at this juncture, to intermeddle in the affairs of Great-Britain, and seem to espouse a party. Others pretended, that this memorial had more the air of an original in English, than of a translation from the French; and so concluded, it was contrived in London by the leading men of the Whig party, in concert with Baron Bolmar, who was persuaded to present it: But this was altogether groundless, for the memorial was drawn up in form at Hanover, by Monsieur Robelton, according to the Elector's orders and directions. Nay, some were so bold, as in a printed Letter from a supposed Whig Gentleman in the country, to a friend in town, to question the genuineness of that memorial, and to laugh at it as a barefaced imposture; with other scandalous reflections on his Electoral Highness, and his Envoy. As for the British Ministers, they had no manner of regard to that representation; nor would the Queen perhaps ever have seen it, had it not been shewn to her in print by the Duke of Somerset, before it was laid before her by the Secretary of State; which could not be agreeable either to her, or to Mr St John, who expostulated with the Baron de Bolmar about publishing his memorial.

The Parliament having been prorogued to the 27th of November, a Council was held on the 20th at St James's, whether it should be further prorogued, or only adjourned for a few days; and it was at last carried for a prorogation till the 7th of December. It seems, the Dutch, before they gave their consent to the opening of a Congress, were desirous to see first how the Parliament was inclined, but the Earl of Strafford, perceiving their design, told them plainly, that, till they agreed to treat, the Session would not be opened, so they complied: Another reason, for proroguing the Parliament so late in the year, was the discovery of a Coalition of some 1711. eminent Peers of the High-Church Party, with those of the contrary side, and of their having concerted a Representation to be laid before the Queen against a peace on the foot of the proposals made by France; which, it was thought, might be prevented, it not by other means, at least by the coming up of the Scotch Peers, not above three or four of whom were yet arrived in London (1).

In the mean time, pains were taken on many persons who were supposed to be concerned in the intended representation. The Lord-Treasurer Harley endeavoured to engage the Earl of Nottingham in the Court-measures, against which Perce he had openly declared. And the Queen, at the same time, closeted the Dukes of Grafton and St Albans, the Earls of Dorset and Scarborough, the Lords Sommers, Cowper, and particularly the Duke of Marlborough, who, upon his coming over, spoke plainly to the Queen against the steps that were already made: But he found her so possessed, that what he said made no impression; so he desired to be excused from coming to Council, since he must oppose the present proceedings. All the rest likewise remained firm in their opinion, to the great disappointment of the new Ministry (2). It was therefore proposed at first in a Council, on the 5th of December, to cause both Houses to adjourn for a few days, during which fresh endeavours might be used to defeat the design lately formed against the present scheme; but some Members of the Privy-Council having represented the fears and jealousies, which such an adjournment, after so many prorogations, might create in the minds of the people; and on the other hand, the Ministry, either hoping, with the assistance of their Scots friends, to have a majority in the House of Lords, or, at least, being secure of it in that of the Commons, it was, after a long debate, finally resolved, that the

(1) What happened, some days before, afforded yet more matter of discourse and speculation. Upon information, that the effigies of the Devil, the Pope, and the Pretender, were to be carried in procession, and (according to the custom of the London Mob) burnt on the 17th of November, the Anniversary of Queen Elizabeth's Inauguration, the Earl of Dartmouth issued out his warrant, pursuant to which, on the 16th, at twelve at night, some of the Queen's Messengers, sustained by a detachment of the Foot-guards, seized those three figures, with several others of Cardinals, Jesuits, and Friars, all finely dressed, and carried them from an empty house in Drury-Lane, where they had been lodged, to the Earl of Dartmouth's Office in the Cock pit. And the Trained-Bands of London and Westminster were immediately assembled, and continued under arms three days together. At the same time endeavours were used to render obnoxious an illustrious society of Noblemen and Gentlemen, called the Kit-Cat-Club, who, for many years, had distinguished themselves by their zeal for the Protestant Succession. For which purpose, the mercenary Writer of the Post-Boy, of the 22d of November, was directed to charge them with "a conspiracy to raise a mob to confront the best of Queens, and her Ministry, pull down the houses of several honest, worthy, loyal, true English Gentlemen, having had money distributed amongst them some time before for that purpose by G. G. S. S. W. H. M. [i. e. Grafton, Gedolphin, Dr Garth, Somerset, Sunderland, Sommers, Wharton, Hallifax, and Montague.] an insatiable junto, cum multis aliis, who made the

"subscription, and gave out, that her Majesty was very ill, if not dead, in order to have acted the treasons with greater freedom." Whereas the Lords and Gentlemen, who were at the expense of these effigies, had no other design, than to have them carried in procession, and afterwards burnt with the like solemnity, as was remarkably practised on the 17th of November, 1679, when the Nation was justly alarmed with a popish Plot, and a popish Successor.

(2) Among others (says Bishop Burnet, Vol. II. p. 582.) the Queen spoke to myself; she said, she hoped Bishops would not be against peace: I said, a good peace was what we prayed daily for, but the Preliminaries offered by France gave no hopes of such an one; and the trusting to the King of France's Faith, after all that had passed, would seem a strange thing. She said, we were not to regard the Preliminaries; we should have a peace upon such a bottom, that we should not at all rely on the King of France's word, but we ought to suspend our opinions, till she acquainted us, with the whole matter. I asked leave to speak my mind plainly; which she granted: I said, any treaty, by which Spain and the Holland were left to King Philip, made in a little while deliver up all Europe into the hands of France; and, if any such Peace should be made, she was betrayed, and we would all be ruined; in less than three years time, she would be murdered, and the fires would be again raised in Smithfield: I pursued this long, till I saw she grew uneasy; so I withdrew.

1711. the Parliament should sit on the day, to which they were last prorogued. Accordingly, a Committee of the Council having met the 6th of December, to consider of the Queen's speech, her Majesty went the next day in a sedan to the House of Peers, and spake to both Houses to this effect:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Queen's Speech.

"I Have called you together, as soon as the publick affairs would permit; and I am glad I can now tell you, that, notwithstanding the arts of those, who delight in war, both place and time are appointed, for opening the Treaty of a general peace.

"Our Allies, especially the States-General, whose interest I look upon as inseparable from my own, have, by ready their concurrence, expressed their intire confidence in me; and I have no reason to doubt, but that my own subjects are assured of my particular care of them.

"My chief concern is, that the Protestant Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of these Nations, may be continued to you, by securing the Succession to the Crown, as it is limited by Parliament to the House of Hanover.

"I shall endeavour, that after a war, which has cost so much blood and treasure, you may find your interest in trade and commerce improved and enlarged by a peace, with all other advantages, which a tender and affectionate Sovereign can procure for a dutiful and loyal People.

"The Princes and States, which have been engaged with us in this war, being by treaties intitled to have their several interests secured at a peace, I will not only do my utmost to procure every one of them all reasonable satisfaction, but I shall unite with them in the strictest engagements for continuing the Alliance, in order to render the general peace secure and lasting.

"The best way to have this treaty effectual, will be to make early provision for the campaign. Therefore, I must ask of you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, the necessary Supplies for the next year's war; and I do most earnestly recommend to you, to make such dispatch therein, as may convince our enemies, that, if we cannot obtain a good peace, we are prepared to carry on the war with vigour.

"Whatever you give, will still be in your power to apply; and I doubt not, but, in a little time after the opening of the treaty, we shall be able to judge of its event.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"As I have had your chearful assistance for the carrying on this long and chargeable war, so I assure myself, that no true Protestant, or good Subject, will envy Britain or Me the glory and satisfaction of ending the same by a just and honourable peace for Us and all our Allies.

"Such a peace will give new life to our foreign trade; and I shall do my utmost to improve that happy opportunity to encourage our home-manufactures, which will tend to

"the easing my subjects in that excessive charge they now lie under in maintaining the poor, and to correct and redress such abuses, as may have crept into any part of the Administration during so long a war.

"I cannot conclude, without earnestly recommending to you all unanimity; and that you will carefully avoid every thing, which may give occasion to the enemy to think us a people divided amongst ourselves, and consequently prevent our obtaining that good peace, of which we have such reasonable hopes, and so near a view.

"I pray God direct your consultations to this end, that, being delivered from the hardships of war, you may become a happy and a flourishing people."

This speech gave occasion to many reflections. The arts of those, who delighted in war, seemed to be levelled at the Duke of Marlborough, and the Preliminaries concerted at the Hague; and her saying, that the Allies expressed their intire confidence in her, amazed all those, who knew, that neither the Emperor, nor the Empire, had agreed to the Congress, but were opposing it with great vehemence; and that even the States-General were far from being cordial or easy in the steps they had made.

As soon as the Queen had ended her speech, she retired into a room, and, having taken off her robes, came back Incognito to the House of Peers, both to hear the debates, and, by her presence, to moderate any heats, that might arise; which however, was by some observed to be unusual on the day the Sovereign opens a Session of Parliament.

The Earl of Ferrers having made a motion for an address of thanks to the Queen for her speech, the Earl of Nottingham rose up, and very copiously set forth the insufficiency and captiousness of the late Preliminaries; made a lively representation of the danger of treating upon so precarious a foundation; urged the express engagements, which Great-Britain had entered into with the Allies, to restore the intire monarchy of Spain to the House of Austria; and the necessity of carrying on the war with vigour, till those engagements were made good: adding, 'That, though he had a numerous family, he would readily contribute half his income towards it, rather than acquiesce in a peace, which he thought unsafe and dishonourable to his Country and all Europe.' He concluded with offering a clause to be inserted in the address of thanks, 'to represent to her Majesty, as the humble opinion and advice of the House, that no peace could be safe or honourable to Great-Britain, or Europe, if Spain and the West-Indies were allotted to any branch of the House of Bourbon.' The Lord Guernsey, brother to the Earl of Nottingham, said, 'That such a clause was foreign to an address of thanks: That, in all probability, few of the Members of the House were prepared to speak to it; but that it might be debated at a more convenient time, when, according to custom, the House should take into consideration the State of the Nation.' He was seconded by the Lord North and Grey, and another Peer; and the Lord Treasurer added, 'That, according to the rules and orders of the House, this was not the proper time to debate such a motion.' Upon this the Earl of Wharton appealed to the House, whether

And, the Duke of Buckingham, the most versed in the knowledge of Parliamentary proceedings, having overruled the Treasurer's objection, the Earl of Wharton proceeded; spoke with great zeal against the Preliminary Articles offered by France; and insisted upon the necessity of inserting in the address the clause offered by the Earl of Nottingham. He was supported by the Earl of Sunderland, who answered the objection raised by some Peers of the opposite side, namely, that they were not prepared to speak to that motion: "What, my Lords, said he, is it possible, that any Member of this illustrious House should be unprepared to debate an affair, which, for these ten years past, has been the principal subject-matter of our consultations? Do not we sit in the same House? And, Are we not the same Peers, who have constantly been of opinion, and have often represented to her Majesty, that no safe and honourable peace can be made, unless Spain and the West-Indies be recovered from the House of Bourbon? It is true, I see some new faces among us: But even that Lord, who sits on the Wool-pack [meaning the Lord Treasurer] may well remember, that, in the late reign, four Lords were impeached for having made a Partition-Treaty." The Earl of Anglesey, (who, with the Duke of Ormond, was just come into the House, having that morning travelled above thirty miles in their return from Ireland) represented "the necessity of easing the Nation of the burden of this expensive war, and said, they ought to leave it to her Majesty's wisdom to conclude a peace, when she thought it convenient for the good her subjects:" adding, "That we might have enjoyed that blessing soon after the battle of Ramillies, if the same had not been put off by some persons, whose interest it was to prolong the war." The Duke of Marlborough, who could not but perceive, that this suggestion was levelled against him, made a long and pathetic speech, wherein, among other things, he said, "He thought himself happy, in having an opportunity given him of vindicating himself on so material a point, which his enemies had so loudly, and so unjustly, laid to his charge, before a person [meaning the Queen, and making a bow towards the place where her Majesty was] who knowing the integrity of his heart, and the uprightness of his conduct, would not fail doing him justice. That he referred himself to the Queen, whether, whilst he had the honour to serve her Majesty, as General and Plenipotentiary, he had not constantly informed Her, and her Council, of all the proposals of peace, that had been made; and, had not desired instructions for his conduct on that subject? That he could declare with a safe conscience, in the presence of her Majesty, of that illustrious assembly, and of that Supreme Being, who is infinitely above all the powers upon earth, and before whom, according to the ordinary course of nature, he must soon appear, to give an account of his actions, that he ever was desirous of a safe, honourable, and lasting peace; and that he was always very far from any design of prolonging the war for his own private advantage, as his enemies had most falsely insinuated. That his advanced age, and the many fatigues he had undergone, made him earnestly wish for retirement and repose, to think of eternity the remainder of his days; the rather, because he had not the least motive to desire the continuance of the war, having been so generously rewarded, and had honours and riches heaped upon him, far beyond his desert and expectation, both by her Majesty and her Parliaments. That he thought himself bound to this public acknowledgment to her Majesty and his Country, that he should always be ready to serve them, if he could but crawl along, to obtain an honourable and lasting peace: But that at the same time, he must take the liberty to declare, that he could, by no means, give into the measures, that had lately been taken to enter into a Negotiation of peace with France, upon the foot of the seven preliminary articles; for he was of the same opinion with the rest of the Allies, that the safety and liberties of Europe would be in imminent danger, if Spain and the West-Indies were left to the House of Bourbon; which, with all humility, and as he thought himself in duty bound, he had declared to her Majesty, whom he had the honour to wait on, after his return from Holland: And, therefore, he was for inserting in the address the clause offered by the Earl of Nottingham." This speech, delivered with a most hearty concern, had the greater weight, as it was supported by the Lord Cowper, the Bishop of Sarum, the Lord Halifax, and some other Peers. On the other hand, the Lord North and Grey and some other officious Courtiers said, that, since peace and war belonged, as prerogatives to the Crown, it was not proper to offer any advice in those matters, until it was asked: But this was rejected with indignation, since it was a constant practice, in all Sessions of Parliament, to offer advices; no prerogative could be above advice; this was the end specified in the writ, by which a Parliament was summoned; nor was the motion for a delay received. The eyes of all Europe were upon the present Session; and this was a post-night: So it was fit they should come to a present resolution, in a matter of such importance. This debate (in which the Dukes of Strettonbury and Buckingham were observed to say little or nothing) having lasted till near seven in the evening, the question was put, whether the Earl of Nottingham's advice should be part of the address; and, the previous question being first put, it was carried by the single vote of that Earl; but the mean question was carried by sixty-two against fifty-four: So this point was gained, though by a small majority.

It was expected, that the Court-party would the next day have the majority, by means of the proxies which eight Scot Peers had sent to the Duke of Hamilton and the Earl of Mar. Wherefore, when the address of the Lords was reported to the House, by the Committee appointed to prepare it, the Court tried to get the whole matter to be contested over again, pretending, that the debate was not now, upon the matter, debated the day before, but only whether they should agree to the draught, prepared by the Committee: But that part of it, which contained the advice, was conceived in the very words, in which the vote had passed; and it was a standing rule, that what was once voted, could never again be brought into question, da-

This was so sacred a rule, that many of those, who voted with the Court the day before, expressed their indignation against it, as subverting the very Constitution of Parliaments, if things might be thus voted and unvoted again, from day to day: Yet even upon this a division was called for, but, the majority appearing so evidently against the motion, it was yielded, without counting the House. Three days after, the Lords waited on the Queen with their address, which was as follows:

address, r. H. L. WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, do, with hearts full of gratitude and loyalty to your sacred Majesty, beg leave to return your Majesty our most humble and hearty thanks and acknowledgments for your Majesty's most tender and affectionate care for all your people, expressed in your Majesty's most gracious speech from the throne, and for imparting to us your Majesty's desires of ending this present war, by a peace advantageous to your Subjects, and just and honourable for your Majesty and all your Allies; as also for your Majesty's expressing so particular a regard for the interest of the States-General, as inseparable from your own; and that your Majesty is graciously pleased to assure us, it is your chief concern, that the Protestant Religion, and the laws and liberties of these nations, may be continued to your people, by securing the Succession to the Crown, as it is limited by Parliament to the House of Hanover; and that your Majesty is pleased to shew so just a resolution to procure a satisfaction for all the Allies, being by treaties intitled to have their several interests secured at a peace, and to unite with them in the strictest engagements, in order to render the peace secure and lasting. And we do beg leave to represent it to your Majesty, as the humble opinion and advice of this House, that no peace can be safe or honourable to Great-Britain or Europe, if Spain and the West-Indies are to be allotted to any part of the House of Bourbon.

To which the Queen returned this answer:

My Lords,

"I take the thanks you give me kindly. I should be very sorry any one could think I would not do my utmost to recover Spain and the West-Indies from the House of Bourbon (1)."

The Lords returned her thanks for this answer: For they understood, by the doing her utmost, was meant the continuing the war. The Court was much troubled to see the House of Lords so backward, and both sides studied to fortify themselves, by bringing up their friends or by getting their proxies.

The House of Commons were more complaisant than that of the Lords, for a clause being offered to be inserted in their address of thanks, importing, "That the House did not doubt, but care would be taken, that Spain and the West-Indies should not be left in the hands of any branch of the House of Bourbon, which might endanger the safety of her Majesty's Person and Government, the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover, and the Liberties of Europe;" after a long debate, this clause was rejected by a majority of two hundred and thirty-two voices against one hundred and six; and so the Commons, in their address, not only expressed their satisfaction in what her Majesty had been pleased to declare of the just and honourable peace, which she had in view; but, at the same time, assured her, that they would use their utmost endeavours to disappoint, as well the arts and designs of those, who, for private views, might delight in war, as the hopes the enemies might have vainly entertained of receiving advantage from any division among them. The Queen returned for answer, "That this very dutiful address was what she expected from the zeal and loyalty of such an House of Commons: That she returned them her hearty thanks for the confidence they had in her; and entirely relied upon their assurances: And that they might depend upon her affection and care for their interests."

While things passed smoothly in the House of Commons, the proceedings in the House of Peers made a great noise, and kept the contending parties in suspense: The Duke of Hamilton, one of the sixteen Peers for Scotland, having been created a Peer of Great-Britain, by the title of Duke of Brandon, notwithstanding a caveat entered against his patent, and now claiming a place in that quality in the House of Peers, many Lords, who apprehended no small danger to the Constitution, from the admitting into their House a greater number of Scots Peers, than were agreed to by the act of Union, resolved to oppose his claim. When that affair was brought into the House, it was espoused by the Court with great zeal, and the Queen came to hear the debates. Lawyers were heard for the Patent: It was said, the Queen's prerogative in conferring honours was clear. All the subjects of the united Kingdom had likewise a capacity of receiving Honour. The Commons of Scotland had it unquestionably; and it seemed a strange assertion, that the Peers of that Nation should be the only persons incapable of receiving honour. By the act of Union the Peers of Scotland were, by virtue of that Treaty, to have a representation of sixteen for their whole body: These words, by virtue of that Treaty, seemed to insinuate, that, by Creation or Succession, they might be made capable. And in the debate, that followed in the House, the Scots Lords, who had been of the Treaty of Union, affirmed, that these words were put in on that design. And, upon this, they appealed to the English Lords: This

(1) The same day the address was presented, several Court Lords entered their protests against it; 1. Because the nature of it was altered, there being no precedent for inserting a clause of advice in an address of thanks. 2. Because they looked upon it No. 67. VOL. IV.

"as an invasion of the Royal Prerogative, in so sudden a manner to declare their opinion in a matter of such importance to the Crown, as the making of peace and war."

1711. was denied by none of them. It was also urged, that the House of Lords had already judged the matter, when they not only received the Duke of Queensberry upon his being created Duke of Dover, but had so far affirmed his being a Peer of Great Britain, that upon that account they had denied him the right of voting in the election of the sixteen Peers of Scotland. But, in opposition to all this, it was replied, that the prerogative could not operate, when it was barred by an act of Parliament: The act of Union had made all the Peers of Scotland Peers of Great Britain, as to all intents, except the voting in the House of Lords, or sitting in judgment on a Peer: And, as to their voting, that was vested in their representatives, by whom they voted. The Queen might give them what titles she pleased; but this incapacity of voting, otherwise than by these sixteen, being settled by law, the prerogative was by that limited as to them. They had indeed admitted the Duke of Queensberry to sit among them as Duke of Dover; but that matter was never brought into debate, and so was passed over in silence; and he was mentioned in their books, upon occasion of his voting in the choice of the sixteen Peers of Scotland, in terms that were far from determining this; for it was there said, that he, claiming to be Duke of Dover, could not vote as a Scots Peer. The Scots Lords, in arguing for the Patent, infilled with great vehemence, not without intimations of the dismal effects, that might follow, if it should go in the negative. The Court exerted their whole strength to support the Patent. This heighten'd the zeal of those who opposed it; for they apprehended, that, considering the dignity and the antiquity of the Scots Peers, and the poverty of the greater part of them, the Court would always have recourse to this, as a sure expedient to have a constant majority in the House of Lords. There was no limitation indeed on the Prerogative, as to the creation of new Peers; yet these were generally men of estates, who could not be kept in a constant dependence, as some of the Scots Lords might be. The debate lasted till near eight o'clock in the evening, when the question was put, Whether the twelve Judges should be consulted with? Which being carried in the negative by fourteen votes, proxies included, another question was put, Whether Scots Peers, created Peers of Great Britain since the Union, had a right to sit in that House? Which was also carried in the negative by a majority of fifty-seven voices against fifty-two (1). The Queen and the Ministers seemed to be much concerned at this, and the Scots were enraged at it. They met together, and signed a representation to the Queen, complaining of it as a breach of the Union, and a mark of disgrace put on the whole Peerage of Scotland, adding solemn promises of maintaining her Prerogative, either in an united or separate state. This made the Ministers resolve on another method to let the Peers, and indeed the whole world see, that they would have that House kept in a constant dependence on the Court, by creating such a number of Peers at once, as should give them an unquestionable majority.

In the mean time an affair of no less importance was brought into the House of Peers. The Occasional Conformity Bill, having miscarried three times, lay dormant for seven years, till it was at this time revived by the Earl of Nottingham, who told those, with whom he now joined, that he was but one man come over to them, unless he could carry a bill to that purpose: But, if they would give way to that, he hoped he should be able to bring many to concur with them in other things. They yielded

(1) On this occasion was entered the following protest:

Dissentient,

1. Because, as we apprehend, by this resolution, the prerogative of the Crown in granting patents of honours, with all privileges depending thereon, to the Peers of Great Britain, who were Peers of Scotland at the time of the Union, as well as the right of the Duke of Brandon to sit and vote in Parliament, are taken away; and this prerogative of the Crown, and right of the Duke, depending upon the construction of an act of Parliament, though Counsel, by order of the House, were heard at the bar, and all the Judges were ordered to attend at the same time, yet the opinion of the Judges was not permitted to be asked touching the construction of the said act of Parliament.

2. Because the prerogative of the Crown, as we conceive in granting patents of honour, with the privileges depending thereon, ought not, in the construction of any act of Parliament, to be taken away, unless there be plain and express words to that purpose in the said act: And we conceive, there are no such plain and express words to that purpose in the act of Union.

3. Because by this resolution all the Peers of Great Britain, who were Peers of Scotland at the time of the Union, are supposed to be incapable of receiving of any patent of honour from the Crown, by virtue whereof they may be intitled to the privileges of sitting and voting in Parliament, and sitting on the trial of Peers; which, we conceive, is repugnant to the fourth article of the Union, which declares the privileges and advantages, which do or may belong to the subjects of either Kingdom, except where it is otherwise expressly agreed in those articles, in which, we apprehend, there is no such provision.

4. Because the Duke of Queensberry, in all respects in the same case, as the Duke of Hamilton, was introduced, sat, and voted in this House, in matters of the highest importance, in two several Parliaments, as Duke of Dover, by virtue of a patent passed since the Union; and, in consequence of such sitting and voting, his vote in the election of Peers of Scotland was rejected; and, as a further consequence thereof, the Marquis of Lathian was removed from his seat in this House, which he had an undeniable title to, if the Duke of Queensberry's patent, as Duke of Dover, had not given him a title to sit and vote in this House.

5. Because, by this resolution, the Peers of Scotland are reduced to a worse condition in some respects, than the meanest or most criminal subjects.

6. Because we conceive this resolution may be construed, to be a violation of the treaty between the two Nations.

1711. ed this the more easily, because they knew, that the Court had offered to the Highmen in the House of Commons, to carry any bill, they should desire in that matter. The Earl of Nottingham promised to draw it with all possible temper. It was thus prepared, that all persons in places of profit and trust, and all the Common-Council-men in Corporations, who should be at any Meeting for divine worship (where there were above ten persons more than the family) in which the Common Prayer was not used, or where the Queen and Princess Sophia were not prayed for, should, upon conviction, forfeit their place of trust, or profit, the witnesses making oath within ten days, and the prosecution being within three months after the offence; and such persons were to continue incapable of any employment, till they should depose, that for a whole year together they had been at no Conventicle. The bill likewise enacted, that the Toleration should remain inviolable in all time to come; and that, if any person should be brought into trouble for not having observed the rules that were prescribed by the act, that first granted the Toleration, all such prosecution should cease, upon their taking the oath prescribed by that act: And a Teacher in any one County was by the bill qualified to serve in any licensed Meeting in any part of England; and, by another clause, all who were concerned in the practice of the Law in Scotland, were required to take the Abjuration in the month of June next. This bill was brought into the House of Lords on the 15th of December, and, no opposition being made to it, they passed it in three days, and sent it down to the Commons, who read it immediately the first time, and gave it a second reading the next day; and on the 20th of December, a petition being offered to the House in behalf of the Dutch and French Protestant Churches, praying, they might be excepted from the restraints laid by this bill upon English Dissenting Congregations: The petition was rejected. After which the Commons in a Committee of the whole House (which that morning was very thin) made several amendments to the bill, particularly the addition of a penalty on the offender of forty pounds, which was to be given to the informer. These amendments being immediately reported and agreed to, the bill was sent back to the Peers, who the same day sent down a message to the Commons, to acquaint them, they had agreed to these amendments (1). Great reflections were made on the fate of this bill, which had formerly been so much contested, and was so often rejected by the Lords, and now went through both Houses in so silent a manner, without the least opposition. 1711. Some of the Dissenters complained much, that they were thus forsaken by their Friends, to whom they had trusted; and the Court had agents among them, to inflame their resentments, since they were sacrificed by those, on whom they depended. All the excuse, that the Whigs made for their easiness in this matter, was, that they gave way to it, to try how far the yielding it might go towards quieting the fears of those, who seemed to think, that the Church was still in danger, till that act passed, and thereby to engage these to concur with them in those important matters, that might come before them (2).

On the 22d of December, the Queen being The Commons indisposed, the Lord-Keeper and the Lord-President, and other Lords, were commissioned Journal to the 14th of January to pass the land-tax-bill for four shillings in the pound, which was ready for the Royal assent, with the bill against Occasional Conformity. After which, the Commons adjourned to the 14th of January, which was a long recess at so critical a time.

Before the Lords adjourned, a motion was The Lords made by the Duke of Devonshire, for leave to address bring in a bill, to give the Electoral Prince of Hanover, as Duke of Cambridge, the precedence of all Peers; which was granted, and so was likely to meet with no opposition. The Earl of Nottingham moved next, that, before their recess, they should make an address to the Queen, desiring, 'That her Majesty would be pleased to give instructions to her Plenipotentiaries, to consult with the Ministers of the Allies in Holland, before the opening of the Congress, that they might concert the necessary measures to preserve a strict union amongst them all, the better to obtain the great end proposed by her Majesty, for procuring to them all just and reasonable satisfaction, and for rendering the peace more secure and lasting, which could only be effected by a general guaranty of the terms of the peace to all the Allies, and of the Protestant Succession to these Kingdoms, as settled by Act of Parliament.' All the opposition, which the Court made to this, was to shew, that it was needless, since it was already ordered; and the Lord-Treasurer said, that the Lords might, in order to their satisfaction, send to examine their instructions. To this it was answered, that the offering such an address would satisfy the Plenipotentiaries, in executing their instructions. The Court moved, these words might be put into the address, in case her Majesty had not already given such orders; which being agreed to, the address was presented on the 27th of December, and

(1) The Dissenters (says Boyer) being justly alarmed at this bill, did, the same morning, make application to the Earl of Oxford, Lord High-Treasurer, humbly beseeching his Lordship to use his powerful interest to prevent the passing of it: But though his Lordship, with most of his Family, had, for the greatest part of his life, joined in Communion with the Presbyterians; yet, on this occasion, he thought fit to sacrifice his religious principles to his political views; and so the Dissenters were left in the lurch.

(2) Dr Calamy, in his Historical Additions, says, on this occasion: Thus, after fifty years exclusion from the public Churches, by the act of Uniformity, during the one half of which they were exposed to great rigours and severities, though, during the other half, they have had more liberty, are the poor Dissenters excluded the service of the State. So far are we from any hopes of a coalition, which has been so often talked of, that nothing will do but an entire submission. Conscience truly scrupulous may indeed still have their liberty: But they, that would be capable of any places of profit and trust, must quit the Meetings after March 25, 1712; and they, that in all times and changes adhered to the true interest of their Country, must be publicly branded. Perhaps, the time may come, when persons may have other thoughts of this matter, than while in the heat of action.

(1) The

1711. and the Lords adjourned no longer than to the 2d of January, which, as well as the address, was no small surprize to the Queen and her Ministers.

The Duke of Marlborough turned out of all his employments, on pretences of bribery.
Pr. II. C. Burnet.

During the recess it was, that the Duke of Marlborough was discharged from all his employments. In order to this, all the methods, that malice and envy could invent, were used to make him appear criminal. But the discoveries made by the Commissioners for examining the public accounts were made the immediate cause of his disgrace. Sir Solomon Medina, a Jew, concerned in the contract for furnishing bread to the army in Flanders, made a present yearly to the Duke of Marlborough of between five and six thousand pounds. The General of the States, it seems, had the like present, as a perquisite to support his dignity, and to enable him to procure intelligence. The Queen ordered ten thousand pounds a year more to the Duke of Marlborough for the same service. King William had also agreed, that two and a half per Cent. should be deducted out of the pay of the foreign troops, which amounted to fifteen thousand pounds. This the Queen had by a warrant appointed the Duke of Marlborough to receive, on the same account.

The Duke having heard, while he was beyond sea, that the Commissioners had discovered the present made him by the Jew, sent them a letter on the 10th of November, N. S. from the Hague, wherein he owned the whole matter to be true, and added, he had applied these sums to the procuring good intelligence, to which, next 1711. to the blessing of God on the bravery of the troops, their constant successes were owing. This did not satisfy the Commissioners; but, though no complaints were brought from the army of their not being constantly supplied with good bread, yet they saw here was matter to raise a clamour against the Duke, which they chiefly aimed at. Accordingly the Commissioners reported these things to the House of Commons on the 21st of December, the day before their recess (which report was referred to the 17th of January) and the next day, pursuant to an order of the House, Mr Shippen, one of the Commissioners, laid before them: First, the deposition of Sir Solomon de Medina, Knight, proving great sums of money taken by his Grace, John Duke of Marlborough, Adam Cardanuel, Esquire, his Grace's Secretary, and others, on account of the contracts for supplying bread and bread-waggons to her Majesty's forces in the Low-Countries. Secondly, Captain William Preston's deposition about forage in North-Britain. Upon this the Duke of Marlborough's letter, which he had writ in vindication of himself to the Commissioners, was, by his order or contrivance, published in the Daily Courant of the 27th of December. This letter having made an impression in his favour on the minds of many persons, the report of the Commissioners was, by way of answer, printed at large two days after (1), and the next day, the 30th of December,

(1) The substance of the report, and the Duke's letter, were as follow: * That it appeared by the deposition of Sir Solomon de Medina, the present Contractor, and by the accounts of Antonio Alvarez Macharo, who had been Contractor before him, that from the year 1702, to the year 1711, both included, the Duke of Marlborough had received, upon account of the contracts for bread and bread-waggons, the sum of six hundred and sixty-four thousand, eight hundred and fifty-one guilders, and eight stivers, which amounted to sixty-three thousand, three hundred and nine pounds, three shillings, and seven pence. That, some time after this evidence was given, they received, by the hands of James Cragg, Esq; a letter from the Duke of Marlborough, desiring the Commissioners, That, when they made their report, they would lay some facts before the Parliament in a true light. That they thought they could not better do him justice, than in his own words:

Gentlemen,

Hague, Novemb. 10, 1711.

* Having been informed, upon my arrival here yesterday, that Sir Solomon Medina, had acquainted you with my having received several sums of money from him. That it may make the less impression upon you, I would lose no time in letting you know, that this is no more than what has always been allowed as a perquisite to the General or Commander in chief of the army in the Low-Countries, both before the Revolution and since; and I do assure you, at the same time, that whatever sums I have received, on that account, have constantly been applied for the service of the public, in keeping secret correspondence, and getting intelligence of the enemies motions and designs; and it has fallen so short, that I take leave to acquaint you with another article, that has been applied to the same use, and which arises from her Majesty's warrant, whereof the inclosed is a copy, though this does not properly relate to the public accounts, being a free-gift from the foreign troops. You will have observed, by the several establishments, that, before the late King's death, when the Parliament voted forty thousand men for the quota of England in the Low-Countries, twenty-one thousand six hundred and twelve were to be foreigners, and the rest English; for the last they gave ten thousand pounds a year for intelligence, and other contingencies, without account; but his Majesty being sensible, by the experience of the last war, that this sum would not any way answer that service, and being unwilling to apply for any more to the Parliament, he was pleased to order, that the foreign troops should contribute two and a half per Cent. towards it; and, I being then his Ambassador and Commander in chief abroad, he directed me to propose it to them, with an assurance, that they should have no other stoppage made from their pay: This they readily agreed to, and her Majesty was afterwards pleased to confirm it by her warrant, upon my acquainting her with the use it was intended for; and it has accordingly been applied from time to time for intelligence and secret service, with such success, that, next to the blessing of God on the bravery of our troops, we may, in a great measure, attribute most of the advantages of the war in this Country to the timely and good advices procured with the help of this money. And now, Gentlemen, as I have laid the whole matter very fairly before you, and that I hope you will allow, I have served my Queen and Country with that zeal and faithfulness which becomes an honest man, the favour, I am to intreat of you, is, that, when you make your report to the Parliament, you will lay this part before them in its true light, so as that they may see this necessary and important part of the war has been provided for and carried on without any other expence to the public than the ten thousand pounds a year; and I flatter myself, that, when the accounts of the army in Flanders come under your consideration, you will be sensible the service on this side has been carried on with all the economy and good husbandry that was possible. I am.

Gentlemen,

Your most obedient, humble Servant,

MARLBOROUGH.

* Right

1711. ber, the Queen declared in Council, 'that, being informed, an information against the Duke of Marlborough was laid before the House of Commons, by the Commissioners of the public accounts, she thought fit to dismiss him from all his employments, that the matter might take an impartial examination.' This declaration was entered in the Council-books, and the day following it was notified to the Duke, by a letter under her own hand, 'that her intention was to refuse all the employments, she had intrusted him with; complaining, at the same time, of the treatment she had met with.' This appears from the Duke's answer, which he sent by the Countess of Sunderland, one of his daughters:

Madam,

'I am very sensible of the honour your Majesty does me, in dismissing me from your service by a letter of your own hand; though I find by it, that my enemies have been able to prevail with your Majesty to do it in the manner, that is most injurious to me. And, if their malice and inveteracy against me had not been more powerful with them than the consideration of your Majesty's honour and justice, they would not have influenced you to impute the occasion of my dismissal to a false and malicious insinuation contrived by themselves, and made public, when there was no opportunity for me to give in my answer; which, they must needs be conscious, would fully detect the falsehood and malice of their aspersions, and not leave them that handle for bringing your Majesty to such extremities against me.

But I am much more concerned at an expression in your Majesty's letter, which seems to complain of the treatment you had met with. I know not how to understand that word, nor what construction to make of it. I know I have always endeavoured to serve your Majesty faithfully and zealously through a great many undeserved mortifications. But if your Majesty does intend by that expression, to find fault with my not coming to the Cabinet-Council, I am very free to acknowledge, that my duty to your Majesty and my Country would not give me leave to join in the counsel of a man, who, in my opinion, puts your Majesty upon all manner of extremities. And it is not my opinion only, but the opinion of all mankind, that the friendship of France must needs be destructive to your Majesty, there being in that Court a root of enmity irreconcilable to your Majesty's Government, and the Religion of these Kingdoms. I wish your Majesty may never find the want of so faithful a servant, as I have always endeavoured to approve myself to you. I am, with the greatest duty and submission,

Madam,

Your Majesty's most dutiful, and obedient subject,

MARLBOROUGH.

'Right trusty and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor, we greet you well. Whereas, pursuant to the direction you have received in that behalf, you have agreed, with the persons authorized to treat with you, for the taking into our service a certain number of foreign troops, to act in conjunction with the forces of our Allies, that there be reserved two and a half per Cent. out of all monies payable to, and for the said troops, as well for their pay and entertainment, as on any other account, towards defraying such extraordinary contingent expences relating to them, as cannot otherwise be provided for. Now, we do hereby approve and confirm all such agreements as you have, or may hereafter make, for reserving the said two and a half per Cent. accordingly; and do likewise hereby authorize and direct the Pay-master General of our forces for the time being, or his Deputy, to make the said deduction of two and a half per Cent. pursuant thereunto, out of all monies he shall be directed to issue, for the use of the foreign troops in our pay, and thereupon to pay over the same, from time to time, according to such warrants, and in such proportions as you shall direct, for which this shall be to you, and to all others whom it may concern, a sufficient warrant and direction.

formed, the great sums, annually paid to the Duke on account of the contracts for bread, could never be esteemed legal or warrantable perquisites: Nor did they find, that any other English General in the Levo-Countries, or elsewhere, ever claimed or received such perquisites: And, if any instance should be produced, they apprehended it would be no justification of it, because the public, or the troops, must necessarily suffer, in proportion to every such perquisite; and how agreeable this practice was to that economy, with which the service in Flanders was said to be carried on, remained yet to be explained. That the great caution and secrecy, with which this money was constantly received, gave reason to suspect, that it was not thought a justifiable perquisite; for Mr Cardonnel, the Duke's Secretary, and Auditor of the bread-account, had declared on oath, that he never knew or heard of any such perquisite, till the late rumour of Sir Solomon de Medina's evidence before the Commissioners. That, by the contracts for bread and bread-waggons, the General appeared to be the sole check on the Contractors, he was to take care, that the terms of these contracts were duly performed; he was to judge of all deductions to be made from allowance to the Contractors; And whether in such circumstance he could receive any gratuity or perquisite from the Contractors, without a breach of his trust, they did not presume to determine. That the General might with equal reason claim a perquisite for every other Contractor relating to the army, as for those of the bread and bread-waggons; but, his Grace being silent as to this, the Commissioners ought to suppose he had not received any such allowance. As to the deduction of two and a half per Cent. from the foreign troops, the Commissioners observed: 'That the warrant for it had been kept dormant for nine years, and the deduction concealed so long from the knowledge of Parliament; for which his Grace had not assigned sufficient reasons. That the calling it a Free Gift was inconsistent with the words of the warrant, which expresses an agreement, and with that part of his Grace's letter, which took notice, that 1711. The removal of the Duke of Marlborough was thought very extraordinary, after such long and eminent services; and was so little expected, that those, who looked for precedents, could find none since the disgrace of Belisarius, in Justinian's time. The only thing pretended to excuse it was, his being considered as the head of those, who opposed the peace, on which the Court seemed to set their hearts.

The Duke of Somerset continuing to oppose the schemes of the new Ministers, it was also resolved, in a consultation about the middle of December, to remove him. But the great friendship between the Queen and his duchess (who was Groom of the Stole, and first Lady of the Bed chamber) prevented that resolution from being then put in practice (1). The Duke was not removed till the 26th of January, and, though endeavours were used to the contrary, his Duchesses was by the Queen continued in her places, which she offered to resign.

The Duke of Marlborough's disgrace was attended with other removes, and made way for several promotions. The Duke of Ormond, with the first regiment of foot-guards, was appointed Commander in chief of all the forces in Great-Britain, and soon after, upon the Elector of Hanover's refusal to command the Queen's forces in Flanders, Captain-General of all her forces at home and abroad. The Earl Rivers was made Master-General of the Ordnance, and Colonel of the Royal regiment of horse-guards. The Duke of Beaufort was appointed Captain of the Band of Pensioners, and Brigadier Hill

Lieutenant of the Tower, in the room of Lieutenant-General Cadogan. The Countess of Sunderland and the Lady Railton, two of the Duke of Marlborough's daughters, resigned their places of Ladies of the Bed-chamber.

The Ministers, finding the majority of the House of Lords could not be brought to favour their designs, resolved to make an experiment, which none of our Princes had ventured on in former times. A resolution was taken up very suddenly of making twelve Peers all at once, which was accordingly done on the last day of December, by calling up by writ to the House of Lords James Lord Compton, eldest son to the Earl of Northampton, and Charles Lord Bruce, eldest son to the Earl of Ailesbury; and creating by patent ten new Peers of Great-Britain; George Hay, or Lord Dapplin, of the Kingdom of Scotland, the Lord-Treasurer's son-in-law, Baron Hay, of Bedwarden, in the County of Hereford; the Lord Viscount Windor, of Ireland, Baron Montjoy, of the Isle of Wight, in the County of Southampton; Henry Paget, son to the Lord Paget, Baron Burton, of Burton, in the County of Stafford; Sir Thomas Mansel, Baron Mansel, of Margam, in the County of Glamorgan; Sir Thomas Willoughby, Baron Middleton, of Middleton, in the County of Warwick; Sir Thomas Trevor, Baron Trevor, of Brombam, in the County of Bedford; George Granville, Baron Lansdowne, of Bideford, in the County of Devon; Samuel Masham, Baron Masham, of Oates, in the County of Essex; Thomas Foley, Baron Foley, of Kidderminster, in the County

he, being Ambassador and General, stipulated for this very stoppage by the late King's order. That therefore they were of opinion, that a deduction, so made, was public money, and ought to be accounted for in the same manner as other public money. That the ten thousand pounds granted yearly for the Contingencies of the army was at first intended by Parliament for the service of forty thousand men, without distinction; and was so far from having always been thought exempt from account, as the Duke had suggested, that in a Privy-Seal, dated March 5, 1706, there was a clause to release and discharge the Duke of Marlborough from a sum of seven thousand, four hundred and ninety nine pounds, nineteen shillings and ten pence, part of this money; which shewed, he would otherwise have been accountable for it. But that they no where met with any mention of this deduction of two and a half per Cent. and therefore presumed, the reason, why it had never been brought to an account, was, what his Grace suggested, that he never considered it as public Money. In the next place, the Commissioners submitted it to the House, whether the warrant, produced to justify this deduction was legal, and duly counter-signed? Or, whether, admitting it to be so, either the stoppage, or the payment, had been regularly made? That the warrant directed, that it should be stopped in the hands of the Pay-master, or his Deputy, and issued thence by the Duke's order only. But this method did not appear, by the Pay-master's accounts, to have been at all pursued; so far otherwise, that the payments to the foreign troops were always made complete, and their receipts always taken in full, without any notice of a deduction. That when any part of the ten thousand pounds, Contingent-Money, was drawn out of the Pay-master's hands, for any secret service, the General's warrant, and his Secretary's receipts, were the Pay-master's vouchers. But that Mr Cardonnell, as he declared on oath, never gave any receipt for any part of that two and a half per Cent. nor did Mr Bridges, as he also declared on oath, ever give any warrant for that purpose, or know any thing, as Pay-master-general, of this deduction. That, if Mr Sweet, at Amsterdam, had taken upon himself to transact the disposition of this two and a half per Cent. with the Duke of Marlborough, the Commissioners were of opinion, that he ought to have transmitted constant accounts of it to Mr Bridges, whose agent he only was; and not to have negotiated to large sums of public money in so clandestine a manner. That, by the warrant, this deduction was referred for the defraying extraordinary contingent expenses of the troops, from whom it was stopped: And, if the whole had been employed in secret correspondence and intelligence, there must have been some neglect of the other services, for which it was originally designed: And such a disposition, being in no sort authorized by the warrant, was a misapplication of it. Besides, the Commissioners apprehended, that the article for secret service, to which this deduction was pretended to have been applied, was always included in the ten thousand pounds above-mentioned, for the contingencies of the army; and, if so, the whole remained to be accounted for; which, on a computation made from the whole sum of eleven millions, two hundred ninety four thousand, six hundred and fifty nine pounds, four shillings, and a penny half-penny, paid by Great-Britain, to, and for all the foreign forces, since the 23d day of December, 1701, amounted to two hundred eighty two thousand three hundred sixty six pounds, nine shillings, and sevenpence. And on a computation made from the sum of seven millions, one hundred and seven thousand, eight hundred seventy-three pounds, eighteen shillings, and eleven pence half-penny, paid to, and for the foreign forces since the time aforesaid (exclusive of Italy, Spain, and Portugal) amounted to one hundred, and seventy seven thousand, six hundred ninety five pounds, seventeen shillings, and three farthings.

1711. County of Worcester; and Allen Batburs, Baron Batburs, of Batbursden, in the County of Bedford. Sir Miles Wharton had been offered a Peerage; but he thought it looked like the serving a turn, and that, whereas Peers used to be made for services, which they had done, he should be made for services to be done by him; and therefore excused himself from accepting it; and the favourite's husband, Mr Masbam, was put in his room. And whereas formerly Jesseries had the vanity to be made a Peer, while he was Chief-Justice, which had not been practised for some ages; yet the precedent set by him was followed, and Trevor, Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas, was now advanced to be a Peer. This creation of Peers was looked upon as an undoubted part of the prerogative; so that there was no ground in law to oppose the receiving the new Lords into the House; nor was it possible to raise in the antient Peers a sense of the indignity, which was now put upon their House; since the Court did by this openly declare, that they were to be kept in absolute submission and obedience.

1711-12. On the second of January the twelve new Peers were introduced into the House of Lords without any opposition; and, the Court-party having by this reinforcement, and by the coming up of the Scots Lords, got the majority, the House acquiesced in the Queen's fullen answer to their late address, importing, 'That her Majesty thought her speech to both Houses would have given satisfaction to every body; and, that she had given instructions to her Plenipotentiaries, according to the desires of that address.' This done, the Lord-Keeper delivered to the House a message from the Queen, 'That, having matters of great importance to communicate to both Houses of Parliament, she desired the Lords to adjourn immediately to the 14th, the same day, to which the Commons had adjourned themselves.' This occasioned a very warm debate. It was said, that the Queen could not send a message to any one House to adjourn; when the like message was not sent to both Houses: That the pleasure of the Prince in convening, dissolving, proroguing, or ordering the adjournment of Parliaments, was always directed to both Houses, but never to any one House, unless the same intimation was made at the same time to the other. That the consequence of this, if allowed, might be the ordering one House to adjourn, while the other was left still to sit; and this might end in a total disjointing of the Constitution. The resolution however was carried for adjourning by the weight of the twelve new Peers. It is true, the odds were thirteen; but that was, because one of the Peers, to the October Club) was published, wherein he and his Duchefs are both abused and insulted. It is there said, 'It would have been a master-piece of prudence, in this case, to have made a friend of an enemy: But, whether it were ever attempted, is now too late to inquire. All accommodation was rendered desperate, by an unlucky proceeding some months ago at Windsor, which was a declaration of war too frank and generous, for that situation of affairs, and, I am told, was not approved by a certain great Minister*. It was obvious to suppose, that in a particular, where the honour and interest of a husband were so closely united with those of a wife, he might be sure of her utmost endeavours for his protection, though she never loved nor esteemed him. The danger of losing power, favour, profit, and a shelter from domestic tyranny, were strong incitements to stir up a working brain, early practised in all the arts of intriguing.'

This pamphlet is lately reprinted in Vol. VII. of Swift's Miscellanies, to which is prefixed a preface, setting forth: 'That about the year, when her late Majesty, of blessed memory, thought proper to change her Ministry, and brought in Mr Harley, Mr St John, Sir Simon Harcourt, and some others, the first of these being made an Earl, and Lord-Treasurer, he was soon after blamed by his friends, for not making a general sweep of all the Whigs, as the latter did of their adversaries upon her Majesty's death, when they came into power. At that time a great number of Parliament-men, amounting to above two hundred, grew so warm upon the slowness of the Treasurer in this part, that they formed themselves into a body, under the name of the October Club, and had many Meetings, to consult upon some methods, that might spur on those in power, so that they might make a quicker dispatch, in removing all of the Whig leaven from the employments they still possessed. To prevent the ill consequences of this discontent among so many worthy Members, the rest of the Ministry joined with the Treasurer, partly to pacify, and partly to divide those, who were in greater haste than moderate men thought convenient. It was well known, that the supposed Author † met a considerable number of this Club in a public house, where he convinced them very plainly of the Treasurer's sincerity, with many of those very reasons, which are urged in the following discourse, besides some others, which were not so proper to appear at that time in print. The Treasurer alledged in his defence, that such a treatment would not consist with prudence, because there were many employments to be bestowed, which required skill and practice: That several Gentlemen, who possessed them, had been long versed, very loyal to her Majesty, had never been violent Party-men, and were ready to fall into all honest measures for the service of their Queen and Country. But however, as offices became vacant, he would humbly recommend to her Majesty such Gentlemen, whose principles, with regard both to Church and State, his friends would approve of, and he would be ready to accept their recommendations. Thus, the Earl proceeded in procuring employments for those, who deserved them by their honesty, and abilities to execute them. However, the Gentlemen of this Club still continued uneasy, that no quicker progress was made in removals, until those, who were least violent, began to soften a little, or, by dividing them, the whole affair dropped. During this difficulty, we have been assured, that the following discourse was very seasonably published with great success, shewing the difficulties, that the Earl of Oxford lay under, and his real desire, that all persons in employment should be true loyal Churchmen, zealous for her Majesty's honour and safety, as well as for the Succession in the House of Hanover, if the Queen should happen to die without issue.'

1711-12. who had a proxy, without reflecting on it, went away when the proxies were called for (1).

The Court having received no news of the opening the Congress, Councils were held on Saturday and Sunday the 12th and 13th of January, in which it was debated, Whether the Parliament should sit, or be desired further to adjourn themselves? And, it being carried for the adjournment, a message was on the 14th sent to both Houses, importing, "That her Majesty fully determined to have been personally present in Parliament that day; but, being prevented by a sudden return of her gout, her Majesty, in hopes she might, by the blessing of God, be able to speak to both her Houses of Parliament on Thursday next, the 17th of this instant January, desired them to adjourn to that day." Both houses readily complied with this message; but, before the same was delivered by Mr St John to the Commons, they ordered their Speaker to issue out writs, for the electing nine Members in the room of those called up to the House of Peers.

Prince Eugene comes to England. Burnet. Hist. of Europe.

At this time Prince Eugene of Savoy was sent by the Emperor to England, to try, if it was possible to engage our Court to go on with the war, offering a new scheme, by which his Imperial Majesty took a much larger share of it on himself, than the late Emperor would bear. The Prince having resolved to embark for England, notwithstanding the endeavours used at the Hague to keep him on the other side of the water, he applied to the Earl of Strafford, who wrote the following letter to Captain Desborough, Commander of the Fubbs Yacht:

S I R,

The Earl of Strafford's letter to the Captain of the Fubbs Yacht Jan. 3. N. S.

"Prince Eugene having desired my orders to you to carry him over, you know, I do not pretend to command any of her Majesty's Yachts, without her special command. You know your orders, and how far they authorize you to carry over the Prince. You know the respect and consideration due to the Prince, and his great merit; therefore, it is needless for me to tell you what respect and consideration you ought to shew him. I can assure you, I have a particular respect and esteem for him; and I shall always be glad to do the "Prince, all the service that lies in my power. 1711-12.

"I am

Your most humble Servant,
STRAFFORD.

Though this letter rather implied a tacit prohibition than a positive order, yet, the Captain being left to his own discretion, he thought it his duty, as he could not but esteem it an honour, to carry over so great a man as Prince Eugene, who, on the 8th of January, N. S. embarked at the Brill (with his Nephew, the Chevalier de Savoye, Son to the Count de Solifons, Count de la Corfana, and Count Cornelius of Nassau) and on the 1st of January, O. S. arrived at London, where being informed, that he could not easily get all the necessary carriages for his attendants, he was persuaded to go up the Temes. The next day he received, on board the Yacht, near the Bury of the Nore, an account of the Duke of Mariborough's being removed from all his employments, at which he was extremely concerned. Upon advice, that he was coming up by water, the Government sent down Mr Drummond, a broken Merchant or Stock-Jobber, a creature of the Lord-Treasurer, and Mr Brinsden, an Occultist, a private agent to Mr St John, to attend, or rather to be spies, upon the Prince. Brinsden being detained at Greenwich by an accidental sprain of his foot, Drummond only waited on the Prince with a barge, which carried him from Gravesend to Whitehall; from whence he went in an Hackney-Coach to Leicester-House, which Count Gallas, before his departure, had prepared for his reception. Immediately, upon his arrival, the Prince caused it to be notified to the Treasurer, the Secretaries of State, and the foreign Ministers; and some of these waited upon him the same evening; as did the Duke of Mariborough, to whom the Prince shewed a distinguished respect, and with whom he afterwards passed most of his time, notwithstanding the caution, which Mr Drummond had given him, either from himself, or from those, who sent him, That he left he saw the Duke of Mariborough, the better: To which the Prince answered, 'That, as the Ministry might depend upon it, he would not cabal against them; so he hoped they did not expect, he should forbear his usual familiarity with his good friend the Duke of Mariborough.'

(1) This message for adjourning seems only to have been sent to try the strength of both parties, Mr Secretary St John having been heard to say in the Court of Requests, as soon as the debate was over, 'That, if those twelve had not been enough, they would have given them [the Whigs] another dozen.' However, very strong reflections were made, both in print and in most conversations, on that step, many not scrupling to say, 'That, tho' the Queen had an undoubted right to create as many Peers as she pleased, yet her Ministers might be called to an account for advising her to abuse that right. That peace and war were also the prerogatives of the Crown; and yet the engaging in a ruinous war, or making a treacherous peace, are things, which no Minister ever did, and escaped uncensured or unpunished. That the creating twelve Peers to serve a turn, was, in effect, making a House of Peers a property to the Court, and taking away a negative upon the Crown; which would render our liberties precarious. That it could not be denied, that the new-made Peers were men of noble fortunes; and that some of them had shewn a commendable zeal for the present establishment; but who would secure us, that hereafter such a number should not be made of men of a quite different character? And, in short, that this was a precedent, which might be made use of to inflame the Nation, and to introduce a Popish Pretender, or the Popish Religion. That if in the Reign of such a Queen this abuse of the prerogative was so much exclaimed against, how much greater would the cry have been, had it been in a suspicious Reign? Whereas now they have an unexceptionable instance to produce, to silence any clamour or noise. That it was impossible for men, who owed so much to her Majesty for her share in the late Revolution, to oppose a prerogative, that had never been disputed, because never used in that manner: But had any Prince, who had merited less of his Country, begun such a thing, it would, no doubt, have been opposed, and perhaps denied him.' But, after all, the severest reflection upon the twelve new Peers was made by the Earl of Wharton, who, the same day they were introduced, when the question about adjourning was going to be put, asked one of them, Whether they voted by their Foreman? Thereby computing them to a petty jury. Bjor.

1711-12. Marlborough.¹ On the 6th of January the Prince received a compliment from the Treasurer, which he instantly returned by the Baron de Hobendorf. The same morning, after a visit from Mr Secretary St John, Count Maffei, Monsieur Hoffman, and some other foreign Ministers, the Duke of Montague, the Earl of Herford, the Generals, Lumley, Webb, Palmer, Harvey, and several other persons of distinction, waited upon him. The same afternoon he sent a Gentleman with a compliment to the Dukes of Buckingham and Ormond, Earl Pawlet, and some other Officers of State; and about seven o'clock in the evening went to St James's-House, where he was introduced by Mr St John, to a private audience of the Queen, at which none were present but the Treasurer and Mr Secretary. After a short complement, which her Majesty answered very graciously, he delivered to her a letter from the Emperor, which he desired her to peruse, because it contained the substance of his errand. After reading the letter, the Queen told the Prince, 'That she was sorry the state of her health did not permit her to speak with his Highness as often as otherwise she should be glad to do; but that she had ordered those two Gentlemen (there present) to receive his proposals, and confer with him as frequently as he should think proper.' In the mean time people were variously affected by his coming to England at this critical juncture. All the Whigs, as well as some Tories, who began to be jealous, that a peace would be concluded upon dishonourable terms, were very glad of his arrival, hoping, that, by the proposals he was said to bring from the Emperor, he would prevail, if not to break off the present Negotiation, at least to engage Great-Britain to make early preparations to carry on the war, as the most effectual means to obtain a safe and honourable peace. Upon this consideration, and the great fame of his actions, multitudes of people crowded to see him, and with loud acclamations attended him wherever he went. On the other hand, the friends of France, and of the Pretender, who were equally desirous of a peace, upon any conditions, being apprehensive, that he would blast their expectations, could not forbear shewing their discontent; and a rude rabble committed some disorders in Leicester-Fields, the second night after his arrival. A more flagrant instance of the malice of that party was seen on the 8th of January in the Post-Boy, where an advertisement was inserted, infamously reflecting on the Countess of Soissons, the Prince's Mother; which scandalous affront the Prince overlooked with his usual magnanimity; and by his discreet carriage convinced all, that he was not come to meddle with intestine divisions, but rather to endeavour to bring the leading men of both parties to such a temper, as might conduce to remove any difficulties, that might obstruct the carrying on the common cause. This endeared him to every body, and gained him more respect, than was ever shewn in England to any foreign Prince, so that, for two whole months, the Nobility and Gentry of both parties vied with one another, who should entertain him (1).

By this time, the Parliament being met at Westminster, a message from the Queen was delivered to both Houses. That to the Commons was as follows:

'I Her Majesty not having recovered strength enough, since the return of the gout, to be present that day in person; and being unwilling, that the public business should receive any delay, thinks fit to communicate to them the substance of what she intended to have spoke.

II. At

(1) The persons, who distinguished themselves by this generous emulation, were the Dukes of Marlborough, Ormond, Buckingham, Montague, Schomberg, Devonshire, Shrewsbury, Richmond, and Grafton; the Earls Pawlet, Sunderland, Portland, Oxford, Rivers, Wharton, Berkeley, Stair, and Orkney; the Lords Lexington, Ashburnham, Hallifax, and North and Grey; Sir Thomas Hanmer; the honourable Mr Henry Boyle; Mr Secretary St John; General Palmer; the foreign Ministers then in London; Dr Garth and Dr Radcliffe, two of the most eminent Physicians. It was then currently reported, that, when the Prince dined with the Lord-Treasurer, the latter, among other compliments, told his Highness, 'That he looked upon that day as the happiest in the whole course of his life, since he had the honour to see in his house the greatest Captain of this age.' To which the Prince replied, 'That, if he were, he was obliged to his Lordship for it;' alluding to the Earl's being the author of the Duke of Marlborough's disgrace, which rid him of a competitor in military glory. It was observed the Prince was not entertained by the Lord Dartmouth.

On the 14th of January, Sir Alexander Cairnes, Bart. and Sir Theodore Janssen, two of the most eminent Merchants of the City of London, who had contributed most to the Loan made some years before to the Emperor, upon the security of his revenues in Silesia, for the use of the Prince of Savoy, waited upon him with a compliment from that Company. The Prince gave them a very kind reception, and told them, 'He was very much obliged to them, since the raising of the siege of Turin, and the successes that followed, were, under God, chiefly owing to the seasonable supply he received from England.' Those Gentlemen answered, 'That, when they made that Loan, they had not so much in view the improvement of their money, as the honour of being serviceable to the common cause, and of having an opportunity to shew their respect for a Prince of so great a reputation; and as they accounted themselves particularly obliged to his Highness's integrity for the punctual payment of their interest and principal; so, if, in the course of this war, his Highness should have occasion for any greater sums, their Company would readily advance them upon his Highness's single security.' They concluded with desiring him to accept of a small entertainment, which their Company designed to give him in the City, and to fix a day, when it should best suit with his convenience; which he promised to do. The Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen, having notice of this invitation, and designing likewise to shew their respect to the Prince, it was proposed amongst them, on the 15th of January, that, since most of their Court were concerned in the Silesian Company, they ought, for greater magnificence sake, to make but one united entertainment. The motion was approved; but one of the Court having suggested, 'That they would do well to know, how the Queen would take such an invitation to Prince Eugene;' it was thought proper to send two Aldermen to the Earl of Dartmouth, to know the Queen's pleasure; but, there being, it seems, some want of formality in the message, his Lordship wrote the following letter to the Lord-Mayor:

My Lord,

Whitehall, Jan. 15, 1711-12.

"Two of the Court of Aldermen having brought a verbal message to be delivered to her Majesty, which O o o " was,

1711-12.

II. At the opening of this Session, her Majesty acquainted the Parliament, that both time and place were appointed for the meeting of the Plenipotentiaries of all the Confederates, to treat with those of the enemy concerning a general peace; and also expressed the care, which she intended to take of all her Allies, and the strict union, in which she proposed to join with them, in order to obtain a good peace, and to guaranty and support it, when obtained.

III. Her Majesty can now tell them, that her Plenipotentiaries are arrived at Utrecht, and have begun, in pursuance of their instructions, to concert the most proper ways of procuring a just Satisfaction to all in Alliance with her, according to their several treaties, and particularly with relation to Spain and the West-Indies.

IV. You may depend on her Majesty's communicating to her Parliament the terms of peace, before the same shall be concluded.

V. The world will now see, how groundless those reports are, which have been spread abroad by men of evil intentions, to serve the worst designs, as if a separate peace had been treated, for which there has not been the least colour given.

VI. Her Majesty's Ministers have directions to propose, that a day may be fixed for the finishing, as was done for the commencement of this treaty; and, in the mean time, all the preparations are hastening for an early campaign.

VII. The zeal, which this House has already expressed, was a sure pledge, that they will proceed in giving the necessary dispatch to the Supplies.

VIII. Her Majesty finds it necessary to observe, how great licence is taken in publishing false and scandalous libels, such as are a reproach to any Government. This evil seems to be grown too strong for the laws now in force; it is therefore recommend to you to find a remedy equal to the mischief.

The message, the Queen sent to the House of Lords, was exactly the same with that sent to the Commons; except only, that instead of the seventh paragraph, about the Supply, her Majesty took notice of the affair relating to the Scotch Peers, in the following words: 'There is one thing in which her Majesty's subjects of the North part of this Kingdom are extremely concerned: The distinction such of them who were Peers of Scotland before the Union must lie under, if the prerogative of the Crown is strictly barred against them alone. This is a matter which sensibly affects her Majesty, and she therefore lays it before this House, earnestly desiring their advice and concurrence in finding out the best method of settling this affair, to the satisfaction of the whole Kingdom.'

The House of Lords agreed to an address, The Lords thanking her Majesty for communicating these things to them, and for the promises she had made them, repeating the very words in which they were made. It was moved to add the words, most dutifully of thanks. Pr. H. L. Pr. H. C. conform to her Alliance; but it was said, that the Queen assured them of that, and therefore the repeating these words would seem to intimate a distrust, so that was not carried. But, because there seemed to be an ambiguity in the mention made of Spain and the West-Indies, the House expressed in what sense they understood them, by adding these words: Which are of so great concern to the Safety and Commerce of your Majesty's Kingdoms. The Commons made an address to the same purpose, in which they only named Spain and West-Indies.

The Duke of Devonshire, pursuant to the motion he had made before the recess, having prepared a bill for giving precedence to the Duke of Cambridge, the Lord-Treasurer was resolved to prevent him, and offered January 17 a bill, giving precedence to the whole Electoral Family, as the children and nephews of the Crown; and it was intimated, that bills relating to honours and precedence ought to come from the Crown: The Duke of Devonshire would make no dispute on this head; if the thing passed, he acquiesced in the manner of passing it, only he thought it lay within the authority of the House. On this occasion, the Court seemed, even to an affectation, to shew a particular zeal in promoting this bill; for it passed through both Houses in two days. Notwithstanding this haste, the Court did not seem to design any such bill, till it was proposed by others, out of whose hands they thought fit to take it. The act was sent over to Hanover, by Mr Thomas Harley, in order to raise favourable thoughts there of the Ministry. But that Court saw through these thin disguises, which were contradicted by the open countenance to those who were no well-wishers to the Protestant Succession, and the discouragement to its best friends. The Lords entered upon the consideration of the paragraph in the Queen's message, relating to the Peers of Scotland. The Court proposed that an expedient might be found that the Peers of Scotland should not sit among them by Election, but by Descent, in case the rest of the Peers of that nation should consent to it. A debate followed concerning the articles of the Union, which of them were fundamental and not alterable; it was said, that by the Union no private right could be taken away, but by the consent of the persons concerned; therefore no alteration could be

Upon the receipt of this letter, the Court of Aldermen did not think fit to make any further steps in that matter, to the great disappointment and mortification of most of the Citizens.

It was afterwards debated, whether an alteration might be made with this condition, in case they should consent to it; or whether the first rise to any such alteration ought not to be given, by a previous desire. This was not so subject to an ill management; the Court studied to have a subsequent consent received as sufficient; but a previous desire was insisted, as visibly fairer and juster.

Burnet.

The Scotch Lords, feeling no redress to their complaint, but that the Peers adhered to their late judgment, seemed resolved to come no more to sit in the House of Lords; but the Court was sensible, that their strength, in that House, consisted chiefly in them and the new Peers; for which reason pains were taken, and secret forcible arguments were used to them, which proved so effectual, that after a few days absence they came back, and continued, during the Session, to sit in the House. They gave out, that an expedient would be found, that would be to the satisfaction of the Peers of Scotland; but, nothing of that appearing, it was concluded, that the satisfaction was private and personal. The great arrear, into which all the regular payments, both of the household and of salaries and pensions, was left to run, made it to be generally believed, that the income for the Civil-List, though it exceeded the Establishment very much, was applied to other payments, which the Ministers durst not own. And, though secret practice on Members had been for a great while too common, yet it was believed, that it was at this time managed with an extraordinary profusion.

pole's case

Ibid.

The House of Commons entered on the observations of the Commissioners for taking the publick accounts, which had been laid before them on the 21st of December; and they began with what related to Mr Walpole, whom they resolved to put out of the way of disturbing them in the House. The charge against him was thus: Mr Walpole, as Secretary of War, had contracted with some persons for forage to the horse that lay in Scotland. He, finding the Contractors made some gain by it, named a friend of his own to be joined with them, that he might have a share of the gain: But the others were unwilling the secret of their management should be known; so, instead of admitting him, offered him five hundred guineas for his share, which he accepted, and the money was remitted. But the Contractors, not knowing how to direct to him, addressed their bill to Mr Walpole, who endorsed it, and the person concerned received the money; this was found out, and Walpole was charged with it as a bribe, that he had taken for his own use, for making the contract. Both the persons that remitted 1711-12, the money, and he who received it, were examined, and affirmed, that Walpole was neither directly nor indirectly concerned in the matter; but the House insisted upon his having endorsed the bill, and not only voted this a corruption, but sent him to the Tower, and expelled him the House. Not content with this, when Mr Walpole was afterwards chosen again for Lynn Regis, the Commons, upon a petition against his election, resolved, 'That Robert Walpole, Esq; having been, this Session of Parliament, committed a prisoner to the Tower of London, and expelled this House, for an high breach of trust in the execution of his Office, and notorious corruption, when Secretary of War, was, and is incapable of being elected a Member to serve in this present Parliament (1).

The next attack was on the Duke of Marlborough. On the 24th of January, his affair was debated. The money received from Sir Solomon Medina was said to be a fraud, and the deduction out of the pay of the foreign troops was said to be public money, and to be accounted for. The debate held long. It appeared, that, during the former war, King William had fifty thousand pounds a year for contingencies; which were often reckoned to have cost much more. The contingency was that service, which could be brought to no certain head, and was chiefly for procuring intelligence. The Duke of Marlborough had only ten thousand pounds, for the contingencies; which, with all the other items joined together, amounted but to thirty thousand pounds, a sum much inferior to what had been formerly given; and yet, with this moderate expence, he had procured so good intelligence, that he was never surprized, and no party he sent out was ever intercepted or cut off. By means of this intelligence, all his designs were so well concerted, that he succeeded in every one of them; and by many instances the exactness of his intelligence was fully demonstrated. It was proved, both by witnesses, and by formal attestations from Holland, that, ever since the year 1672, the Jews had made the like present to the General of the States army; and it was understood as a perquisite belonging to that command. No bargain was made with the Jews for the English troops, that made by the States being applied to them; so that it appeared, that the making such a present to the General was customary; but that was denied. So it was resolved at last by two hundred and seventy voices against a hundred and sixty-five, 'That the taking several sums of money annually, by the Duke of Marlborough, from the Contractors for furnishing the bread and bread-waggons for the army in the Low-Countries was unwar-

(1) This proceeding against him was examined in the Postscript to the second edition of Mr Walpole's Case in a letter from a Tory Member of Parliament to his friend in the country. The author of this piece considers, 'Whether Mr Walpole was, at the time of his election, incapable of being elected a Member to serve in Parliament; and, if he was capable, how far a second expulsion was just and reasonable?' And then shews, that such an incapacity cannot arise either from the tenour and words of the writ, nor from Mr Walpole's being a prisoner in the Tower, nor from his having been expelled the House. And, upon the whole, he declares, that if Mr Walpole 'was to be tried by the law of the land, or by the law and usage of Parliament, or by any known rules of reason and justice, there was no foundation to declare, that he was incapable of being elected a Member to serve in the present Parliament: And that it will be thought an hardship of the first impression, that for a slight offence, proved by no direct evidence, vindicated by positive evidence upon oath, a Gentleman should be censured in the strongest terms, imprisoned, and expelled the House, and afterwards expelled again.'

After which, tho' the Duke had the Queen's warrant to receive it, they also voted, that the two and a half per Cent. deducted out of the pay of the foreign troops was unwarrantable, and to be accounted for. These resolutions being laid before the Queen, she answered, 'I have a great regard for whatever is presented to me by my Commons, and will do my part to redress what you complain of.' To colour this censure, the Commons voted 'that the two and a half per Cent. which had, or ought to have been made from the pay for foreign forces, be continued for the year 1712, and applied for the service of the war.' And it is observable, that though some of the foreign Princes, who had troops in the Queen's pay, did some time after order their Ministers in London to represent, 'that the two and a half per Cent. was their own money, but they were willing to allow it as a free gift to the Duke of Ormond, as they had done to the Duke of Marlborough;' which representation seemed to be a full justification of the latter: The Queen however was prevailed upon to send an order to the Attorney-General to prosecute the Duke, for the fifteen thousand pounds, which was deducted yearly out of the pay of the foreign troops, for the receiving whereof he had her own warrant.

The Court espoused these resolutions of the Commons with great zeal, and paid well for the great majority by which they were carried. Upon this, many virulent Writers (whether set on to it, or officiously studying to merit by it, did not appear) threw out, in many defamatory libels, a great deal of malice against the Duke of Marlborough: They compared him to Cataline, to Craſſus, to Antony, and studied to represent him as a robber of the Nation, and as a public enemy. This gave indignation to all, who had a sense of gratitude, or a regard to justice. In one of these scurrilous papers, penned on design to raise the rabble against him, a period began thus, He was perhaps once fortunate. This passage being mentioned* to Prince Eugene, he pleasantly said, it was the greatest commendation could be given him, since he was always successful: So this implied, that in one single instance he might be fortunate, but that all his other successes were owing to his conduct. It was answered, that single instance must then be, his escaping out of the hands of the party, who took him as he was going down the Maese in a boat (1).

Secret inquiries were made, in order to the laying more load on the Duke of Marlborough, and to see whether poſts in the army, or in the guards were sold by him; but nothing could be found: He had suffered a practice to go on, that had begun in the late King's time, of letting Officers sell their Commissions; but he had never taken any part of the price to himself: Few thought that he had been so clear in that matter; for it was the only thing, in which now his enemies were confident, that some discoveries would have been made to his prejudice; so that the endeavours used, to search into those matters, producing nothing, raised the reputation of his incorrupt Administration, more than all his well-wishers could have expected.

In this whole transaction was seen a new scene of ingratitude acted in a most imprudent manner; when the man, to whom the Nation owed more than it had ever done in any age to any subject, or perhaps to any person whatever, was, for some months, pursued with so much malice. He bore all with silence and patience, appearing always calm and cheerful: And, though he prepared a full vindication of himself, yet he delayed publishing it, till the Nation should return to its senses, and be capable of examining those matters in a more impartial manner.

Another affair of a more public nature was now taken into consideration by the Commons, namely, the Barrier Treaty with the States. Both Houses had, in the year 1709, agreed in an address to the Queen, that the Protestant Succession might be secured by a guaranty in the treaty of peace; and this was settled at the Hague to be one of the preliminaries. But, when an end was put to the Conferences at Gertruydenberg, the Lord Townshend was ordered to set on a treaty with the States to that effect. They entertained it very readily; but at the same time proposed, that England should enter into a guaranty with them, to maintain their Barrier, which consisted of some places, which they were to garrison, the Sovereignty of which was still in the Crown of Spain; and of other places, which had not belonged to that Crown at the death of King Charles the second, but had been taken in the progress of the war; for, by their agreements with Great-Britain, they bore the charge of the sieges, and so the places taken were to belong to them. These were chiefly Lisle, Tournay, Menin, and Doway, and were to be kept still by them. But as for those places, which, from the time of the treaty of the Pyrenees belonged to the Spaniards, they had been so ill-looked after by the Spanish Governors of Flanders, who were more intent upon enriching themselves, and keeping a magnificent Court at Brussels, than on preserving the country, that neither were the

(1) Among the libels against the Duke was published, by either Prior or Swift, A Fable of the Widow and her Cat, the last Stanza of which is as follows:

IX. So flagrant is thy insolence,
So vile thy breach of trust is,
That longer with thee to dispense,
Were want of power, or want of sense:
Here, Towzer, — Do him justice.

It is no wonder the Duke of Marlborough was thus used, since the Earl of Nottingham himself did not escape for opposing the Negotiations of peace. It was not only said, that he did so, because he was refused the Privy-Seal, but the following advertisement was inserted in the Post-Boy, of December 6, viz. 'Whereas a very tall, thin, swarthy complexioned man, between sixty and seventy years of age, wearing a brown coat, with little sleeves, and long pockets, has lately withdrawn himself from his friends, being seduced by wicked persons to follow ill courses: These are to give notice, That whoever shall discover him, shall have ten shillings reward; or, if he will voluntarily return, he shall be kindly received by his friends, who will not reproach him for past follies, provided he give good assurances, that, for the future, he will firmly adhere to the Church of England, in which he was so carefully educated by his honest parents.' There were also lampoons, and other libels, both in verse and prose, published against the same Peer.

1711-12. the fortifications kept in due repair, nor the magazines furnished, nor the soldiers paid; so that, whenever the war broke out, the French made themselves very easily masters of places so ill kept. The States had therefore proposed, during this war, that the Sovereignty of those places should continue still to belong to the Crown of Spain; but they should keep garrisons in the strongest and the most exposed, in particular those, that lay on the Lys and the Scheld; and, for maintaining this, they asked a hundred thousand pounds a year from those Provinces; by which they would be kept better and cheaper than ever they had been, while they were in the hands of the Spaniards. They asked likewise a free passage for all the stores, that they should send to those places. This seemed to be so reasonable, that, since the interest of England as well as the States, required, that this frontier should be carefully maintained, the Ministry were ready to hearken to it. It was objected, that, in case of a war between England and the States, the trade of those Provinces would be wholly in the hands of the Dutch: But this had been settled in the great truce, which, by the mediation of France and England, was made in 1609, between the Spaniards and the States. There was a provisional order therein made for the freedom of trade in those Provinces; and that was turned into a perpetual one by the peace of Münster. King Charles of Spain had agreed to the main of the Barrier; some places on the Scheld were not necessary for a frontier, but the States insisted on them, as necessary to maintain a communication with the frontier. The King of Prussia excepted likewise to some places in the Spanish Guelder. The Lord Townshend thought, that these were such inconsiderable objections, that, though his instructions did not come up to every particular, yet he signed the treaty, known by the name of the Barrier Treaty, on the 29th of October 1709; by which the States bound themselves to maintain the Queen's title to her Dominions and the Protestant Succession with their whole force; and England was reciprocally obliged to assist them in maintaining this Barrier.

The mercenary Writers, who were hired to defend the peace then projected with France, attacked this treaty with great virulence (1) and by arguments, that gave just suspicions of black designs. They said, it was a disgrace to this nation, to engage any other State to secure the Succession among us, which perhaps we might see cause to alter; whereas by this Treaty the States had an authority given them to interpose in our counsels. It was also said, that, if the States were put into possession of all those strong towns, they might shut us out from any share of trade in them, and might erect our manufactures in Provinces very capable of them. But it was answered, that this could not be done, as long as this treaty continued in force, unless the Sovereign of the country should join with them against us. Some objected to the settlement made at Münster, as a transaction, when we were in such confusion at home, that we had no Minister there; but that treaty had only rendered the

That treaty complained of.

(1) Dr Swift in particular published a piece intitled, Some remarks on the Barrier-Treaty between her Majesty and the States-General, to which are added the said Barrier-Treaty, with two separate articles; part of the counter-project; the Sentiments of Prince Eugene and Count Zinzendorf upon the said Treaty; and a representation of the English Merchants at Bruges. He attacked likewise the same Treaty in his Conduct of the Allies and of the late Ministry; but his remarks upon it were contained in the second part of Dr Hare's Allies and the late Ministry defended against France, and the present friends of France. On the same side was also published a piece in Osborne, called, The Dutch Barrier ours: Or the interest of England, and Holland inseparable. But the most considerable treatise upon this subject was published at London, in 1712, in Osborne, under the title of The Barrier Treaty vindicated, which is supposed to have been written by the Lord Townshend, Mr Stephen Poyntz, Dr Samuel Clarke, and Dr Hare. This piece begins with representing the fatal consequences of submitting to a Popish Prince, and the necessity of securing the Protestant Succession: That the Protestant Succession, under the circumstances of it at that time, could no otherwise be effectually secured, than by a foreign assistance; since the French King's promise, of not supporting the Pretender, could not be depended upon, and since England alone was not sufficient to defend herself against France. That no Alliance was so useful, in order to secure the Protestant Succession, as that of the States-General, whether we consider their situation, strength, religion, or interest, and the nature of their trade compared with our own. That, with regard to the barrier, it is in itself, and apart from all other considerations, the true interest of England, that there should be a good and sufficient barrier against France on the side of the Netherlands: That no barrier could be sufficient, that was not at least equal to that stipulated in the barrier treaty: That the barrier insisted on, in the Preliminaries of 1709, was not sufficient for the defence of the Low-Countries, because it consisted but of one single line or chain of towns; whereas what might further be claimed, by virtue of the barrier treaty, was far from being more than necessary for that end: That the defence of the barrier ought to be committed to the States, since it could not be preserved by Treaties with France, nor by defensive Alliances against her, nor by the House of Austria; nor by troops lent for the defence of the barrier, nor by England, but only by the States. That, for the defence of the barrier in the hands of the States, it was necessary they should have a safe and free communication with it, and reasonable, that the country of the barrier should contribute towards the charge of maintaining it. That the Dutch had a right to a sufficient barrier, and to have themselves the defence of it, was acknowledged by the Allies previous to the barrier treaty: That the States having a barrier pursuant to the present treaty, was far from exposing Great-Britain to any danger from them: That their barrier was granted them under such regulations and restrictions, that they could not attempt any thing to the prejudice of the trade of Great-Britain, without a direct violation of the Treaty; and an open rupture with our Nation: That they were to have only the military command in the barrier towns, without any power of imposing duties, prohibiting trade, or making any orders relating to commerce: That they were bound by the Treaty to assist her Majesty, in case any others should attempt to put our trade on a worse foot than that of the Nations the most favoured: That, even in case of a rupture with us, the States could not obstruct our trade in the Netherlands, without breaking at the same time with the Emperor also: That if, the fear of obstructing our trade was an objection against trusting the strong towns in the Netherlands in the hands of the States; it was a strong objection against trusting them in any other hands whatsoever. That, when the barrier was once put into the hands of the States, it would be more their interest than ever to avoid breaking with England. That supposing the States should be so imprudent, as to break with England, their barrier would be so far from making them more rich or formidable, that the truce and the provisional settlement made before, by the mediation of England, perpetual; and we had since acquiesced in that settlement for above sixty years. By examining into the particulars of the Treaty, it appeared that, in some inconsiderable matters, the Lord Townshend had gone beyond the letter of his instructions, in which he had so fully satisfied the late Ministry, that though, upon his first signing it, some exceptions had been taken, yet these were passed over, and the Treaty was ratified in form.

Resolutions injurious to the States.
Pr. H. C.
Feb. 4.

But the new Ministry had other views: They designed to set the Queen at liberty from her engagements by these Alliances, and to disengage her from Treaties. The House of Commons went now very hastily into several resolutions that were very injurious to the States. They pretended the States had been deficient in their quota's for sea-service, some years two thirds, and generally more than half their quota. That the forces supplied by the States for the service of Spain from 1705, to 1708, were no more than twelve thousand two hundred men, and they had since sent thither no forces at all. That the States, during the course of the war, had furnished less than their proportion in Flanders, twenty thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven men. That the Queen had paid in Subsidies more than her proportion three millions one hundred and fifty-five crowns. Then they fell on the Barrier-Treaty. They gave out that the old Ministry designed to bring over an army from Holland, whenever they should, for other ends, pretend that the Protestant Succession was in danger; whereas it was urged, that there was no need of any foreign assistance to maintain it. In the debate, it was insisted on, that it could be maintained safely no other way: It was not to be doubted but the King of France would assist the Pretender. England was not inclined to keep up a Standing-army in time of peace to resist him; so that we could not be so safe any other way, as by having the States engaged to send over their army, if it should be necessary. But reason is a feeble thing to bear down resolutions already taken, so the Commons voted, I. * That in the Treaty between her Majesty and the States-General, for securing the Succession to the Crown of Great-Britain, and for settling a Barrier for the States-General against France, under colour of securing the Protestant Succession, and providing a sufficient Barrier to the States-General against France, there were several articles destructive to the trade and interest of Great-Britain, and therefore highly dishonourable to her Majesty. II. That the Lord Viscount Town- shend had not any orders or authority for negotiating or concluding several articles in that Treaty. III. That the Lord Viscount Townshend, who negotiated and signed, and all those, who advised the ratifying of that Treaty, were enemies to the Queen and Kingdom.*

These Votes were carried by a great majority, and were looked on as strange preludes to a Peace. When the States heard what exceptions were taken to the Barrier-Treaty, they wrote a very respectful letter to the Queen, setting forth their just claim to, and the necessity of, the Barrier for the security of England as well as Holland; concluding, 'That if there were some articles, which, without affecting the essentials of the treaty, might be thought to want explanation, her Majesty should find them willing and ready to treat thereupon, and with all the facility and condescension that could be required of them, whatever should not be of the last importance for the security and preservation of their State. Intreating, withal, her Majesty to continue towards them that very precious friendship and good-will, with which she had hitherto honoured them.' How much sower disinterested people might be affected with this letter, it made no impression on the Ministry, and the Managers of the House of Commons got all their votes to be digested into a well-composed inflaming representation, which was laid before the Queen*; * See Pr. by it all the Allies, but most particularly the States; were charged with having failed in many particulars, contrary to their engagements: They also laid before the Queen the votes they had made, with relation to the Barrier treaty; and that they might name a great sum, that would make a deep impression on the Nation (which was ready to receive all Things implicitly from them) they said England had been, during the war, overcharged nineteen millions, beyond what they ought to have paid; all which was cast on the old Ministry.

The States, resenting these proceedings, drew The States up a large memorial, in which every particular justly in the representation was examined and fully answered. The two first heads of this Memorial, which related to the service at Sea and in Flanders, were printed here, and published in English in the Daily Courant, of April 7, containing a full answer to all that was charged on them, as to those matters; to the ample conviction of all who examined the particulars. The House of Commons saw the effect this was like to have; and therefore they voted the pretended (as they called it) Memorial, to be a false, scandalous, and malicious libel, reflecting upon it would rather exhaust and weaken them, with respect to England; because the whole revenue of the Spanish Netherlands had never been sufficient, since the Pyrenean Treaty, to keep them in a tolerable posture of defence; and therefore much less can that portion, assigned the States by the Treaty, be sufficient. That with regard to the great objection, founded on the fifteenth article of the Treaty, that it was highly prejudicial to the commerce of Great-Britain, to submit our trade in the Spanish dominions to an equality with that of Holland and other Nations; this is confuted by these considerations: That the trade of England and Holland to the Spanish Dominions had always stood upon an equal foot, not only by virtue of their respective treaties with the Crown of Spain, but likewise in fact;

and that the Crown of England had been so far from not submitting to the advantages granted the Dutch by the treaty of Munster, that it actually first procured them for the States, and, by a particular express treaty, became guarantee for the performance: And that her Majesty was laid under no engagement by the fifteenth article of the Barrier Treaty, but what she was previously obliged to by the Grand Alliance, as appears from the eighth article of that Alliance. In the Observations on the Treaty and Counter Project, it is shewn, that there was not one variation of any moment throughout the whole treaty, but what was either pursuant to former treaties, or necessary to the rendering the barrier complete and effectual; and, on that account, as much for the interest of England, as of Holland itself.

(1) The

1711-12. upon the resolutions of the House, and that the printing of it was a breach of privilege. And, to stop the printing of the other heads, Mr Samuel Buckley, the Writer and Printer of the Daily-Courant, was taken into custody. This was a confutation, to which no reply could be made; yet it seemed to be a confession that their representation could not be justified, when the answer to it was so carefully stifled. It was then generally reported, that the chief handle for this censure was a supposition that the Memorial was not genuine; which appeared soon after to be entirely groundless, for the Memorial had not only been printed at the Hague, but delivered by their Envoy Van Borjelen to the Queen, by whose order Mr St John wrote a short answer (1).

Naturalization-act
repealed.

The House of Commons proceeded next to the repeal of the Naturalization-Act, which had passed the last Parliament in favour of the Protestant Foreigners. A bill for the repeal of this act had been thrown out by the Lords the last year, but it now passed both Houses, and received the Royal assent.

Those, who were suspected of having bad designs, applied themselves with great industry to drive on such bills as they hoped would give the Presbyterians in Scotland such alarms, as might dispose them to remonstrate that the Union was broken.

A Toleran-

Reman-

against it.

To this end several bills were brought into the House of Commons: They began with proposing one for a Toleration for the Episcopal Clergy to use the Liturgy of the Church of England. This seemed so reasonable that no opposition was made to it: However the Kirk of Scotland being alarmed at the design of setting up the Church of England's Liturgy and Worship in North-Britain; and upon the first notice, that a bill for that purpose was brought into the House of Commons, the Commissioners of the General Assembly drew up a large representation to the Queen, setting forth, 'That the sixth act of Parliament in 1707, for securing the Protestant Religion and Presbyterian Government, (whereby all other acts in favour of the same are ratified and approved) is declared to be an essential and fundamental condition of the treaty of Union, without any alteration thereof, or derogation thereto, in any sort, for ever, even beyond the Reach of Parliament. That they could not but express their surprize and deep affliction, to hear of a bill offered for such a large and almost boundless Toleration, not only threatening the overthrow of their Church, but giving a large licence almost to all errors and blasphemies, and throwing up all good discipline, to the dishonour of God, and the scandal and ruin of the true Christian Religion, and the infallible disturbance of the quiet, and to the confusion of that Church and Nation: And therefore with all humility but with the greatest earnestness, they did beseech, nay obtest her Majesty, by the same mercy of God, that restored that Church, and raised her Majesty to the Throne, to interpose for the relief of that Church, and the maintenance of the present Establishment, against such a manifest and ruining incroachment, in such manner, as in her Royal wisdom and justice she should think needful.' Notwithstanding this representation (which was presented to the Queen by Mr Carstairs, Principal of the College of Edinburgh) the act went on, and a clause was put in it, that occasioned great complaints; the Magistrates, who by the laws were obliged to execute the sentences of the Judicatories of their Kirk, were by this act required, to execute none of them. It was reasonable to require them to execute no sentences, that might be passed on any, for doing what was tolerated by this act; but

(1) The answer was as follows:

The Queen having maturely considered the memorials of the 3d of April, which were presented to her Majesty by the Sieur Van Borjelen, Envoy-Extraordinary from the Lords the States-General, and the resolution of the said States of the 22d of the same month, which was communicated to her Majesty by the Earl of Strafford, her Ambassador-Extraordinary, and Plenipotentiary in Holland, has ordered me to give this answer in few words: That her Majesty is surprized to find, that far from giving the deserved praises to the efforts, which her Majesty has made in Spain, and Portugal, two theatres of the war, that have been abandoned by the States for so many years, the said efforts, are looked upon only as Quota's, which the Queen was obliged to furnish according to the rule of proportion, which has not the least foundation. Her Majesty agrees, that, according to the principles laid down in the resolution above-mentioned, Great-Britain will never contribute enough, nor the United-Provinces too little.

There it is advanced as a maxim, that the power of each of the Allies is the only rule and measure of the efforts they are to make; and, after this, the States set up for judges, as well of the power of her Majesty's Kingdom, as of that of their own State. It is not difficult to perceive how far this sort of logic would carry us: But her Majesty, far from being obliged by the memorial mentioned in the resolution of the 22d of April to change her sentiments, thinks fit to renew the declarations, which the Earl of Strafford made by her order, and in her name. These are not points, which the Queen proposes as a subject of Negotiation, but a communication to her Allies of the resolution she has taken, and of the rule laid down, that they may thereupon concert their measures.

The House of Commons, which is composed of Members sent from each County of the Kingdom, and who are competent judges of what burden the people are able to bear, have only granted subsidies for the current year, according to the proportions, and under the conditions, which have been imparted to the States-General.

Her Majesty has declared to the House, that she thought these conditions reasonable, and has given her orders according to the plan, in which, by consequence, there is not the least alteration to be expected.

The Queen looks upon an union betwixt herself and the States to be the strongest support of the common cause; and for that reason has done all that she could to traverse the designs of those factious spirits, which tended to break that union. The proposals, which have been made by her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries to the Ministers of the States-General, do unconceivably manifest the Queen's sincere desire to entertain a good correspondence and strict union with the States. These are all the steps, which her Majesty could take for that end. Her Majesty flatters herself, that they will have the effect, which she ought to expect from them; and that they will dissipate all those vain fears and ill grounded jealousies, which have been dispersed with so much industry throughout the seven Provinces. But, however that be, her Majesty will have his comfort, that she has neglected nothing of what was in her power to contribute towards the satisfaction of the States-General, without abandoning the interest of her own Kingdoms.

but the carrying this to a general clause took away the civil sanction, which in most places is looked on as the chief, if not the only, strength of Church Power. Those, who were to be thus tolerated, were required, by a day limited in the act, to take the oath of Abjuration; it was well known, that few, if any of them, would take that oath; so, to cover them from it, a clause was put in this act, requiring all the Presbyterian Ministers to take it; since it seemed reasonable, that those of the legal Establishment should be required to take that, which was now to be imposed on those, who were only to be tolerated. It was well understood, that there were words in the oath of Abjuration, to which the Presbyterians excepted. In the act of Succession, one of the conditions, on which the Successor was to be received, was, his being of the Communion of the Church of England; and, by the oath of Abjuration, the Succession was sworn to, as limited by that act: The word, Limitation, imported only the entail of the Crown; but it was suggested, that the particle, As, related to all the conditions in that act. This was spread among so many of that persuasion, that it was believed a great party among them would refuse to take it: So a small alteration was made by the House of Lords of these words, As was limited, into words of the same sense, Which was limited; but those, who intended to excuse the Episcopal party, who they knew were in the Pretender's interests, from taking the oath, were for keeping in those words, which the Presbyterians scrupled. The Commons accordingly disagreed to the amendment made by the Lords; and, they receding from it, the bill passed, as it had been sent up by the Commons (1). By this act the Episcopal Clergy, provided they have been ordained by a Protestant Bishop, and taken the oaths of Allegiance and Abjuration, are permitted to use in their Meetings the Liturgy of the Church of England without molestation. By the same act the Ministers of the Established Church of Scotland are also obliged to take the oaths.

Another act passed for discontinuing the Courts of Judicature, during some days in Christmas, though the observing of Holidays was contrary to the principles of the Presbyterians (2). But this was intended only to exasperate them.

Patronages
restored.
Pr. H. C.
Barnet.

Some time after the Toleration-Act, a bill was brought in for the restoring of Patronages. It was established by the Presbyterians from the time of the Reformation, as a principle, that Parishes had, from warrants in scripture, a right to chuse their Ministers: And therefore they had always looked on the right of Patronage as an invasion of their principles, and had abolished it by law as a grievance. This right having been restored with Episcopacy in 1661, continued till 1690, when Presbyterian Church-Government was again established, and the right of Patronage taken away. But it was now resolved that it should be restored. It was urged in opposition to it, that since, by the act of Union, Presbytery, with all its rights and privileges, was unalterably secured, and since their Kirk-Session was a branch of their Constitution, the taking from them the right of chusing their Ministers was contrary to that act: Yet the bill passed through both Houses, a small opposition being only made in either. By these steps the Presbyterians were alarmed, when they saw the success of every motion that was made, on design to weaken and undermine their Establishment.

The self-denying bill for limiting the number of Officers sitting in the House of Commons was brought in, and, as was usual, it easily passed there: The scandal of corruption was now higher than ever; for it was believed men were not only bribed for a whole Session, but had new bribes for particular votes. The twelve new Peers, being brought into the House of Lords, had irritated so many there, that, for two days, by all the judgments that could be made of the House, the bill was likely to have passed that House: But, upon some prevailing arguments, secretly and dextrously applied to some Lords, an alteration was made in it, by which it was lost: For whereas the bill, as it stood, was to take place after the determination of the present Parliament, this was altered, so as that it should take place after the demise of the Queen; so it was no more thought on.

Prince Eugene still continued in England, and was treated very civilly by the Queen, though not with that distinction that was due to his high merit: Nor did he gain any ground with the Ministry.

He had presented a memorial to the Queen (which he published in February) containing an account of the Emperor's conduct in the war; concluding, with a proposal in relation to the war in Spain. Some days passed before any notice was taken of this memorial, but, at last, Mr St John acquainted the Commons, 'That he had received her Majesty's command to communicate to that House a proposition made to her Majesty by Prince Eugene of Savoy, in the name of the Emperor, for the support of the war in Spain; viz. His Imperial Majesty judges, that forty thousand men will be sufficient for this service; and that the whole expence of the war in Spain may amount to four millions of crowns; towards which his Imperial Majesty offers to make up the troops, which he has in that country, to thirty thousand men, and to take one million of crowns upon himself. It was observed, that no Member said any thing to this message; which made the Prince very uneasy about the success of a Negotiation, which had detained him so long from other important affairs on the Continent. On the other hand, the course of the publick entertainments, to which he was daily invited, was by this time interrupted by the death of his nephew, the Chevalier de Savoy, who, being taken ill of the small-pox the 20th of February, died four days after, in the 21st year of his age; and his corps was deposited, without any funeral pomp, in the vault belonging to the Dukes of Ormond, in Westminster-Abbey.

(1) When the Commons read this bill the third time, Sir David Dalrymple said, 'Since I see the House is resolved to make no alterations in the body of the bill, I acquiesce, and only desire, the title of it may be this: A bill for establishing Jacobitism and Immorality. Pr. H. C. Vol. IV.

(2) The title of this act is, An act for Discharging the Yule Vacance.

1711-12. Prince Eugene having delayed his departure as long as possible, in hopes of succeeding in his Negotiation, had his audience of leave the 13th of March. He embarked the 17th, and, two days after, arrived at the Hague in the Pergrine yacht. Bishop Burnet, whilst the Prince was in England, was admitted several times to much discourse with him, and, from what appeared to him, the Prince had a most unaffected modesty, and scarcely bore the acknowledgements that all the world paid him: He descended to an easy equality with those with whom he conversed, and seemed to assume nothing to himself, while he reasoned with others.

False report of Mobocks. Hist. of Europe. During Prince Eugene's stay in England, upon occasion of some frolics and disorders committed in the night-time, either by town-rakes, or drunken soldiers, a report was industriously spread, 'That there were great numbers of dissipated persons, who, under the name of Mobocks or Havokubies, had combined together to disturb the public peace; and who, in an inhuman manner, without any provocation, assaulted and wounded those, whom they met with in the streets, flitting or flating people's noses; gagging or distending their mouths with iron instruments, and committing many other extravagant cruelties.' At the same time printed lists were handed about of many persons, said to have been taken up and committed to several prisons, upon account of these barbarities, amongst whom some men of figure and titles were insinuated to be; which gained so strong a belief, and struck such a terror among the vulgar, that, as soon as night drew on, many were deterred from going about on their lawful occasions. Hereupon the matter being laid before the Queen, her Majesty, by the advice of her Privy-Council, issued a proclamation, 'for the suppressing of riots, and the discovery of such as had been guilty of the late barbarities within the Cities of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent; charging and commanding, that the offenders be prosecuted with the utmost severity and rigour of the law, and promising a reward of one hundred pounds for the discovery and apprehending of any person, who, since the first day of February last, had, without any provocation, wounded, stabbed, or maimed, or who should, before the first day of May, wound, stab, or maim, any of her Majesty's subjects.' Though this proclamation at first confirmed the belief of the barbarities and riots, for the suppressing of which it was intended; yet the consequence of it shewed, upon what slight grounds that belief had been entertained. For when people, under security of this proclamation, came to inquire calmly and coolly into the matter, it was found, that no other disorders had happened of late, but such as are usual, and almost unavoidable, in populous Cities. But it was remarkable, that Brinsden, the Oculist, and other agents of the men in power, were shrewdly suspected of having raised and improved the report of this pretended combination of Mobocks and Havokubies, in order to throw the odium of it upon the Whigs, whom, by all possible means, they endeavoured to render obnoxious to the people. However, to colour these proceedings, two common pick-pockets were tried, found guilty, and severely fined for form sake. And the Lord Hinchinbrooke, then a youth, and an officer of the army, who, at the desire, and in company of a Constable, went out one night in quest of the pretended Mobocks, were afterwards likewise arraigned and tried, as disturbers of the public peace: But, their innocence manifestly appearing, the notion of Mobocks and Havokubies was universally exploded.

The French Refugees having presented a petition to the Queen for her interposition at the treaty of Utrecht in favour of their brethren under persecution in France, and for the restitution of their estates in that Kingdom, of which they had been so unjustly deprived; the Earl of Dartmouth wrote a letter to Monsieur Du Bourdieu and Graverole, two French Protestant Ministers, agents for the rest; assuring them, that the Bishop of Bristol and the Earl of Strafford were already under the strictest orders to support the interest of the French Refugees at the Negotiations of peace. Accordingly, the Queen appointed Armand de Bourbon, Marquis de Miremont, nephew to the Earl of Feversham, to go to Utrecht, and, in her Majesty's name, to take particular care of the interest of the French Refugees. Notwithstanding all this, they soon found that their interests were either but faintly supported by Great-Britain, or the Court of France shewed no regard to the Queen's intercession.

The Supplies demanded were given by the Commons, in all about six millions. There were two Lotteries of one million eighteen hundred thousand pounds each, for which a fund was created to pay both principal and interest in thirty-two years. Among the duties for raising this sum, was a stamp-duty at two-pence a sheet on News-Papers and Pamphlets. A motion was made for a clause to be put into one of the Lottery-bills, for appointing Commissioners to examine the value and consideration of all the grants made since the Revolution. The Ministers apprehending the difficulty of carrying a Money-bill, with a tack to it, through the House of Lords, because of their former resolution against such a practice, and the Treasurer promising some leading men, that he would use his interest to procure the passing a Grant-bill, single, in the House of Peers, they prevailed to have it separated from the Money-bill, and, when passed, it was sent up to the Lords. Those, who continued to pay a respect to the memory of King William, thought it was a very unbecoming return to him, who had delivered the Nation from Slavery and Popery, to cast so particular an indignity on his grants. The bill made all its steps through the House of Lords, to the last, with a small majority of one or two. On the third reading of the bill, a warm debate arose, in which the Duke of Argyle said, 'That, if for the ease of the public it was found proper to resume the grants of the Crown, he would readily give his vote for it, provided they would go so far back, as the Restoration of King Charles the Second. But he could never agree to limit the bill to grants of King William, because such an act would be injurious to the memory of the Deliverer of Great-Britain, and all Europe; which ought to be had in reverence by all honest men.' The Earl of Wharton, the Lord Cowper, and Lord Hallifax spoke, with great force and eloquence, against the partial distinction between grants since the Revolution, and those before it; adding, that such a distinction gave too much credit to a Ministry, who by the passing 1712. of the bill would have the means in their hands, to ruin and oppress those, who had not the good luck to please them. The Earl of Nottingham, who had been absent the first two days, spoke on this occasion, and said, He always thought those grants were too large, and very unseasonably made, but he thought there ought to be an equal way of proceeding in that matter; they ought either to resume them all, or to bring all concerned in them to an equal composition: He therefore could not approve of this bill, which, by a very clear consequence, would put it in the power of a fellow-subject, to resume or to cover grants, at his pleasure; and so it would put the persons, concerned in the grants, into too great a dependance on him. To this the Lord-Treasurer answered, 'That no one had reason to be alarmed at the bill, since the intent of it was only to examine the value of the grants made by King William, and upon what considerations they were given; but that, as it was presumed, those, who enjoyed them, had rendered very signal service to their Country, so it was not to be doubted, but the Parliament would confirm the same.' The Earl of Wharton replied, 'That it was also to be presumed, that those, who enjoyed the grants of King Charles the Second, and King James the Second, might have likewise done important service to the Nation: Wherefore it would be very proper to look into the motives of all those grants, in order to confirm them to those, who had deserved them.' The Earl of Oxford said, 'That he had been informed, that the Commons had no design absolutely to resume the grants of King William, but only to make the possessors pay the value of four or five years rent, for which they should have the grants confirmed to them for ever.' To which the Earl of Wharton again replied, 'That he would not call in question what a Lord of such probity and sincerity had advanced; but that the resumption of all the grants of Ireland sufficiently shewed, that the Commons had not been content with a part.' Several other speeches, that were made on both sides, prolonged the debate till between six and seven in the evening, when the question being put, that the bill do pass, it appeared upon the gathering of the votes, that there were seventy-eight voices on each side, fifty-three present, and twenty-five proxies for the affirmative; and fifty-two present, and twenty-six proxies for the negative; so the votes being equal, by the rule of the House, the negative carried it, to the great disappointment of the enemies of the Revolution. It was observed, that the loss of this bill was in a great measure owing to the vigilance of the late Duke of Portland. He being informed, that the Lord Colepepper had sent his proxy to the Earl of Sunderland, who, by reason of his indisposition, could not produce it, immediately dispatched an express to the Lord Colepepper, and he sent his proxy to another Lord time enough to create part of the negative. On the other hand, many were of opinion, that, had not the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Strafford absented themselves from the House, the bill had certainly passed.

May 22. The Queen three days after came to the House of Peers, and gave the Royal assent to the Money-bills and others. As the Earl of Strafford was now in London, it was expected, the Queen would have laid before the Parliament a state of the Negotiations of peace which had been carrying on at the Hague. But, some points not being yet settled between the British and French Courts, she did not think fit to make a speech to both Houses. However, the Speaker, at presenting the Lottery bill, said in his compliment to the Queen, 'Your faithful Commons are in hopes, that what they have so cheerfully given, for your Majesty's occasions, will enable your Majesty to put an end to the present war by a safe and honourable peace.' There being no account come of any peace, as soon as the Commons were returned to their House, Mr Benson, Chancellor of the Exchequer, afterwards Lord Bingley, moved, that the call of the House (which had been several times put off) might be adjourned to the 4th of June, when he did not doubt, but the Queen would lay before them the result of the present Negotiations. Mr Hampden, complained, saying, 'Notwithstanding all the promises given from time to time to the Commons, we have an unactive and lazy Campaign, and a trifling Negotiation of peace; so that we are amused by our Ministers at home, and tricked by our Enemies abroad.' Mr Secretary St John had too great a share in the management of affairs not to resent these insinuations; and said with some emotion, 'That they highly reflected on her Majesty, and her Ministers. But though some Members, had been sent to the Tower for less offences, and that he, who spoke last, might be fond of that honour; yet he hoped the House would be of another opinion.' Sir Richard Onslow replied, 'That to suppose her Majesty, or her Ministers, to have any influence on the deliberations of that House, was injurious to her Majesty, and a violation of the privileges of that House. In which he was seconded by Mr Lechmere. But the debate went no further, in consideration, as the friends of the prevailing party suggested, that, the Session drawing to an end, the commitment of a Member at that time would rather be a pride than a mortification to him. And so, according to the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the call of the House was put off till the 4th of June.

A great change happened in the affairs of France, at the very time their Plenipotentiaries were negotiating at Utrecht. The Dauphin, the only son of the King of France, who died, in the 50th year of his age, of the small-pox on the 14th of April, N.S. 1711, left behind him three sons, the Duke of Burgundy, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Berry. On the 12th of February 1711-12, N.S. the Dauphiness, Mary Adelaide of Savoy, died at Versailles in the 26th year of her age, having been taken suddenly ill of a surfeit, as it was given out, three days before: And the Dauphin himself, Lewis, late Duke of Burgundy, survived his spouse but six days, dying at Marly on the 18th of the same month, in the 30th year of his age: And, in a few days after him, his eldest son, who was five years old, died likewise; and his second son, then but two years old, was thought to be in a dying condition. These deaths, coming so quick one after another, struck the French Court. The King himself was for some days ill, but he soon recovered. Such repeated strokes were looked upon with amazement. Poison was suspected, as is usual upon all such occasions; and the Duke of Orleans was generally charged with it. He 1712. was believed to have dealt much in Chemistry, and was an ambitious Prince. While he was in Spain at the head of King Philip's army, he formed a project to set him aside; and to make himself King of Spain, in which, as the Lord Townshend told Bishop Burnet, he went so far, that he tried to engage Mr Stanhope, to pers the Queen and the States-General to assist him, promising to break with France, and to marry King Charles's Dowager (1). This being discovered, he was upon that called out of Spain; and it was thought, that the only thing, that saved him, was the King's kindness to his natural daughter, whom he had married. The King not only passed it over, but soon after obliged the Duke of Berry to marry his daughter; such care had the old King taken to corrupt the blood of France, with the mixture of his spurious issue. King Philip was not at all pleased with the Alliance; but wrote to his elder brother, expostulating with him for not opposing the marriage more vigorously; with which he professed himself so displeased, that he could not be brought to congratulate upon it. This letter was sent from Madrid to Paris, but was intercepted, and sent to Barcelona, and from thence to the Hague.

The Duke of Burgundy, when he became Dauphin upon his father's death, had been let into the understanding the secrets of government; and, as was given out, he had on many occasions expressed a deep sense of the miseries of the people, with great sentiments of justice. He had likewise, in some disputes, which Cardinal de Noailles had with the Jesuits, espoused his interests, and protected him. It was likewise believed, that he retained a great affection to the Archbishop of Cambray, whose fable of Telemaachus carried in it the noblest maxims possible for the conduct of a wife and good Prince, and set forth that station in shining characters, but which were the reverse of Lewis the XIVth's whole life and reign. These things gave the French a just sense of the loss they had in his death; and the apprehensions of a minority, after such a reign, struck them with great consternation. These deaths, in so critical a time, seemed to portend, that all the vast schemes, which the French King had formed with so much perfidy and bloodshed, was in a fair way to be soon blasted. But his affairs were soon retrieved by the ensuing peace, to the Negotiations of which it is now time to turn.

The place appointed for the Congress was the City of Utrecht; and the day named for opening it, was the first of January 1711-12, O. S. The first Minister that appeared at the place of treaty was Dr Robinson, Lord Privy-Seal, one of the British Plenipotentiaries, who came there the 15th of January; and, two days after, arrived the other British Plenipotentiary, the Earl of Strafford. On the 18th came also two of the Dutch Plenipotentiaries (2), who were followed, the next morning, by the three French Plenipotentiaries, the Marshal d'Uxelles, the Abbot de Polignac, and Monsieur Mesnager (3). The Emperor and the Empire sent their Ministers very late and unwillingly; but they submitted to the necessity of their affairs. Yet, upon this condition (positively given them by the Earl of Strafford, and confirmed to Prince Eugene by the British Court) that the seven preliminaries offered by France, and signed by Mesnager, should be only bare proposals, and should not be admitted as the basis of the treaty. To save the loss of time in settling the ceremonial, it was also agreed, that the Plenipotentiaries should assume no character of dignity, till all matters were adjusted, and made ready for signing. At the same time, it was likewise agreed, that the general Conferences should begin on Friday the 29th of January, N. S. and should afterwards be held on Wednesdays and Saturdays at ten in the morning.

These things being settled, the first Conference was opened on the day appointed, by eight Ministers of the Allies, namely, the two British, four of the States-General, two of the Duke of Savoy's, and the three Plenipotentiaries of France. The Lord Privy-Seal, (who appeared in a black velvet-gown, adorned with gold loops, with a long train borne up by two pages in ash-coloured coats, laced with silver orris, and waistcoats of green velvet) addressed himself to the Ministers of France in the following speech:

Gentlemen,

" and also positive orders from our principals,

(1) This is the project hinted at by the author of the manuscript account of the campaigns in Spain (See p. 11. of this volume) which was made to Lord Galway, who sent Mr Stanhope to the Duke of Orleans to hear his offers. But the author of the Duke of Orleans's life gives a different account of the Duke's project. He says, Lewis XIV. being obliged by the successes of the Allies to promise to abandon his grandson Philip King of Spain, the Spaniards offered to place the Duke of Orleans upon the Throne in his room, to which he consented. But, this consent of his being afterwards misrepresented to the King of France, as a scheme to have usurped the Spanish Crown from King Philip, the Duke was for some time in disgrace at the Court of France. La vie de Philippe d'Orleans, Vol. II. p. 93.

Monsieurs Buys and Vanderdussen, for that of Holland; Monsieur de Moormont, for Zealand; Monsieur de Renfswoude, for Utrecht; Monsieur de Gessinga, for Friesland; the Count de Rechteren, for Over-Iffel; and the Count de Tu and Kniphausen, for Groningen.

(3) As France had named three Plenipotentiaries, and Monsieur Mesnager in particular, to take care of commercial affairs; the Court of Great-Britain had a mind to add Mr Prior, to their two Ministers at Utrecht, for the same purpose; but the Earl of Strafford, having absolutely refused to be joined in commission with a person of so mean extraction, and threatening to lay down his employment, the business of trade was committed to the Lord Privy-Seal; who, not being versed in those matters, was obliged to direct himself by the lights he received from Mr Arthur Moore.

1712. "you to answer, without loss of time, the expectation of the High Allies, in explaining yourselves clearly and roundly upon the points, which are to be settled in these Conferences: And that you will do it in so plain and particular a manner, that all and every of the Confederate Princes and States may find a just and reasonable satisfaction upon their respective pretensions." The Marshal d'Uxelles, First Plenipotentiary of France, answered, "That it could not be doubted, but his most Christian Majesty had a sincere and ardent desire to give peace to Europe;" adding, "That with this view his Majesty had furnished his Plenipotentiaries with ample instructions, and a full power to come to the conclusion of so beneficial a work, which was so earnestly desired by all Europe." The Earl of Strafford took occasion to declare, that the Queen had received the general propositions as a foundation for a Negotiation of peace; but that they were binding to France only, and not to the Allies; to which the French Ministers readily assented. But it is to be observed through the whole proceeding, that this is meant of the propositions signed by Mesnager only, the Congress not having the least notice or cognizance of what was signed, both on the part of France and England too; which had been hitherto concealed, and, upon all occasions, publickly disowned. The Plenipotentiaries of the States and Duke of Savoy made likewise speeches suitable to the occasion; after which, the Assembly broke up. The next day, the Ministers of the Allies agreed to meet at the Town-House twice a week during the Congress, in order to preserve union amongst them, and to take the necessary measures for promoting the interest of the respective Princes and States they represented. At one of these meetings, because the French Ministers had in their speeches promised to deliver in writing the intentions of their Court, it was resolved to deliver to them, in the next Conference, a declaration, "That the Ministers of the High Allies, already there, expected, according to the offers of the Ministers of France, the plan or scheme they had promised; and would not fail to return an answer thereto, for what concerned the particular interest of their principals; and as to the Ministers of such of the Allies, who were still absent, they had reason to believe, that they would forthwith repair thither, to concur with them in their answer."

This paper being delivered to the French Ministers in the second Conference on the 3d of February, they promised to give in their offers for a general peace; but declared they wished that all the Ministers of the Allies were present that they might, at the same time, receive a counter-project or answer from all the members of the grand Alliance. Accordingly little was done at the third Conference, but at the fourth, Feb. 10. N. S. the Imperial Ministers being arrived, a warm dispute arose between them and the French Plenipotentiaries. The Marshal d'Uxelles said, the King, his Master, had most sincere intentions to end this war to the satisfaction of the Allies: That, in order to that, they ought to deal roundly and fairly. That he hoped a good success of this Negotiation, since the Ambassadors of the House of Austria had at last resolved to come to the Congress; and thereupon he desired the Ministers of the Allies to deliver the proposals they had to make. Count Zinzendorf answered, "That the Emperor, his Master, had no less sincere intentions to contribute all that lay in his power towards so desirable a blessing, as a general peace: But that it seemed Monsieur d'Uxelles, instead of dealing roundly and fairly, began, on the contrary, with a fetch^{1712.}, since he could not be a stranger to the demands of the Allies, nor have forgot where the Conferences at Gertruydenberg broke off: That there was nothing more for them to do now, than to find out ways and means to remove the difficulties, that had obstructed that Negotiation: And, since the King, their Master, had desired this Congress of the Allies, they had reason to expect, that he had given his Ministers necessary instructions for that end." By this he insinuated, that the Allies insisted on the first Preliminaries signed at the Hague in the year 1709. Count Zinzendorf likewise took notice of this expression, The Ambassadors of the House of Austria, as derogatory to his Imperial Majesty. The Abbot de Polignac replied, "That they ought to talk no more of the affair of Gertruydenberg, since the King had fixed a time for the Allies to accept his proposal; which they not having done, he was under no engagement." This occasioned a high debate; and d'Uxelles having, in relation to the affairs of Spain, said, "That they ought to wait the arrival of the Ambassador of that Crown;" Count Zinzendorf replied, "He was present, and himself was the person." The Marshal returned, "That he acknowledged none but King Philip's," which inflamed the dispute; and the Marshal having likewise advanced, in relation to a point in debate, "That the Queen of England had engaged her promise;" the Lord Privy-Seal said, "There was no such thing in his instructions." At last, the French Ministers consented to deliver their proposals in writing, which they did, February 11, in a very high strain.

They promised, that at the signing of the treaty they would own the Queen and the Succession to the Crown, as she should direct; ^{French proposals.} Spain and the West-Indies were to remain with King Philip; the Dominions in Italy, with the Islands, except Sicily, were to go to the Emperor, and the Spanish Netherlands to the Elector of Bavaria: The trade was to be regulated, as it was before the war; some places in Canada were to be restored to England, with the freedom of fishery in Newfoundland; but Placentia was to remain with the French: Dunkirk was offered to be demolished; but Lille and Tournay were to be given for it: The States were to have their demands for the Barrier; and the frontier between France, the Empire, and Italy, was to be the same, that it was before the war; by which Landau, Fenesbrelle, and Exiles were to be restored to France (1). These demands

(1) These proposals at large were as follow:

A specific explanation of the offers of France for a general peace, to the satisfaction of all the parties concerned in the present war.

"The King will acknowledge, at the signing of 1712. demands (which were called a specific explanation of the offers of France for a general peace, to the satisfaction of all the Allies) were as extravagant as any the French King could have made, in the most prosperous state of his affairs. They filled the Allies with indignation, and heightened the jealousy they had of a secret understanding, between the Courts of England and France. This indignation had such an effect, that the Earl of Strafford, in his letter of the 16th of February 1711-12, says, "The French Ministers were mortified at the general discontent these offers gave; and seemed to wish, they had put in Tournay for the Dutch; and St Venant to be demolished, to have softened the matter at its first coming out." Nor were the British Plenipotentiaries without their uneasiness. They had done all they could, as the Earl of Strafford says in his letter of the 12th of February, to persuade the French to be as ample in the explication as they could, "seeing that is what will have a great effect, and strike the minds of unthinking people, and make some work for reflection for the faction." The British Plenipotentiaries complained, that they were under great difficulties on all hands, for both Buys and Mefnager thought they came short of what had been told them in England; and, the Allies then forming their respective demands in concert with each other, they wanted further orders. These Plenipotentiaries were likewise at a great loss how to behave about Spain, both in regard to the particular advantages, that were to be asked on the behalf of Great-Britain, and the general disposition of it. But Mr Secretary St John soon sent them words of comfort, in a letter of the 16th of February, that Mr Harley, Secretary of the Treasury, would set out in a few days, who is fully instructed in all the Queen's views and desires: "That it were to be wished this Gentleman could have been sooner sent; but the hurry, says he, which we have been in for some time, is inexpressible, and he was too useful to be spared, till the House of Commons were perfectly secured to the Queen's interest, and to the measures of peace. I think I may say, they are absolutely so now. The Secretary confessed the French plan to be too scanty; and observed, that they must let the French Ministers know, that the whole turned upon their manner of proceeding; her Majesty having gone further than could have been expected from her in promoting the peace."

The specific explanation raised no less indignation among true Englishmen, than among the Allies; more particularly the putting off the owning the Queen, till the treaty came to be signed: The Lord-Treasurer, to soften this; said, he saw a letter, in which the King of France acknowledged her Queen: This was a confession, that there was a private correspondence between them; yet the doing it by a letter was no legal act. In excuse of this it was said, that the late King was not owned by the French, till the treaty of Ryswick came to be signed: But there was a Mediator in that treaty, with whom our Plenipotentiaries only negotiated; whereas there was no Mediator at Utrecht: So that the Queen was now, without any interposition, treating with a Prince, who did not own her right to the Crown. The propositions made by the French were treated with the greatest scorn, nor did the Ministers pretend to say any thing in excuse for them. The Lord Hallifax made a motion in the House of Peers, for presenting an address to the Queen, about the specific offers of France, which his Lordship called, trifling, arrogant, and injurious to her Majesty and her Allies. He was seconded by several Peers, of both parties, who said in substance, 'That those propositions ought to be rejected with the utmost scorn and indignation; that it plainly appeared, France had no other design in view, than to amuse the Allies; and, in particular, that it was derogatory to her Majesty's honour, to enter into any Negotiation with that Crown, before her Majesty's just title was acknowledged.' Some endeavours were used to adjourn the debate at least till the next day, by suggesting, 'That the offers that were handed about, having yet no other authority, than their being inserted in the Holland Gazettes, might not be genuine; and therefore the Lords ought not to take any notice of them, till such time

"His Majesty will cause all the fortifications of Dunkirk to be demolished immediately after the peace, provided an equivalent be given him to his satisfaction.

"The island of St Christopher, Hudson's Bay, and freight of that name, shall be yielded up intire to Great-Britain; and Acadia, with Port-Royal, and the Fort, shall be restored intire to his Majesty. As to the island of Newfoundland, the King offers to yield up that also to Great-Britain, reserving only to himself the Fort of Placentia, and the right of catching and drying fish, as before the war. It shall be agreed to make a treaty of commerce before or after the peace, as England shall chuse, the conditions of which shall be made as equal between the two Nations, as they can possibly.

"The King will consent at the signing of the peace, that the Spanish Netherlands, which are made over and given to the Elector of Bavaria by the King of Spain, shall serve for a barrier to the United-Netherlands; and, to augment it, he will join thereto

"In exchange, his Majesty demands to form the barrier of France, Aire, St Venant, Bethune, Douay, and their dependencies. If the States-General are desirous to keep garrisons in the fortified places of the barrier so formed of the dominions transferred to his Electoral Highness, and of what France adds thereto of its own; his Majesty consents, that they shall put their troops into them in as great number as they please: And besides, that they shall be maintained at the expence of the Country.

"In consideration of this cession, and of this consent, the King on his side demands, as an equivalent for the demolishing of Dunkirk, the towns and citadels of Lille, and Tournay, with their castellanies, and dependencies.

"The barrier thus regulated between France and the States-General, the King will grant for augmenting the commerce of their subjects what is stipulated by the treaty of Ryswick, and the advantageous Tariff of 1664, with an exception only of fix sorts of Merchandize, which shall be agreed on, and which shall remain charged with the same duties, that are paid at this time; as also the exemption of 50 sols

1712. time as the Queen had communicated them to the House. But this, and other arguments, were over-ruled; and an address was made to the Queen, expressing a just indignation at such a proceeding, promising her all assistance in their power, in carrying on the war, till she could obtain a safe and honourable peace (1).

Whilst this passed in England, the propositions of France, which were quickly dispersed in print in all the United Provinces, were received with the utmost indignation by people of all ranks, the multitude not forbearing to vent the severest reproaches against those, from whom they supposed the French Court had received encouragement. These offers, however, had this good effect, that those among the Dutch, who before were most eager for a peace, particularly the Regency of Utrecht, resolved to spend their last penny to carry on the war.

Copies of the specific explanation being sent by all the Ministers of the Allies to their respective Principals, the Earl of Strafford, at the next general Conference, told the Ministers of France, pursuant to what had been agreed at a meeting of the other Ministers, "That they found it necessary to take time till the 5th of March, N. S. to give in the specific demands of the parties engaged in the war." To which the French Ministers readily agreed. In the mean time, the Ministers of the Allies communicated to each other their respective demands, agreed upon the manner in which they were to deliver them in, and, at a meeting on the 3d of March, 1712, resolved, that a clause of mutual guarantee, importing, that a just and reasonable satisfaction should be given to all the Allies, according to Treaties, Engagements, and other Conventions, should be inserted among their demands.

The Ministers of the Protestant Allies were several times in conference together, to concert such measures as might be proper to be taken, during the course of this Congress, for the security of their Religion, and particularly an abolition of a clause in the fourth article of the treaty of Ryswick, prejudicial to the same: As likewise the making some provision, in their Negotiations with the Ministers of France, for the relief of the Protestants of that Kingdom. But, though these particulars were mentioned in the demands of the Protestant Allies, yet they were afterwards but faintly insisted on; and it was observed, that in this Negotiation, as in most former treaties, the Protestants shewed not an equal zeal for their religious concerns, as they did for their temporal interests.

On the 4th of March, the Ministers of the Allies met again, and Count Zinzendorf again insisted, That the restitution of the whole Spanish Monarchy should be expressly mentioned. The Dutch declared, They were resolved to make good all their treaties, made on occasion of this war, as well those that related to Spain and the Indies, as those made with Portugal; but the British were the only Ministers, that did not

"per ton on the Dutch shipping, that came into France, from the United Provinces, and foreign Countries.

"As to the commerce of Spain, and the Indies. The King will engage, not only to the States General, but likewise to her Britannic Majesty, and to all other Potentates, by virtue of the power he has in this particular, that the said commerce shall be allowed exactly, and carried on in the very same manner as it was under the Reign, and till the death of Charles II. and will promise, that the French shall submit, as all the other Nations, to the ancient laws and regulations made by the Kings, his Catholic Majesty's predecessors, with respect to the commerce and navigation of the Spanish Indies.

"His Majesty further consents, that all the Potentates of Europe may enter into the guaranty of this promise. His Majesty promises, that the King his grandson shall renounce, for the sake of the peace, all pretensions to the Kingdom of Naples, and Sardinia, as well as to the Duchy of Milan; in whose name he will consent, that the part of that Duchy, which is made over to the Duke of Savoy, shall remain to his Royal Highness; provided, that in consideration of this cession, the House of Austria do in like manner desist from all pretensions to the other parts of the Monarchy of Spain, from whence that House shall withdraw their troops immediately after the peace.

"The frontiers on both sides upon the Rhine shall be settled in the same condition, as they were before the present war.

"In consideration of all the terms above specified, the King demands, that the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria shall be re-established in the full and entire possession of their Dominions, Dignities, Prerogatives, Goods moveable and immoveable, which they enjoyed before the present war: And reciprocally his Majesty will recognize in Germany, and in Prussia, all the titles, which he has not yet acknowledged.

"The King will restore the Duke of Savoy what he has taken from him during this war; as in like manner his Royal Highness shall restore to him what "he has taken from France; so that the limits on both shall be the same they were before the declaration of war.

"All things as to Portugal shall be re-established, and remain on the same foot in Europe, that they were before the present war, as well with regard to France as to Spain: And as to the Dominions, which that Crown has in America, if there be any differences to settle, endeavours shall be used to agree them amicably.

"The King will consent freely, and bona fide, to take in concert with the Allies all the most just measures for hindering the Crowns of France and Spain from being ever united on the same Head; that is to say, that one and the same Prince shall never be at once King of both.

"All preceding treaties, that is, those of Munster, and others, that have been made since, shall be repeated and confirmed, to remain in their force and virtue, excepting only such articles, from which the treaty of peace, now to be made, shall derogate or alter something."

Signed,

UXELLES.

It may be observed, that the King of France here makes, as well as in the special Preliminaries, his first offers in the name, and by virtue of powers from his grandson as King of Spain. But how the British Plenipotentiaries could reconcile this to their instructions, and how their behaviour upon it was to be justified, is not very clear. See report of the committee of secrecy.

(1) The address was as follows:

Most gracious Sovereign,

"We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to represent to your Majesty the just indignation of this House, at the dishonourable treatment of your Majesty, and in having preposed to acknowledge your Majesty's title to these Realms, no sooner, than when the 1712. not make any mention of Spain and the Indies, contenting themselves with a general declaration concerning the just and reasonable satisfaction for the Queen's Allies, in Conformity to her Alliances. However, it is observable, that a few days after, upon the earnest instances of the Imperial Ministers, the British and Dutch Plenipotentiaries made a declaration (which was registered in the Protocol, kept by Monsieur Buy) importing, That by the clause of mutual guarantee, or claim, agreed to on the 3d, and inserted in their respective demands, they understood the restitution of Spain and the Indies to the House of Austria.

At the general Conference held the next day, the Ministers of the Allies delivered in writing, their specific demands which ran as high as the French explanation, another way. The Emperor asked the whole Spanish Monarchy; England asked the restoring Newfoundland, and the demolishing of Dunkirk; the States asked their whole barrier; and every Ally asked satisfaction to all the other Allies, as well as to himself: England and the States declared, that they demanded Spain, and the West-Indies, for the Emperor; so the high pattern set by the French, in their demands, was to the full imitated by the Allies. The French Plenipotentiaries declared they could not give in specific answers to so many demands of the Allies, till they had received new instructions from Paris and Madrid, and therefore desired till the 30th of March, N. S. to deliver them in, to which no objection was made (1).

When the 30th of March came, such of the Ministers of the Allies, as were not in the secret, were full of expectation, that the French Plenipotentiaries would give in a specific answer to their demands; but they were not a little surprised, when, instead of offering an answer in writing, Marshall d'Uxelles proposed to enter into verbal Conferences on the demands made on both sides. This indeed had been practised in treaties where mediators interposed, but that was not done till the main points were secretly agreed to. The Ministers of the Allies rejected this proposal, and demanded 'specific answers in writing.' Upon Polignac's saying, they would not answer in writing, their instructions being only to treat verbally, one of the Dutch Ministers proposed to break up the Congress: But he was soon taken down by the British Ministers, who could not agree with the Dutch in that particular; but said, on the contrary, they would enter into a Negotiation by way of dictating, as was done at the Hague, in the Conference with the Deputies of the States. However, the next day, at a meeting among themselves, they unanimously agreed upon a declaration, wherein they insisted, 'That an answer be delivered them in writing.' But at the next general Conference the French Ministers still refused to comply with this declaration, which was delivered to them by Monsieur Buy.

This refusal of the French raised a very great heat in the Assembly; and some Ministers gave it as their opinion, that such trifling was a sufficient ground to dissolve the Congress; for, the French Plenipotentiaries refusing to answer in the method all the Ministers of the Allies had agreed on, it would be fruitless, as well as dishonourable, for the latter to remain at Utrecht. However, the British Ministers were of opinion, that the Negotiations might be managed on the foot proposed by France; but, when they observed, that the tide ran too strong against them, and that the generality were of contrary sentiments, they concurred with the rest, and declared, that they had positive instructions to conform themselves to the general opinion of the Ministers of the Congress. According to this resolution, Mr Buy delivered a second declaration in the name of all the Allies, wherein they persisted to demand an answer in writing to their specific demands. In answer to this, the French Ministers declared, "That, as they had positive instructions not to engage themselves in a Negotiation in writing, they could not do it without new orders from the King their Master;" to which end they would immediately dispatch a Courier, to acquaint him with this last resolution of the Allies." Some of the Ministers of the Allies replied, "That they had reason to have expected, that they had not wanted such instructions; but, however, they were willing a longer time might be taken, if it were designed with purpose to answer effectually." The French Ministers replied, "That they could promise no more than to follow the instructions they should receive, since they did not expect the Allies would have dealt with them in so tyrannical a manner;" adding, "That they pleaded for no more than was practised at the treaties of Munster, Nimeguen,

"peace shall be signed. And we cannot forbear expressing our utmost resentment at the terms of peace offered to your Majesty, and your Allies, by the Plenipotentiaries of France: And we do, with the greatest zeal and affection, assure your Majesty, that this House will stand by, and assist your Majesty with our lives and fortunes, in carrying on this war, in conjunction with your Allies, till a safe and honourable peace can be obtained for your Majesty and your Allies."

The Queen's answer was to this effect:

My Lords,

"I return you my hearty thanks for the zeal you express for my honour, and for the assurance you give of supporting me. Pr. H. L.

(1) The French Ministers and their Partisans exclaimed against the demands of the Allies as unreasonable and exorbitant; but they excepted in a particular manner against the pretensions of the Allies, in favour of the French Protestants. The Abbot de Polignac, who had a Cardinal's Hat in view, and therefore could not fail on all occasions to shew his zeal for the Romish Church, appeared the most obstinate on that article; and discoursing one day with Vanderdussen, one of the Dutch Plenipotentiaries, about the demand, "That the French Protestants in the galleys, or detained in prison, should be set at liberty," asked him, "Whether the States would set at liberty the people detained in their Spin-houses, and Rasp-houses, if the French King should demand it?" Vanderdussen, justly resenting that odious comparison, told him, "That if the French Court would own the people detained in those Houses for their brethren, as the States owned for such the Protestants in the galleys, whom they interceded for, he did not question, but their High Mightinesses would set at liberty those malefactors." The French Abbot, being confounded with this answer, turned off the discourse to other matters.

"and Ryswick." But their assertion was proved to be wrong with respect to these treaties, where every thing was not altogether transacted by word of mouth, without writing. Besides, it was urged, that there were Mediators at those treaties, whereas there was none at Utrecht, which made this an irregular sort of a Congress. The Marshal d'Uxelles answered, "That they had no reason to deliver any thing in writing, since the Confederates made a bad use of the last, to inflame the people against them." To which one of the Imperial Ministers replied, "That the French had no more to do, but to give in just and reasonable proposals in writing; and then it would inflame the people against the Allies, if they refused to accept them." One of the Dutch Ministers having been so plain, as to tell the Marshal d'Uxelles, that the French Court would be deceived, if they expected a peace by tampering with some of the Allies, in order to divide them from the rest; the Marshal warmly replied, "That not only the present King of France, but even the whole Royal Family would enter into a vow to be revenged upon the Dutch, if they obstructed the peace." To which, one of the Confederate Ministers answered, "That such menacing discourses would only serve to keep the Dutch on their guard, and arm them against all future revenge, by inducing them to lay hold on this opportunity to crush that power which now threatened them." When these heats were over, the French Ministers promised again to write to the King, their Master, in order to know his pleasure on the subject in hand, in which the Ministers of the Allies were obliged to acquiesce. But it was agreed, that, unless some extraordinary occasion required it, no general Conference should be held on the 9th of April. On the 13th, another general Conference was held, in which nothing material was done; and the French Ministers, whose only business, it seems, was to gain time, proposed, that the next general conference, which was to be held the 16th, might be put off, as had been done before, unless the Allies had something particular to offer. This proposal not being agreed to, the general Conference was held, as usual, on the 16th, and the Ministers of the Allies enquiring again of those of France, whether they were ready to give specific answers in writing, the French Plenipotentiaries still excused themselves, on pretence of their not being yet fully instructed from the King, their Master, on that subject. The truth is, they knew very well, that their business was not to be done at Utrecht, but by a Negotiation carried on directly between London and Versailles. And it appears from the Report of the Committee of Secrecy, that the refusal of the French to give no answer in writing was no surprize to the British Ministers, whom they had before-hand advised with. The Earl of Strafford, in his letter to Mr Secretary St John, of the 25th of March, expressed himself thus: "I cannot help saying, I believe the French have taken the wisest part not to answer in writings, tho' most of the Ministers of the Allies will be surprized, expecting they should." And he said further; "I believe it is best they should first begin in the open Congress to reason upon some of the Allies demands, which will occasion so much difficulty, that the Ministers of the Allies will propose debating separately, which had better come from them than any else." And, when his Lordship sent an account, that a resolution was taken at the Hague, upon the French Minister's continuing obstinate, Mr St John, in his letter of April 5, expressed himself in this manner: "That he hoped the resolution, taken at the Hague to carry things to an extremity, was the last convulsive pang of an expiring faction." And yet this resolution was no more than to insist on a demand, in which all the Allies were unanimous, and in which the British Plenipotentiaries had themselves concurred. But what made the French thus persist in the resolution of giving no answer in writing, is accounted for in the Earl of Strafford's letter of the 27th of March, wherein he says, That the Pensionary was extremely desirous, that the French would answer in writing, which, it was his Lordship's opinion, they would evade, till they saw what success the Abbot Gaultier had at London: And, in his letter of the 30th, he said, "The French will avoid giving their answer in writing, till they see all agreed betwixt their Court and ours." And to shew, that the French were very well satisfied with the method, which their business was in, the Plenipotentiaries, in their letter of April 15, say, "They do not find the French are much convinced of the necessity of dispatch; and, when any thing is let fall of breaking off the Conference, they seem to take it with a great air of indifference, well-knowing their business was not to be done at Utrecht, but by a Negotiation carried on directly between London and Versailles." About the beginning of April, Mr Thomas Harley and the Abbé Gaultier arrived at Utrecht. For whose use and service Mr Harley had been so well employed at home, as has been already observed, and was now sent abroad, cannot be a doubt, since Mr Secretary St John thought it necessary to give Monsieur de Torcy an immediate account of his successful endeavours at home, and the business he was sent abroad to manage. In his letter of March the 4th, he tells Monsieur de Torcy, "That he had deferred writing of late, till he might write with certainty; till the necessary dispositions were made among our people at home; and till the Queen had taken the only resolution, which could bring us, in a short time, to a good and solid peace. I have now the satisfaction to tell you, that this resolution is taken; and that Mr Harley will carry with him this night or to-morrow morning the final instructions of the Queen to her Plenipotentiaries. I refer myself to Monsieur Gaultier, to explain to you more at large the subject of this Gentleman's Commission, and what the Queen hopes his Most Christian Majesty will do to co-operate with her." These instructions of Mr Harley do not appear; but it seems, the subject of them was not proper to be committed to writing; for which reason, as in almost all matters relating to the Pretender, it is referred to Monsieur Gaultier to explain them. But what was meant by the necessary dispositions made among our people here at home, is pretty well explained by Monsieur de Torcy, in a memorial dated the 28th of March, 1712, in answer to what was brought by Monsieur Gaultier, wherein he commends the prudent conduct of the Court of Great-Britain,

1712. in managing the House of Commons, and in particular their wife conduct in making known to the House of Commons, that the Nation was abused by its Allies; and says, "The King of France assures himself, that those, who now manage with so much capacity the affairs of the Queen of Great-Britain, know how to curb the passion of the turbulent party in the other House." A few days after Mr Harley's and the Abbé Gaultier's arrival at Utrecht, the French Plenipotentiaries communicated to the Lord Privy-Seal, and the Earl of Strafford, a plan for a general peace, to which they had added, by way of marginal notes, in a distinct column, what they were told would be absolutely necessary in order to a general peace. But this was intrusted to them under the highest obligation of secrecy, to discover nothing of it to the rest of the Allies. The British Plenipotentiaries accepted this plan as a mark of the great confidence, which France had in them, and readily engaged, that the Allies should not be permitted to know a word of it; and under the same caution sent it to Mr Secretary St John. But there was no room to doubt, but this plan, that was transmitted to England as a great discovery, was concerted here, and sent by Mr Harley to Utrecht, and by Gaultier to France.

Mr Secretary St John, being much concerned at the behaviour of the Allies, and the Dutch in particular, thought it proper to make one attempt more, as he called it, to gain them; and therefore ordered the Plenipotentiaries, in a letter of the 12th of April, to acquaint them, "That her Majesty would consent to their having Dendermond and Ghent, and, at the same time, depart from her pretensions to Ostend; and was willing, that the trade to Spain and the Spanish Indies be settled upon the same foot, as it subsisted at the death of the late King of Spain, in all respects, except the Assiento: And their Lordships were ordered to tell them in very plain terms, that her Majesty's measures would be taken according to the return they should make to the Queen on this occasion." But, at the same time, no communication at all was made to the States of the general plan of peace last delivered by the Abbé Gaultier, as there never had been of any other, although, in this last, the interests of all the Allies were settled and determined between Great-Britain and France. And, to shew how candidly the Queen's good Friends and Allies, the Dutch, as her Majesty was pleased to stile them, were dealt with, the 15 per Cent. upon all the goods and manufactures of Great-Britain, which was offered at first as one of the chief bribes to England to come into this destructive peace, Monsieur Mesnager had now explained away, and confined to such goods, as were carried, not to Spain, but to the Spanish West-Indies only; and, our Ministers finding, that France would not make this effectual, Mr Harley was ordered to let it drop. But to see the use, that was to be made of this insincerity of the French; at the same time, that Mr Secretary St John acquainted the British Plenipotentiaries with her Majesty's consent to give this up, he told them, in his letter of April 5, "But you will take care to do this in such a manner, as not only to get something for it another way, but also to render this concession of the Queen's a means of bringing the Dutch to reason, and

"to a compliance with her Majesty's measures." 1712. The Lord Privy-Seal on the 29th of April, acquainted Mr Secretary St John, that the Negotiation was at a stand, till the French Ministers were ready to return one answer or another. And, on the 10th of May, the British Plenipotentiaries say, "The French tell us, they cannot think of giving in their answer to the Allies, till they hear from England the success of Monsieur Gaultier; and you may believe we wait for it with no less impatience than they do."

The Secretary, on the 3d of May, acquainted their Excellencies: "I hope in a few days my dispatches will become more material, and, that we shall be able either to satisfy our friends at Utrecht, or not have reason to be much concerned at their uneasiness." This ended in Lord Strafford's being sent for into England; and the following orders were sent, on the 16th of May, to the Lord Privy-Seal for his farther conduct: "You are to stop all instances for procuring the Tariff of 1664, to the Dutch: You are to decline absolutely to confer any further with them upon any matter, till you receive the Queen's plan from hence; and that you will not, I hope, be long in expectation of: And her Majesty finds so ill a return made by the States to her condescension towards them, that she likewise orders your Lordship to take the first solemn opportunity of declaring to the Dutch Ministers, that all her offers for adjusting our differences were founded upon this express condition, that they came immediately into the Queen's measures, and acted openly and sincerely with her; and that she looks upon herself, from their conduct, now to be under no obligation whatsoever to them."

The summary then of this whole proceeding at Utrecht, in one short view, appears to be this: A Conference for general Conferences was necessary to be opened, that the Allies might in appearance, agreeable to the Grand Alliance, have the opportunity of treating and adjusting their several pretensions. The British Ministers were by their instructions to act in concert with the Allies; but they really acted in concert with the French Plenipotentiaries. The Allies giving in their specifick demands, was not to be avoided; but the French were to gain as much time as they possibly could, by unnecessary delays, and at last insist upon such a method of answering these demands, as they knew the Allies could not comply with. In the mean time the Negotiations were carrying on directly between England and France; or rather all the conditions dictated and prescribed by France, whilst the Allies were amused with a dispute about the method of answering, from which France would not, and they could not possibly, depart; in which England agreed with the rest of the Allies. All particulars, that concerned even the interest of the Allies, were transacted betwixt the Ministers of England and France, under the highest obligations of secrecy. The Dutch were pressed to come into the Queen's measures, without being acquainted what the Queen's measures were. And, because they would not consent to they knew not what, as soon as it was resolved to send orders to the Duke of Ormond not to engage in either siege or battle, and the great projects were ready to be executed on the other side

During the Congress at Utrecht, the preparations for the campaign were carried on by the Emperor and the States with all possible vigour: Prince Eugene, after having staid (as hath been related) three months in England in a fruitless Negotiation, was sent back with general and ambiguous promises. The States gave him the supreme command of their army, and assured him, that, in the execution of the project that was concerted among them, he should be put under no restraint by their Deputies or Generals, and that no cessation of arms should be ordered, till all was settled by a general peace. The Duke of Ormond followed him in April, well satisfied both with his instructions and his appointments; for he had the same allowances, that had been lately voted criminal in the Duke of Marlborough.

At this time the Pretender was taken ill of the Small-pox: He recovered of them; but his Sister, who was taken with the same disease, died of it: She was, by all that knew her, admired as a most extraordinary person in all respects; inasmuch, that a very great character was spread of her, by those who talked but indifferently of the Pretender himself: Thus he lost a great strength, which he procured to him, from all who saw or conversed with her.

Before we proceed to the operations of the Campaign, it will be proper to give an account of the Convocation, which was held with this Session of Parliament.

Protest-
in

There was a doubt suggested, whether the Queen's licence did still subsist, after a prorogation by a Royal writ: The Attorney-General gave his opinion, that it was still in force; upon which, the Bishops went on with the resolution, in which the former Session had ended, and sent back to the Lower-House a paper, which had been sent to them from that House in the former Session, with such amendments, as they thought proper: But then Atterbury started a new notion, That as, in a Session of Parliament, a prorogation put an end to all matters not finished, so that they were to begin all anew; the same rule was to be applied to Convocations, in pursuance of his favourite notion, that the proceedings in parliament were likewise to be observed amongst them. The Bishops did not agree to this; for, upon searching their books, they found a course of precedents to the contrary: And the schedule, by which the Archbishop prorogued them, when the Royal writ was sent him, did, in express words, continue all things, in the state in which they were then, to their next meeting. Yet this did not satisfy Atterbury and his party; so the Lower-House ordered him to lay the matter before the Attorney-General for his opinion; he did that very partially, for he did not shew him the paper sent down by the Bishops; he only gave him a very defective abstract of it: Whereupon the Attorney-General gave him such an answer as he desired, by which it was very plain, that he was not rightly informed about it. The Bishops resolved to adhere to the method of former Convocations, and not to begin matters afresh, that had been formerly near finished. By this means they were at a full stop, so that they could not determine those points, which had been recommended to them by the Queen: But they entered upon new ones. As an act had passed for building fifty new Churches, an office was prepared for consecrating Churches and Church-yards.

The censure that passed on Whiston, in the former Session, was (as hath been said) laid before the Queen for her approbation. But, at the opening of this Session, in December, the Bishops finding no return was come from the Throne, sent two of their number to receive her Majesty's pleasure in that matter. The Archbishop was so ill of the gout, that he came not to the Convocation all the winter. The Queen had put the censure into the hands of some of her Ministers, but could not remember to whom she gave it: So a new extract was sent to her, and she said, she would send her pleasure upon it very speedily: But none came this Session. So all further proceedings were stopped, since the Queen did not confirm what was done.

There appeared at this time an inclination, in many of the Clergy, to a nearer approach towards the Church of Rome; Hickes, an ill-tempered man, who was now at the head of the Jacobite party, had in several books promoted a notion, that there was a proper sacrifice made in the Eucharist, and had on many occasions studied to lessen our aversion to Popery: The Supremacy of the Crown in Ecclesiastical matters, and the method, in which the Reformation was carried, was openly condemned; one Brett had preached a Sermon, in several of the Pulpits of London, which he afterwards printed; in which he pressed the necessity of priestly absolution, in a strain beyond what was pretended to even in the Church of Rome: He said no Repentance could serve without it, and affirmed, that the Priest was vested, with the same power of Pardoning, that our Saviour himself had. A motion was made in the Lower-House of Convocation, to censure this; but it was so ill supported, that it was let fall. Another conceit was taken up, of the invalidity of Lay-baptism, on which several books have been writ; nor was the dispute a trifling one, since, by this notion, the Teachers among the Dissenters passing for Lay-men, this went to the re-baptizing them and their congregations (1).

(1) Dadwell gave the rise to this conceit; he was a very learned man, and led a strict life; he seemed to hunt after paradoxes in all his writings, and broached not a few; he thought none could be saved, but those who, by the Sacraments, had a federal right to it; and that these were the Seals of the Covenant: So that he left all, who died without the Sacraments, to the uncovenanted mercies of God; and to this he added, that none had a right to give the Sacraments, but those who were commissioned to it; and these were the 1712. The Bishops thought it necessary to put a stop to this new and extravagant doctrine; so a declaration was agreed to, first against the irregularity of all Baptism by persons, who were not in Holy orders; but that yet, according to the practice of the Primitive Church, and the constant usage of the Church of England, no Baptism (in or with water, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost) ought to be reiterated. The Archbishop of York at first agreed to this; so it was resolved to publish it in the name of all the Bishops of England; but he was prevailed on to change his mind; and refused to sign it, pretending that this would encourage irregular Baptism: So the Archbishop of Canterbury, with most of the Bishops of his province, resolved to offer it to the Convocation. It was agreed to in the Upper-House, the Bishop of Rochester only dissenting: But, when it was sent to the Lower-House, they would not so much as take it into consideration, but laid it aside; thinking that it would encourage those, who struck at the dignity of the Priesthood. This was all that passed in Convocation.

The Earl of Strafford's Conference at the Hague.

On the 26th of April, the Earl of Strafford went from Utrecht to the Hague, and, in several Conferences he had with the Pensionary and other Ministers, earnestly pressed the States to come into the Queen's measures. This, together with the secret methods, that were used to hinder the States of Brabant from supplying the Imperial troops, that were marching into the Netherlands, with bread and forage, did not a little increase the jealousies of the States, who two days after thought fit to send a solemn deputation to the Earl of Strafford, to know what the Queen's measures were? The Earl not having yet orders to explain himself, and being under an engagement of secrecy with the French Plenipotentiaries, made no scruple to declare, in conformity to a late letter from the Queen to the States, "That her Majesty's intentions were, that her troops should act with the same vigour against France, as if there was no negotiation on foot." This declaration the Earl repeated the same evening in another long Conference with Prince Eugene of Savoy, Count Zinzendorf, the States Deputies, and the Council of State; and on the 21st of April returned to Utrecht. Several other Ministers, who went to the Hague, to confer with Prince Eugene, returned also to the place of Congress, in order to assist at the general Conference, which was held there the 23d of the same month. The Ministers of the Allies having again inquired of those of France, whether they were yet ready to give their answer in writing; and being answered in the negative; it was proposed and agreed to, that the general meetings should for some time be suspended, till the French Plenipotentiaries should give notice, that they were prepared. In the mean time the Confederate Ministers held some intermediate Conferences among themselves, and made frequent journeys from Utrecht to the Hague, and from the Hague to Utrecht; not without a well-grounded jealousy of the intimacy and close correspondence, which appeared to be between the Ministers of France and those of Great-Britain; the effects of which were soon after manifested to the amazement of all Christendom.

About the middle of April the Confederate The Allies take the field. forces began to march into the field, and Prince Eugene of Savoy set out from the Hague on the 22d of that month, in order to put himself at the head of the army. The Duke of Ormond, Cond. of the D. of Ormond. being appointed to command the Queen's forces in Flanders, received his instructions on the 7th of April, whereby he was ordered "to repair with all possible diligence to the Hague, and to acquaint the Pensionary, that he had received her Majesty's orders to see him, before he went to put himself at the head of her Majesty's troops, and to express to him her resolution of pushing the war with all possible vigour, until the enemy should agree to such terms of peace, as might be safe and honourable for herself and her Allies; to assure him, that he was prepared to live in a perfect and good correspondence with all the Generals of the Allies, and particularly with those of the States; and to desire the Pensionary to inform him, what plan had been agreed upon for the operations of the Campaign: And as soon as he arrived at the Frontier, to meet with Prince Eugene, and such others of the Generals, as should be in the secret, and with them to concert the proper measures for entering upon action." The Duke left London on the 9th of April, and in three days arrived at the Hague, where having visited the Pensionary, he gave him, according to his instructions, all the assurances of carrying on the war with vigour, and acting in confidence with all the Allies, and more especially the Dutch: Which were received with the greatest professions of duty and respect the Apostles, and after them Bishops and Priests ordained by them: It followed upon this, that Sacraments administered by others were of no value. He pursued these notions so far, that he asserted that the souls of men were naturally mortal, but that the immortalizing virtue was conveyed by baptism, given by persons Episcopally ordained. And yet, after all this, which carried the Episcopal function so high, he did not lay the original of that government, on any instruction or warrant in the Scripture: But thought it was set up, in the beginning of the second Century, after the Apostles were all dead. He wrote very doubtfully of the time, in which the canon of the New Testament was settled; he thought it was not before the second Century, and that an extraordinary inspiration was continued in the Churches to that very time, to which he ascribed the original of Episcopacy. This strange and precarious system was in great credit among us; and the necessity of the Sacrament, and the invalidity of Ecclesiastical functions, when performed by persons, who were not Episcopally ordained, were entertained by many with great applause: This made the Dissenters pass for no Christians, and put all thoughts of reconciling them to us far out of view: And several little books were spread about the Nation, to prove the necessity of re-baptizing them, and that they were in a state of damnation till that was done; but few were, by these arguments, prevailed upon to be re-baptized: This struck even at the Baptism by Midwives in the Church of Rome; which was practised and connived at here in England, till it was objected in the Conference, held at Hampton-Court, soon after King James the First's Accession to the Crown, and Baptism was not till then limited to persons in Orders: Nothing of this kind was so much as mentioned in the year 1660, when a great part of the Nation had been baptized by Dissenters; but it was now promoted with much heat. Burnet, Vol. II. 604.

He had also a Conference with the Council of State, who told him, "That there was no particular resolution taken as to the operations of the campaign, but they left it to their Generals, who, with their Deputies, were to act in concert with the Generals of the Allies: And that they had given orders to their Generals to live in a good correspondence with his Grace." The President of the week made many excuses for their having given the command of their army to Prince Eugene; but however he said, "That, as to the point of command, his Grace and the Prince were now upon an equal foot." About this time the Duke received a letter from Mr Cadogan, who had been some time before left out of the establishment of Lieutenant-Generals, desiring his interest for being employed under him this Campaign. The Duke readily complied with his request, and soon obtained the Queen's leave for his serving in that post. The Duke resolving to take the field as soon as possible, left the Hague, and arrived at Ghent the 3d of May; and after a stay there of two or three days, and securing the Government of the Citadel in English hands, went on to Tournay, where he met Prince Eugene, and the Deputies of the States. All the English forces, for some weeks, had been in the field, and lay cantoned along the road between this City and Lille. And the reason of drawing them out of their quarters so early was, that there had been a project formed to take post at Oisy, on the Senfette, which would have secured the march over the Scheldt, and might have given the Allies an opportunity of seizing Cambray. Lieutenant-General Cadogan did not in the least question the success of it. But, the Dutch making many difficulties and delays in this affair, Villars had prevented the design, and taken possession of Oisy, and of all the passes on the Senfette.

On the 17th of May, Prince Eugene and Monsieur Végelin came to the Duke of Ormond, and it was agreed between them to pass the Scheldt near Bouchain, in order to encamp at Aveugle le Sec, and see whether the Confederates could attack the enemy without great disadvantage; or, should the enemy be too strongly posted, it was proposed to invest Quehuoy, which, being a little place, could not hold out above three weeks at most after the opening of the trenches: In order to these motions, the proportion of the two Armies to be commanded by the Prince and Duke being settled (1), the necessary directions were given for assembling all the troops, passing the Scarpe, and forming the armies on the 21st between Doway and Marchiennes, where Prince Eugene and the Duke of Ormond designed to join their respective forces, and there concert such further measures, as might be requisite for carrying on the service of the campaign.

The Duke had, some days before, received two expresses from Mr Secretary St John, who in his letter of the 16th of April, told his Grace, "That he found, by very certain intelligences from Holland, that the Dutch Ministers were not without their fears of their new General: That they began to consider, he was a Papist, and a German, at least in interest: That the Emperor, his Master, had nothing to lose on the side of the Netherlands: That a battle won might give ground for insisting on higher terms than the House of Austria was now likely to obtain: That a battle lost might still contribute to prolong the war; and that, in either case, the expence of blood would fall to the share of the Queen and States: That he was of opinion, that these reflections had occasioned private direction to their Generals, to use more caution than the Prince would perhaps approve: And that his Grace might see, that this measure was not very consistent with the compliment of an unlimited command, made to that Prince by Mr Laubner, in the name of the States." And, on the 25th of April, O. S. (which was before it was known, that France had agreed so much as to propose to the King of Spain the alternative of the two Monarchies, which was not till the 18th of May) Mr Secretary St John began to give the Duke of Ormond some distant hint of the scene, which was afterwards to be opened, and told him, "That the Queen inclined to be of opinion, that all the troops, whether subjects or foreigners, belonging to her, should be immediately under his Grace's command. That there might have been formerly reasons for using a different method; but there seemed at present to be some of a very strong nature for taking this; and perhaps these might every day grow still stronger. That there could be no need for him to enter into the grounds, which they had, in this conjuncture, to be jealous of Prince Eugene's conduct: His Grace would see and know them all better than they could be repeated; but that on this occasion the Queen directed him to inform his Grace, that she thought, he was to be more cautious, for some time, of engaging in any action, unless in the case of a very apparent and considerable advantage, because he would daily be strengthened by the arrival of the Imperial troops: And it was but just, these should have their part, if any thing of that kind was to happen. That the great article of preventing the Union of the two Monarchies, was not yet entirely settled; the expedients were hard of digestion to the French stomachs; but, if this was got over, he did not see any formidable difficulty in the way." The Duke returned an answer to these dispatches, wherein he gave an account, what the Dutch had done in regard to the point of command: "That he was entirely of the Secretary's opinion,

(1) The Duke had under him the following troops, consisting of those in the Queen's pay, and of those paid jointly by her Majesty and the States, together with a regiment of Hussars: English, 22 Battalions and 19 Squadrons; Danes, 9 battalions and 21 squadrons; Prussians, 10 battalions and 36 squadrons; Saxons, 7 battalions and 12 squadrons; Hanoverians, 14 battalions and 29 squadrons; Hessein, 2 battalions and 8 squadrons; Wolfenbutter, 2 battalions; Wallons, 4 squadrons; Anspach, 2 battalions and 4 squadrons; Nassau Dillenburgh, 1 battalion; Ottinghen, 1 battalion; and Hussars, 5 squadrons: In all 70 battalions, and 138 squadrons.

 " at this time make very great alterations in the " treaties now on foot. But that the Secretary " might remember, that in his Instructions he " was ordered to act in conjunction with the " Allies, in prosecuting the war with vigour; so " that, should there happen a fair opportunity " to attack the enemy, he could not decline it,
 " if proposed by the Prince and States: But he " hoped to hear from him by a messenger, be" fore the armies were formed, which would be " on the 21st." The Duke added, in a second " letter of May the 20th, " That, if there were a " good opportunity to attack the enemy, and " get into France, by the way of Champagne, he " was sure, the Prince and the States would " press it, unless they heard from England, that " the peace was near being concluded: That he " wished it very heartily; but, if it were de" layed, he hoped, he should have the good " fortune to force the French to comply with the " Queen's demands."

The armies having marched on the day appointed, the Duke took his quarters at Marchiennes, where, in concert with Prince Eugene, and the foreign Generals, he resolved to go nearer the enemy; and it was agreed, that the two armies should pass the Scheld, and encamp, the right of Prince Eugene's at Neufville, and the left of the Duke of Ormond's at Solemes, where they had the river Selle in their rear. But, on the 24th of of May, in the evening an express came from Mr Secretary St John, with a letter dated May 10, O. S. to acquaint the Duke, " That, since " her Majesty had reason to believe, that she " should come to an agreement upon the great
 " article of preventing the Union of the two " Monarchies, as soon as a Courier sent from " Versailles to Madrid could return, it was her " Majesty's positive command, that he should avoid " engaging in any siege, or hazarding a battle, till
 " he received further orders from England." The Secretary acquainted the Duke likewise, " That the Queen would have him disguise the " receipt of this order; and that she thought " he could not want pretences for conducting " himself so, as to answer her ends, without " owning that, which might at present have an " ill effect, if it was publicly known. That " she could not think with patience of sacrificing
 " men, when there was a fair prospect of ob" taining her purpose another way; nor would
 " she suffer herself to be exposed to the re" proach of having retarded, by the events of " the Campaign, a Negotiation, which might " have been as good as concluded in few days." He added, " That this order was communicated
 " at the same time to the Court of France; so " that, if the Marshal de Villars should take any " private notice of it, the Duke was to answer
 " accordingly."

On the 25th of May, N. S. the Duke wrote two letters to Mr Secretary St John, a private and a public letter. In the first, which was his private letter, and all written with his own hand, he " acknowledged the receipt of the Secretary's " orders, not to engage in siege or battle; to " which he promised an exact obedience, and " to keep secret his having received any such " command; and that he would endeavour to " hinder its being suspected. But that Prince " Eugene and the States having proposed to " attack the enemy; or, if that be found too Numb. LXIX. Vol. IV.

" hazardous, to besiege Quefnoy, he feared it " would be very difficult for him to disguise the " true reason of opposing all proposals, that " should be made for undertaking any thing, ha" ving no excuse for delays, all the troops expect" ed and the heavy cannon, being to be there on " Saturday. And that, if he could have found " forage there, he would have made some pre-
 " tence to delay the march, though the dispo" sitions of it were made before he received this " letter." But, on the same day, the Duke wrote another public letter to the Secretary, after he had received the letter of the 10th, wherein he took no notice of his orders, not to engage in siege or battle, but spoke of his having reviewed the English troops, and found them in so good a condition, as must convince all the Allies, how groundless the complaints were, that had been made of our backwardness, " of which,
 " he said, I believe you will now hear no more." And he added, " If we find an opportunity to " bring the enemy to a battle, we shall not de" cline it." On the 28th of May, N. S. the Duke in his letter to the Secretary said, " Yesterday Prince Eugene, and the States-Deputies desired, that I would consent to send the " Quarter-masters to view the French Camp;
 " which I could not refuse, without giving them
 " some suspicion of what I am ordered to dis" guise; but I was sure, that nothing of action " could happen, the enemy being behind the " Scheld. The detachment, that went with " them, were forty squadrons, and all the gren-" adiers of my army to support them, and " make good their retreat, should the enemy
 " have endeavoured for to have attacked them.
 " They went as far (I mean the horse) as Catelet, where the right of the enemy's army
 " lies, and are come back without seeing any of " the French on our side the Scheld. The di" stance between the head of the Somme, and that " of the Scheld, is not above a league and a half,
 " which is a plain, and the enemy have not yet
 " offered to throw up any retrenchment. May " be to-morrow they will begin to work, since " they have seen our troops reconnoitring that " way." Prince Eugene and the Deputies being to dine with the Duke the next day, he was under apprehensions, that they would press him to undertake something immediately, which it would be very hard to conceal the true reason of his refusing, having no reasonable excuse for it.
 In this letter he gave an account of a letter, which he had received from the Marshal Villars, and the answer, which he had written to the Marshal. For May the 25th, N. S. the Marshal acquainted the Duke, " That he had the King's " orders, and the Queen's consent, to write to " him, as soon as he received the Courier; and,
 " whatever glory was to be acquired against a
 " General, whose valour was so well known a" mong them, he desired him to be assured,
 " that he never received more agreeable news,
 " than that they were to be no longer enemies:
 " And that it was the King's particular injunc" tion to him to keep this matter with an in" violable secrecy." The Duke, according to the intimation given him by Mr St John, answered, " That he had received orders on that " subject from the Queen, and should be sure " to conform himself punctually to them: But " the keeping the secret enjoined would very " much depend on the measures the Marshal
 " him-

1712. "himself should take. The Duke, on his part, "let him know, that the march, he should be "obliged to make, was chiefly for the substance of the troops; and that the Marshal need not be in any apprehensions on that account; at least, the Duke would answer for the army, which he had the honour to command." It is impossible to account for this transaction, unless the Duke had orders, not only not to act against France, but to give the French General intelligence of all that was designed in the Confederate army. The report being made by the Quarter-Masters General, who went with the detachment to view the French Camp, and they all agreeing, that the ground was as advantageous as could be, their situation being such, as gave an opportunity of falling upon their flank and rear, it was proposed to the Duke to march without delay to the enemy, and to attack them. What the Duke did upon this occasion appears from his letter of May the 20th, N. S. to Mr St John: "You may easily imagine, says he, the difficulty, that I was under to excuse the delaying a matter, which, according to the informations I had from the Quarter-Masters-General, and several other General Officers, that went out with the detachment, seemed to be so practicable.
 The best excuse I could make was Lord Strafford's sudden voyage to England, which gave me reason to believe there must be something of consequence transacting, which a delay of four or five days would bring to light: And therefore I desired they would defer this undertaking, or any other, till I should receive fresh letters from England, since so short a delay could not be of any ill consequence." Upon which both Prince Eugene, and the States Deputies, told the Duke plainly, "That his answer was agreeable to the suspicions they had for some time entertained, particularly since the express of the 24th, which they knew had brought him letters from England." And they were the more confirmed in these suspicions, because Marshal Villars, "who had on all occasions shewn himself very vigilant, did not send out a man to observe their motions, nor take any other precautions to secure his Camp, where it lay so much exposed; and he could not be ignorant, how strong a detachment had been abroad on that side." The Duke could not divert the proposal, which had been made to fall upon the French army, by offering to undertake a siege; since Quefney, the place to be attacked, was within less than three leagues of the army, and all things necessary for a siege were already at Marchiennes; so that the consequence of this offer would have been the immediate investing of that place, which was as contrary to the Queen's last orders, as a battle.
 Prince Eugene, and the Deputies seemed extremely dissatisfied with the Duke's answer, and said, "They were obliged to give an account of what had passed, and of the delays made by the Duke, to their Masters, by express." In this posture things continued for some days, when, on the 4th of June, N. S. two of the Deputies made a visit to the Duke; and, in the evening, sent him a long Memorial, containing the substance of their discourse with him. In this they told the Duke, "That, by order of their Masters, they represented to him, with how great a degree of surprize the States had received the news of his declaring, he would undertake nothing, till he had letters from England, and of his refusing to assist either in a siege or a battle. That it seemed to them incomprehensible and unaccountable, why the Allies should lose such an apparent opportunity they had,

 as well in regard to the goodness and number of their troops, as the situation of the armies, to gain some great advantage over the enemy, which, if once neglected, might for ever be irretrievable. That they could by no means conceive his orders was so strict, as to tie up his hands, when so fair an occasion of annoying the enemy presented itself: And that, in their opinion, such orders ought to be understood in the best sense, so as enjoin the declining any attempt for some little time, provided no great prejudice might redound by that means to the common cause; but in no wise to justify the sitting still with their arms across, in such a situation, where inaction would cut off all hopes of their being able to attempt any thing for the future; since, if the army continued inactive for any time, the forage would be consumed, and the operations for the rest of the campaign would be rendered not only difficult, but impracticable. Besides, the enemy would have time to intrench and fortify their Camp, as much as they pleased. That the States had ordered them to in-force these arguments with others, and particularly with this, That the army, his Grace commanded, consisted not only of her Majesty's national troops, but, for the most part, of such, as were in the joint pay of her Majesty and the States, the command of which indeed belonged to his Grace, as General in chief; but, as those troops were engaged by both powers jointly, to make war, and act against the enemy, they could not be exempted from that service by his Grace alone, without the knowledge and consent of the States; at least, without contradicting the treaties and the ends, by and for which they were engaged. That not only the treaty of the Grand Alliance, but others made between her Majesty and the States, obliged her Majesty to push on the war with vigour; but the declaration his Grace made, that he could not act till farther orders, at a time, when, by his Grace's own approbation, they had marched just within sight of the enemy, and when there was so fair a prospect of success, if something were attempted, could not, they thought, be reconciled either with those treaties, or the repeated assurances, which her Majesty had given them by letters, by my Lord Strafford, and by his Grace, lately at the Hague. Therefore they desired his Grace, if he had any regard to those treaties and assurances, which ought to be kept sacred, to push on the war with vigour, offensively against the enemy; but that, if his Grace persisted in his resolution of not acting offensively, they desired to know, whether he would consent, that the troops under him might be employed to cover a siege, which they would undertake; and whether he would give a promise to attack the enemy, if they came to disturb them. That, in case his Grace refused, they did in the most solemn manner, and in the strongest terms, protest against the irreparable damage, which such a conduct would occasion to the Confederacy.

"That, in order the better to guide themselves, they demanded to know precisely, what his orders were; how far they reached; and what dependance the States might have on her Majesty's troops for the future: And lastly, they required, on their part, that his Grace would not hinder the troops in the joint pay from acting agreeably to the reason of war, and their solemn treaties and engagements. The conclusion of the Memorial was, that the States had ordered this representation to be made in writing to his Grace, that all the world and posterity might see, that they have been so far from being guilty of the great injury, which the common cause receives from the present inaction, that they have done all in their power to prevent it; and that others are to answer for all the unhappy consequences of it." To the substance of this Memorial, expressed before by the Deputies in their discourse with the Duke, he could only answer, "that, before he entered upon action, he should be glad to receive letters from England, which he expected every moment." And this was all the satisfaction he was then at liberty to give to their demands, bound up, as he was, by his last instructions. The Duke immediately dispatched a messenger to England, with an account of what had passed, hoping, That, before they came to any extremities, he should have his final orders, and recommending it as a matter of the greatest importance, both to the public and himself, that he should know her Majesty's pleasure as soon as might be.

In the mean time, Prince Eugene and the States Deputies pressed the Duke continually for a positive answer, representing, at the same time, the goodness and superiority of the Confederate troops, which could not be contradicted; and concluding, "that the Duke must have orders not to do any thing, though he would not own them; since they knew, he could not otherwise answer for his inaction." In debating this matter, one of the Deputies took, as the Duke thought, too much liberty in censuring the proceedings of England; which he was desired to forbear, as being no way agreeable to that good understanding, which was so necessary to be kept up between the Queen and the States. While the Duke was under this uneasiness, on the 7th of June, N. S. a letter came from Mr St John, dated the 17th of May, O. S. which expressed "the impatience her Majesty was in to hear, whether the orders, sent on the 10th of May, came safely and early to his hands, and the assurance she had of his punctual obedience to her commands in so nice and important a conjuncture." The Duke returned an answer the next day, representing, "That things were now come to great extremity: That he could not avoid seeing every day fresh marks of the ill blood and dissatisfaction caused among the Allies, by the measures he was obliged to observe: That many of them did not scruple to say, We were betraying them; and this ferment seemed rather likely to increase, than diminish; and,

"considering the circumstances we were in, it was hard to say, what might be the consequences of it: That, let the peace, which he was in daily expectation to hear of, be never so advantageous, he was apprehensive, that, if the Allies should pretend to dislike it, he could not depend upon any troops, but those composed of her Majesty's own subjects. And what confirmed him in this opinion was, that he was well informed, that if, the Elector of Hanover did not approve of the peace, his troops would have orders to serve with the Dutch, and would likewise be augmented by all that Prince could spare from other parts; and he was not without suspicion, that endeavours were likewise using to gain the Danes." The close of his letter was in these words: "By this and my former you may guess, how uneasy a situation I am in; and, if there be no prospect of action, I do not see of what use I am here; and, if it suit with her Majesty's service, I should be glad, I might have leave to return to England. But in this, and all other matters, I shall readily submit to her Majesty's pleasure. I am impatient to hear from you what I am to depend upon."

Prince Eugene and the Deputies having resolved to besiege Quefnoy (1), the town was invested on the 8th of June, by a detachment from the two armies, consisting of thirty battalions, and as many squadrons, under the command of General Fagel. The Duke, though he had no part in carrying on the siege, yet could not refuse furnishing seven battalions and nine squadrons of the troops in the joint pay of England and the States, but avoided sending any of those, which were in the Queen's whole pay.

On the 10th, a letter came from Marshal Villars, wherein he let the Duke know, "He had received several advices, that Quefnoy was invested; and that part of the troops in his Grace's army was employed in that service: That, by order of his Master, he desires to know of him, if any troops under his command have a share in undertaking or forming that siege; for he could not think, Prince Eugene would venture to attempt it with those forces alone, which he commands. He therefore begs his Grace would explain this matter to him, that he may know how to act, and take his measures, according as Prince Eugene perseveres in, or desists from, this enterprize. He adds, that a Courier went from Paris the morning before, with the answer of Spain to the Queen, which, it was supposed, would be satisfactory." The Duke's answer was, "That, as the Marshal observed himself, of what consequence it was to keep this affair secret, he would leave him to judge, whether he could have done it better, than by the conduct he had observed. That it was true, that for the siege of Quefnoy, which it was not in his power to prevent, he had furnished some troops, which were paid in part by the States, but not one single man solely in the Queen's pay. That he thought, since the

He concludes, "He was surprized, upon the Duke of Wirtemberg's informing him, that the Marshal had said to one of that Duke's Trumpets, that the English would do the French no hurt, nor the French them: That himself had such orders, and did not doubt, but the Duke of Ormond had the same." The Marshal, in another letter the next day, denied, "That he had ever seen or heard of any Trumpet from the Duke of Wirtemberg: That this was a mere invention of those, who had a mind to give a reputation to the Dutch Gazettes, in which it had been affirmed, that his Grace had shewed Prince Eugene his orders, not to engage in any attempt. He desires to be informed by his Grace, whether the army under his command would oppose any attempt, which the King's forces would certainly make upon Prince Eugene's, if he continued the siege: And adds, that the King, while he sees Prince Eugene undertaking a siege, and knows the army under his Grace ought not to act, directly or indirectly, against his, would be very much displeased with him, if he should continue unactive."

Bristol's declaration to the Dutch Ministers.
June 2.

By this time the Dutch Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht having, by order of the States, expostulated with the Bishop of Bristol, about the Duke of Ormond's refusing to assist the Confederates in any undertaking against the enemy: The Bishop answered, "that he knew nothing of the matter, and would represent it to the Queen." But, at the same time, he took occasion to let them know, "That, two days before, he had received an express, with a letter from her Majesty, in which she complained, that notwithstanding all the advances she had made from time to time to the States, in order to engage them to enter with her upon a plan of peace, their High Mightinesses had not answered her as they ought, and as her Majesty hoped they would. That therefore they ought not to be surprized, if her Majesty did now think herself at liberty to enter into separate measures, in order to obtain a peace for her own convenience." Upon this, the Plenipotentiaries of the States represented to the Bishop, "That such a step would be contrary to all the Alliances and Treaties betwixt their High Mightinesses and the Queen: That they thought they had merited otherwise by the deference, which, on all occasions, they had shewed to her Majesty; and that they knew nothing of the advances, which the Bishop said her Majesty had made towards the States, on the subject of a plan of peace." The Bishop replied, "That he must not forget to tell them, his instructions did further bear, that, considering the conduct of the States towards her Majesty, she thought herself disengaged from all Alliances and Engagements with their High Mightinesses." The Bishop did not, in express words, name the Barrier Treaty; but he did not except it: So they reckoned it was included in the general words he had used.

The Lord Bishop's answer and declaration, being, by express, brought to the Hague the night between the 2d and 3d of June, was, the next morning, communicated to the Ministers of the Allies; several Conferences were held, and private measures concerted between the States, the Elector of Hanover, the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and some other Princes of the Empire, for the subsisting and maintaining the foreign troops in the pay of Great-Britain; so that the Confederate army should suffer no other diminution, than by the troops of Great-Britain, which did not amount to above twelve thousand men. In the mean time, the States-General wrote a long letter to the Queen, which, on the 5th of June, they sent, by an express to their Envoy in London, with orders to deliver it into her own hands. And Count Zinzendorf, who had likewise received an account of what had passed in the army, went from Utrecht to the Hague, on the 1st of June, N. S. and dispatched the next day three expresses, one to the Emperor, another to Prince Eugene, and the third to the Imperial Minister in London. And the Baron de Hobendorff, Adjutant-General to Prince Eugene, who came over with a Commission from Vienna, to solicit the payment of the subsidy voted by the House of Commons for the war in Spain, being on his departure for London, Count Zinzendorf gave him likewise fresh instructions about the present juncture of affairs.

The British Court having, on the 25th of May, O. S. received an express from Holland, the Queen did not come, as usual, to St James's Chapel, but held a Council at Kensington. Two days after the Baron de Hobendorff arrived in London, and in the afternoon was in Conference with the Lord-Treasurer, who gave him fair hopes. The same afternoon Van Borstelen, Envoy from the States, was also in Conference with the Treasurer on the subject of what he had represented the evening before in a private audience (1); upon which orders were sent to the Duke of Ormond to concur with the General of the Allies in a siege. In the mean time the news of what had happened in the army being spread abroad, and having occasioned a general surprize, the Lord Hallifax acquainted the House of Peers, "That May 27, O. S. he had matters of great importance to lay before them;" and desired, that the Members might be summoned to attend the service of the House the next day. The Peers being in a full House on the 28th of May, the Lord Hallifax made a speech, wherein he first took notice of the strange declaration made in the army by the Duke of Ormond; then shewed the ill consequences of such a proceeding, and the necessity of carrying on the war with vigour; and concluded with a motion for an address, "humbly to desire her Majesty to lay before the House the orders she had sent to the General, and to order him to act offensively in concert with the Allies." When he had done speaking, some

(1) The Treasurer, among other things, said to him, when he complained of the Bishop of Bristol's declarations, "The Bishop was certainly in a very bad

"humour, when he talked at that rate." Burnet, Vol. II. 608.

1712. some objections were raised as to the matter of fact; but, though the Lord Hallifax did not want proofs, having, among others, a copy of Prince Eugene's letter, yet he did not think proper to produce it; and some other Whig Lords contented themselves with pressing those in the Ministry to acquaint the House, Whether any orders of restraint had been sent to the Duke of Ormond? The Treasurer, who was most concerned in this affair, answered, "That they, who had the honour to serve the Queen, could not reveal the orders she gave to her General without a particular direction from her Majesty; and that, in his opinion, those orders were not fit to be divulged. That, however, he would adventure to say, that, if the Duke of Ormond had refused to act offensively, he did not doubt, but he had followed his instructions: And it was prudence not to hazard a battle upon the point of concluding a good peace, especially considering they had to deal with an enemy so apt to break his word." The Earl of Wharton said, "He was extremely glad to find that noble Lord so candid, as to acknowledge the insincerity of France: But that, in his opinion, this was a strong reason for keeping no measures with such an enemy, but rather for pushing him with the utmost vigour, till he was reduced to the necessity of dealing honestly." The Treasurer replied, "Though the Duke of Ormond might have refused to hazard a general action, yet he could be positive, he would not decline joining with the Allies in a siege, orders having been sent him for that purpose." The Duke of Marlborough said, "He did not know how to reconcile the orders, not to hazard a battle, and to join in a siege, to the rules of war; since it was impossible to make a siege, without either hazarding a battle, in case the enemy attempted to relieve the place, or shamefully raising the siege." The Duke of Argyle, on the other hand, excused the orders given to the Duke of Ormond, and, among other things, said, "That, in his opinion, since the time of Julius Cesar, there had not been a greater Captain than Prince Eugene of Savoy: But that, nevertheless, considering the different interests of the House of Austria and of Great-Britain, it might not consist with prudence to trust him with the management of the war, because a battle, won or lost, might entirely break off a Negotiation of peace, which, in all probability, was near being concluded.

1712. "That, according to his knowledge, nothing was more uncertain than the issue of a battle, where victory was still wavering, and so often changed sides, that they, who, after five or six successful charges, thought themselves sure of gaining the day, had at last been routed and put to flight. Adding, that two years before the Confederates might have taken Arras or Cambray, instead of amusing themselves with the insignificant conquest of Aire, Beaubune, and St Venant." The Earl of Nottingham declared on the other side, "That he could not comprehend why orders had been given to our General not to fight, unless certain persons were apprehensive of weakening the French, so far as to disable them to assist them in bringing about designs, which they durst not yet own." The Duke of Devonshire said on the same side, "That, by the proximity of blood, he was more concerned for the Duke of Ormond's reputation than any other; and therefore he could not forbear declaring, he was surprized to see any one dare to make a Nobleman of the first rank, and of so distinguished a character, the instrument of such a proceeding." The Earl Pasquet answered, "That no body could doubt of the Duke of Ormond's courage and bravery; but that he was not like a certain General, who led troops to the slaughter, to cause a great number of officers to be knocked on the head in a battle, or against stone-walls, in order to fill his pockets, by disposing of their commissions." This reflection, so visibly levelled at the Duke of Marlborough, could not but very sensibly affect him; but he restrained his resentment for a while, and remained silent (1). On the other hand, the Lord Cotterel made a long speech, wherein he complained of their being kept so long in the dark about the progress of a Negotiation of peace; and, some other Whig Lords having pressed the Earl of Strafford to give the House an account of it, he excused himself, as not having the Queen's orders for it. But the Treasurer assured them, "That, in a few days, her Majesty, according to her promise, would lay before her Parliament the conditions, on which a peace might be made, which he doubted not would give entire satisfaction to every Member of that House, and to all true Englishmen." Some Lords having declared their apprehensions of a separate peace; the Treasurer assured them, "that nothing of that nature was ever intended; and that such " a peace

(1) As soon as the House was up, the Lord Mobun went to the Earl Pasquet, and told him, that the Duke of Marlborough desired to have an éclaircissement with his Lordship, about some expressions he had used in that day's debate; and therefore desired him to go and take the air in the country. The Earl, who readily understood the meaning of such an éclaircissement, asked my Lord Mobun, Whether he brought him a challenge? To which he answered, That his message wanted no explanation, and that he would accompany the Duke of Marlborough. The Earl Pasquet being returned home, with some emotion, and having given his Lady a hint of what had passed, the Earl of Dartmouth, Secretary of State, was soon acquainted with it; and went immediately to the Duke of Marlborough, and desired him not to stir abroad. At the same time, his Lordship caused two Centinels to be placed at the Earl Pasquet's house; and, having informed ed the Queen of the whole affair her Majesty sent him back to the Duke of Marlborough, to desire him, that this might go no further. His Grace gave his word of honour, that he would comply with her Majesty's commands: But, though this quarrel ended without bloodshed, yet many began to apprehend the consequences of the heats and animosities of the two parties, which daily increased. The Duke of Marlborough was afterwards severely censured, for setting the example of party duels: But, on the other hand, the tongues of most people were very free with the Duke of Ormond: And, to this purpose, we may take notice, that, an Alehouse keeper in Westminster, having, either for a jest-sake, or out of mere simplicity, set up for his sign his Grace's Head, with this inscription, the General of Peace, the Government ordered the same to be taken down.

1712. "a peace would be so base, so knawish, and so villainous a thing, that every one, who served the Queen, knew, they must answer it with their heads to the Nation; but that it would appear to be a safe and a glorious peace, much more to the honour and interest of the Nation, than the Preliminaries, that were agreed to three years before. He also affirmed, that the Allies knew of it, and were satisfied with it." The Lord Hallifax, observing the disposition of the House, would have dropped his motion, without dividing; but the Court-party, being sure of a majority, insisted to have the question for adjourning the debate, which being carried in the affirmative by sixty-eight voices against forty, twenty-five of the latter entered their protests against the orders given to the Duke of Ormond (1). This point being gained, the Earl of Stratford suggested, "That, before the House entered upon the Negotiation of Utrecht, they would do well to examine into those of the Hague and Gertruydenberg; upon which he would communicate to them two

1712. "observations he had made during his residence in Holland: First, that, at the Hague, the French Ministers conferred only with the Pensionary, who, having made his report to the States-General, communicated no more of it to the Ministers of the Allies, than what was judged proper to let them know; so that the Dutch were absolute masters of the secret of that Negotiation, as they were afterwards of that of Gertruydenberg (2). Secondly, that the States-General had consented to give Naples and Sicily to King Philip; which shewed, even at that time, that the recovery of the whole Monarchy of Spain was looked upon as impracticable." He said, he had his information from one of the two, who had been employed in those Conferences; by which it was plain, that he meant *Bay*s. He concluded with a motion for addressing her Majesty, "That she would be pleased to cause the papers relating to the Negotiations of the Hague and Gertruydenberg to be laid before the House;" which was carried without dividing. But nothing

(1) They were to this purpose: 1. That their Lordships conceived such an order, as was proposed in the question, to be absolutely necessary, because they were convinced, that the Duke of Ormond lay under some order of restraint from acting offensively, not only from the accounts, which were public both here and in Holland, of his declaring it, to Prince Eugene, and to the Deputies of the States at their late consultations, when both Prince Eugene and those Deputies earnestly pressed him to join in attacking the French army, which was then known to be much inferior to that of the Allies, both in the number and condition of their troops; but also, for that nothing of this whole matter was denied by those Lords, who had the means of knowing these facts, as undoubtedly would have been without scruple, had not the facts been true; since no scruple was made of acquainting the House with a subsequent order very lately sent to the Duke of Ormond, allowing him to join in a siege: Which was a further evidence, that he had before some order of restraint; for otherwise this last order would be unnecessary and absurd; it being a general, and a constant, and a standing instruction to every Commander in chief by land or sea, to do his utmost endeavour to annoy the enemy. And it is manifest by this last order, that, even in the opinion of the Ministers, it was expedient to take off this restraint by some degree; and the leaving the Duke of Ormond still under a restraint from giving battle to the French, seemed most unaccountable and inconsistent with the liberty indulged to him, of joining in a siege, and rendering it altogether useless. For no place, when taken, could be of such advantage to the Allies as Cambray, which opens a free passage for our army into the heart of France; and it was impossible to besiege that place, without dislodging the French from their encampments; and this also was impossible, if the French would keep their ground. Other attempts seemed to be of little use, but might serve to give the French time, which they did not want skill to improve.

2. That they conceived it would be derogatory to her Majesty's honour, to public faith, and that justice, which was due to her Allies; and that it was a sort of imposing upon our Allies a cessation of arms, without their consent, and in the most prejudicial manner, because they were not so much as acquainted with it, and so might have been led into great difficulties: Besides, that it frustrated all essential advantages against the common enemy, which might be of fatal consequence to this Nation and all Europe.

3. Because it was acknowledged, that a general peace was not concluded, as indeed it was very unlikely it should, there having been no answers in writing given by the French to the specific demands of the Allies, though the same were delivered to the French three months ago. And it was further declared, That there was no separate peace; nay, that such a peace would be foolish, knawish, and villainous. And therefore, while we were in war, and having no security of a peace, their Lordships conceived, that such an order of restraint was a plain neglect of all those happy opportunities, which Providence might, and lately did, put into our hands, of subduing our enemy, and forcing him to a just and honourable peace. And surely it was imprudent and dangerous to rely on the promises of France, which were so far from being any security, that even a peace would not be safe in their opinion, unless it be such, as gave so full satisfaction to the Allies, that they should be willing to join with us in a mutual guaranty of it.

That her Majesty having with great wisdom declared to this Parliament, That the best means of obtaining a good peace was to make early preparations for war, and a vigorous prosecution of it: And since the Parliament had, with great duty and deference to her Majesty, and a just zeal for the interest of their Country, and of Europe, given very great Supplies for that purpose; their Lordships conceived, that such an order of restraint, being very different from that declaration of her Majesty, must be the effect of very ill advice; by which the Parliament's good intentions would be defeated, and all those heavy loads of taxes, which they have for so good purposes cheerfully given, rendered fruitless and unnecessary, and might, in conclusion, after having thus trifled away our wealth and time, bring us into a necessity of accepting such a peace, as it should please an insolent and domineering enemy to give us.

This protest was published likewise abroad in French and other languages; and the Peers, who signed it, were the Dukes of Devonshire, Marlborough, Rutland, Bolton, Mountague, and Somerset; the Marquis of Dorchester; the Earls of Wharton, Devby, Nottingham, Bridgewater, Gedolphin, Carlisle, Orford, and Scarborough; the Lord Viscount Townshend; the Lords Bishops of Oxford, Salisbury, Bangor, and St Asaph; and the Lords Rockingham, Cowper, Flowerham, Mohun, and Hallifax.

(2) The Lord Townshend had informed the House, that those who treated with the French at Gertruydenberg did, at their return, give an account of their Negotiation to the Ministers of the Allies, in the Pensioner's presence, before they reported it to the States themselves: But, upon this, the Earl of Stratford laid, they had been first secretly with the Pensioner, who directed them both what to say, and what to suppress. Barnet, Vol. II. 607.

(1) It

1712. thing followed upon this; for it was said to be designed only to amuse the House.

Debate on the same subject in the House of Commons. Mr. Pulteney moved, "That an address be presented to her Majesty, to acquaint her, that her faithful Commons were justly alarmed at the intelligence received from abroad, that her General in Flanders had declined to act offensively against France, in concurrence with her Allies.

Mr. H. C. "And being under the deepest concern for the dangerous consequences, which must arise from thence to the common cause, they besought her Majesty, that speedy instructions might be given to her General, to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour, in conjunction with her Allies, as the best means to obtain a safe and honourable peace for her Majesty, and all of them, and to quiet the minds of the people, who could not but be extremely apprehensive of the fatal consequence of such a division." Upon this motion Mr. St. John gave the Commons much the same assurances, the Treasurer had given the Lords; and in answer to what was suggested by a Member, "That the present Negotiation had been carried on in a clandestine and treacherous manner," he said, "He hoped, it would not be accounted treachery to act for the good and advantage of Great-Britain: That he gloried in the small share he had in this Negotiation; and, whatever censure he might undergo for it, the bare satisfaction of acting in that view would be a sufficient recompence and comfort to him all his life-time." After some other speeches on both sides, Mr. Pulteney's motion was rejected by a majority of two hundred and three voices against seventy-three; and it was resolved, "That the Commons had an entire confidence in her Majesty's promise to communicate to her Parliament the terms of the peace, before the same should be concluded; and that they would support her against all such persons, either at home or abroad, who should endeavour to obstruct it."

May 30. This resolution having been laid before the Queen by the whole House, her Majesty thanked the Commons most heartily for it, as being dutiful to her, honest to their country, and very seasonable at this time, when so many artifices were used to obstruct a good peace, or to force one disadvantageous to Britain." On the second of June they also resolved, in imitation of the Lords, to address the Queen, "for an account of the Negotiations and Transactions at the Hague and Gertruydenberg, and who were then employed as her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries."

Negotiations about the renunciation and cessation of arms. While the disputes, that had been raised at Utrecht, were industriously kept on foot, the Negotiations were carrying on directly between England and France; and the two great points upon the anvil were the renunciation of the Spanish Monarchy, and the cessation of arms.

The first mention, made of the renunciation in order to be treated of, is found in a memorial dated March 28, 1712, intitled, The answer to the memorial brought by Mr. Gaultier the 23d of March 1711-12. This memorial, which was received in France the 23d of March, was suppressed, but the contents of it may in great measure be collected from the answer, that was given to it. As the general proposal, that the Crowns of France and Spain should never be united, arose first from England, and was made an article in the private propositions sent over by Mr. Prior; so the expedient for preventing that union, namely, a renunciation, was also first proposed by England (1). In the answer to Gaultier's memorial, Torcy declares, in the strongest terms, "That the renunciation desired would be null and invalid by the fundamental laws of France, according to which the nearest Prince to the Crown is of necessity the Heir thereto. It is an inheritance, that he receives neither from the King his predecessor, nor from the people, but from the benefit of the law; so that, when one King dies, the other succeeds him forthwith, without asking the consent of any person whatsoever. He succeeds not as Heir, but as the Master of the Kingdom, the Seignory whereof belongs unto him, not by choice, but by right of birth only. He is not beholden for his Crown either to the will of his predecessor, or to any edict, nor to any decree, nor to the liberality of any person, but to the law. This law is looked upon as the work of him, who hath established all Monarchies; and we are persuaded in France, that God only can abolish it. No renunciation therefore can destroy it; and, if the King of Spain should renounce for the sake of peace, and in obedience to the King his Grandfather, they would deceive themselves, who received it as a sufficient expedient to prevent the mischief we propose to avoid." He then gives an account of the disposition made of the succession to the Crown of Spain by King Philip, and registered in the Councils of Spain; which disposition he proposed might be confirmed by the present treaty of peace, and ratified by the Cortes or States of the Kingdom of Spain. Mr. St. John in his answer rejected this proposal, and not at all convinced by what Torcy had so strongly urged, concerning the nullity of the renunciation, insisted still upon it. "We are ready, says he, to believe you are persuaded in France, that God alone can abolish that law, upon which your right of Succession is founded; but you will give us leave to be persuaded in Great-Britain, that a Prince may depart from his right by a voluntary cession; and that he, in favour of whom that renunciation is made, may be justly supported in his pretensions by the powers, that become guarantees of the treaty. In short, Sir,

(1) It is observed here, in the report of the Committee of Secrecy in 1715, The sense of France and Spain upon that important article was not known, nor so much as asked, although in every step France had given plain indications, that the Crown of Spain was to remain to King Philip. And it is surprizing, that the British Ministry had gone such lengths in promoting the measures of France, without taking the least precaution, or having any satisfaction concerning the Monarchy of Spain, wherein the interest of Great-Britain was, by their own confession, more immediately concerned, than in all their other articles of the peace.

1712. "Sir, the Queen commands me to tell you, that this article is of so great consequence, as well for herself as the rest of Europe, for this present age as for posterity, that she will never agree to continue the Negotiations of peace, unless the expedient she has proposed be accepted, or some other equally solid." Torcy, in his answer to this letter, begins to think it not impossible to find an expedient, to settle this grand affair; and proposes, that, when the King of Spain shall become either immediate Successor, or presumptive Heir to the Crown of France, he shall then declare the choice he intends to make; either to maintain his right to the Crown of France, or to keep that of Spain: That King Philip shall become party to the treaty, wherein the Succession to the two Crowns shall be likewise settled; and that all the powers of Europe shall enter into an engagement with France to maintain it. Mr St John reasons against this proposal, and insists, than no expedient can effectually secure Europe from the dangers, wherewith it is threatened by the union of the two Monarchies, unless the Prince, who is at present in possession of Spain, makes his choice at this very instant; and, upon a supposition, that the Crown of Spain would be his choice, that this declaration should be made during the Congress at Utrecht. Torcy, seeming always to comply with what was desired, agrees, that the Catholic King must calm the uneasiness of Europe, in declaring, from the present time, what part he will take, if ever the Succession of France is open in his favour. That the inconveniencies arising from hence must submit to the public good. "Thus, Sir (says Torcy to Mr St John) the King, approving your proposition, dispatches a Courier to Spain, and writes to the King his Grandson, to let him know the necessity of resolving on the choice he shall make, and to declare it, to the end it may be inserted in the treaty of the general peace, and be made a condition of it, whereof all Europe shall be guarantee." And he promises to use all possible means, even force, if it were necessary, to make the King of Spain agree to it. He hopes this proposition will, in a great measure, remove all difficulties; and, as they must expect new obstructions from those, who would willingly break the Conferences, he believes the best way to disappoint their designs would be, for the Queen of Great-Britain to propose immediately a suspension of arms; for they grounded their hopes upon the events of a campaign. Mr St John, in his answer to this letter, treats this proposal as liable to all the objections of the former, and argues thus upon it: "Although the King of Spain should at this instant declare his choice, What greater security will Europe have, if the execution of that choice be deferred to another time? In offering, that he shall be obliged to declare his choice at this present time, you agree, that neither the stipulations of a treaty, nor the guarantee of the powers engaged in the present war, would be sufficient to secure that the choice shall be made. How then can we conclude, that they will be sufficient to secure, that, when the case shall happen, he shall quit one Crown to accept of the other, according to the choice, which he shall now make? The Queen has often declared, that "it will be impossible for her to be content with any expedient, which shall not be very solid, upon an article of so great an importance as the Union of the two Monarchies. This would be to lose the fruit of all the blood, which the Allies had spilt in the course of this war. This would be to betray the common cause of Europe, and to expose both the present age and posterity to greater dangers, than it is possible to imagine." In short, he insists, that they must take care, that the time shall never be, when the same Prince shall have the Crown of Spain upon his head, and the Succession to the Crown of France open to him. He at last proposes, "That, if the King of Spain prefers the expectation of the Crown of France to the present possession of Spain, in such case he shall withdraw forthwith with his family out of Spain, the possession of which, and the Indies, shall be given to the Duke of Savoy: That King Philip should have the Kingdom of Sicily and the hereditary Dominions of the Duke of Savoy, together with the Montferrat and Mantua, all which Dominions he should remain possessed of, though he became King of France, excepting Sicily; which, in that case, should return to the House of Austria."

1712. Monsieur de Torcy, still seeming to comply with the measures of England, shews the great hardship, which the King of Spain must undergo, in sacrificing his own and the interest of his family for the establishing a general peace. However, the King of France would send to him, to know his mind upon the two alternatives. In the mean time, the King of France promises, that the treaty of peace shall be made, upon the foundation of one of these two propositions; either that the King of Spain shall renounce his right to the Crown of France, and keep Spain and the Indies; or, if he prefers his expectation upon France, he shall quit Spain and the Indies to the Duke of Savoy, in exchange for the present Dominions of the Duke of Savoy, &c. as proposed by Mr St John. He hopes, by this promise of the King of France, all uncertainties are removed; and submits to the Queen's wisdom, to consider what method will be most conducive to the general good. "It will (says he) be very unhappy, if any event, during the campaign, shall fall out to disturb the good dispositions, that are seen at present, for establishing the public repose."

This correspondence between the two Secretaries, for preventing the Union of the two Kingdoms, carried on from about the middle of March to the 18th of May 1712, ended at last, just as it began; and King Philip chose to make the Renunciation. Torcy giving the British Ministers such early notice, and telling them so very plainly, that what they asked was utterly insufficient, and would be for ever deemed, by the unalterable laws of France, null and void, is very remarkable. His dexterity in managing that part of the Negotiation, in seeming always to comply, and desirous to come as near as possible to the proposals made from hence, and submitting at last, since Great-Britain would have it so, to the Renunciation so peremptorily insisted on, is no less observable. But it is unaccountable, how the English Ministry, when they were expressly told, those would deceive themselves, 1712. themselves, who should accept of a renunciation, as a sufficient expedient to prevent the Union of the two Monarchies; when they laid it down as a principle never to be departed from, that the Union of the two Monarchies would be the greatest mischief, that could possibly happen to all Europe, and to Great-Britain in particular; should still persevere in relying upon this expedient of a Renunciation. But, no care was taken to render effectual the two only expedients, that were ever proposed for adding any degree of real security to the renunciation; which were, to have it solemnly accepted by the States of France; and to have it confirmed by a general guaranty of all the powers of Europe engaged in the present war. The first was asked indeed; but, upon the refusal of France, was entirely given up by the British Ministry. The second, by their method of Negotiating, and their treatment of the Allies, was from that very time rendered impracticable, as the French could not but foresee. It must be remembered, that, a few days after this answer of Monsieur de Torcy was received, Mr St John sent orders to the British Plenipotentiaries to declare to the States-General, that the Queen was now under no farther obligations whatsoever to them, who, with the rest of the Allies, were to be guarantees of this treaty. To this may be added a passage, in a letter from the Plenipotentiaries to Mr St John, acquainting him, that in some discourse with the Marshal d'Uxelles, upon occasion of the death of the Dauphin, they desired to know of him, what those measures are, which France offers to take, in order to prevent the Union of the two Kingdoms; and whether they were to consist in real or verbal securities; upon which the French Minister pretended to know of no other but verbal. They then suggested to Mr St John, that an obligation upon King Philip to renounce the Regency as well as the Crown of France, for himself and his posterity, would amount to some degree of real security. But no endeavours were used to obtain this, nor any mention made of it, as far as appears.

Torcy's letter of the 18th of May, N. S. was received by Mr St John the 9th of May, O. S. and the promise of the King of France, to oblige his Grandson to accept the alternative of the two Kingdoms, had so good and sudden an effect, that the day following, without waiting the return of the Courier from Madrid, to know whether King Philip did consent or not to the proposal, orders were sent, on the 10th of May, to the Duke of Ormond, by Mr St John, to avoid engaging in any siege, or hazarding a battle till further order. And, the same day, that these orders were sent, with directions to disguise them, which was to conceal them from the Confederates, they were communicated to the Queen's enemies. 'Abbot Gaultier will give you an account (says Mr St John to Torcy) of the orders I have just now dispatched to the Duke of Ormond.' What Mr St John himself thought of the importance of this order, is to be learned from his letter to Mr Prior, September 19, 1712: 'The moment I read the Queen a letter from Monsieur de Torcy, by which it appeared, that the King of France would oblige his Grandson to accept of the alternative of quitting one of the two Monarchies, her orders were dispatched to No. 69. Vol. IV.

'the Duke to engage in neither siege nor battle; and she prevented the French from even making the demand. I will not say, that this order saved their army from being beat; but I think, in my conscience, that it did.'

On the 24th of May 1712; Mr St John writes again to Torcy, that, although they had yet received no answer from Madrid concerning the renunciation, but being pressed in time, and finding it necessary for the Queen to make the communication she had promised, to the Parliament, of the terms, on which a peace might be made, he acquaints him with the steps, which the Queen was resolved to take, provided the most Christian King would render them practicable for her. And, in a memorial of the same date, he specifies the conditions, upon which the Queen consents to make such important steps and decisive declarations to her Parliament: 'First, That she had settled with France the interest of Great-Britain. Secondly, That she looks upon the interests of the other powers engaged with her in the war, as easy to be adjusted, since the King offers to the greatest part of them very near what they have demanded, and to all a just and reasonable satisfaction. Thirdly, That she will set about accommodating the affairs of her Allies; and, that to prevent all the obstructions, which the events of the campaign might occasion to the Negotiations of peace, she agreed with the King to a suspension of arms.' The conditions specified in the memorial were demands relating to North-America, to commerce, and the suspension of arms. In the article concerning commerce it is said, 'That several points relating to trade requiring a longer discussion than the present crisis would admit; and the Queen being much more intent upon securing the general peace, than any particular advantages, demands at present only the two following conditions: First, That Commissioners should be named on both sides to meet at London, there to examine and settle the duties and impositions to be paid respectively in each Kingdom. Secondly, That no privileges or advantages, relating to commerce with France, shall be yielded to any foreign Nation, which shall not at the same time be granted to the subjects of her Britannic Majesty; as likewise no privilege or advantage, in relation to the trade of Great-Britain, shall be yielded to any foreign Nation, which shall not at the same time be granted to the subjects of France.' As to the suspension of arms, 'her Majesty will consent, it shall be made for two months, provided, first, that within the said term the King of Spain shall either make the renunciation demanded, or shall yield Spain to the Duke of Savoy, upon the conditions mentioned in Mr St John's letter. Secondly, That the French garrison shall evacuate Dunkirk, and the Queen's troops be admitted the same day, that the suspension of arms shall commence. Thirdly, That, in case the States-General shall at the same time consent to the suspension of arms, it seems reasonable they should have the liberty of putting a garrison into Cambray.' It may be remarked upon these conditions, that although it was daily instilled into the minds of the people, that the great advantages in trade and commerce secured to Great-Britain were the chief inducements to the Ministry to engage in these measures with France, it is here declared, that they were more intent upon the general peace, than any particular advantages. And whereas it was laid down as a principle, from which the Queen would never depart, that the interests of Great-Britain should in the first place be adjusted, and the great advantages, stipulated for these Nations before the conclusion of the peace, were to justify the peace, and all the steps, that were taken to procure it; it is now evident, that no mention was made of our trade in Spain; and, as for our commerce in general, the settling of that was postponed, and all points in dispute betwixt Great-Britain and France were to be referred to Commissioners; which proposition was not demanded, but voluntarily offered by Mr St John. On the 8th of June 1712, N. S. Torcy sent an account, That the King of Spain, of the two propositions, had chosen to keep Spain and the Indies, and to renounce for himself and his descendants the right to the Crown of France. That, this principal obstacle to the peace being removed, the King of France expected, that the Queen would now clear on her side the rest of the difficulties, which might obstruct this great work, by making such declarations, as had been promised upon the return of the Courier from Madrid, and were necessary for this end. That the King thought the first and most urgent was to settle a suspension of arms, either general, or at least between the two armies in the Low-Countries, which may continue till the conclusion of the peace. On the 10th of June, N. S. Torcy acknowledges the receipt of Mr St John's letter of the 24th of May, O. S. together with the memorial; and sends another memorial in answer to it, containing the King of France's answer to these last demands of the Queen. He takes notice, That the letters from the army mention a design to invest Quincy, in order to besiege it; but, that the King could not think, that the Queen approved of such an undertaking, much less that her troops should be employed to render it successful. He concludes, that, if the suspension be not immediately made, we may find ourselves indispensably drawn into some great event, which he hopes the Secretary's prudence and care will prevent. And altho' in the answer to the Queen's demands nothing material, that was asked for our trade in North-America, was granted, the evacuating of Dunkirk, and admitting an English garrison was not agreed to, and the receiving a Dutch garrison into Cambray was absolutely refused, which were proposed as conditions of the suspension of arms; Torcy hopes, That this return to the Queen's demands will occasion no new trouble; but as the beginning and whole course of this Negotiation was carried on upon a mutual confidence, of which they had seen the good effects; it is necessary to banish all distrust, and the Queen to repose an entire confidence in his Majesty, without insisting on demands, which may serve only to create jealousies.

On the 6th of June, O. S. Mr St John owns the receipt of Torcy's two letters of the 8th and 10th of June, N. S. and says, though the King of France had not answered the Queen's demands according to expectation, which were the conditions, on which the Queen was to make such peremptory and decisive declarations; yet the Queen would not defer going that day to Parliament, and making all the declarations, that were necessary to render the Nation unanimously inclined to the peace. That she had not indeed mentioned to the Parliament the suspension of arms, but had commanded him to acquaint Monsieur de Torcy with the resolutions she had taken in relation to it; and insisting upon the renunciation as the capital point of the Negotiation; and for which her Majesty would rather depart from almost all the points, that had been agreed upon, than leave that to any uncertainty. Upon this foundation the Queen hopes, that the most Christian King will not find any thing offensive in the demands, which she found herself obliged to renew, being conditions for a suspension of arms between the two armies in the Netherlands; which, if the King consents to (says Mr St John to Torcy) You have only to sign and send to the Duke of Ormond, who, at the same time that he takes possession of Dunkirk, will declare to the Allies, that he has orders to act no further against France. He acquaints him, Lord Sirafford is going back to Utrecht; the instructions he is to carry will, according to your desire, put the Queen's Plenipotentiaries in a condition to keep no longer those measures, to which they have been hitherto obliged to submit, but from henceforth they may openly join with France, and give law to those, who will not submit to just and reasonable conditions; and promises, when Lord Sirafford is gone, he will dispatch another Courier to inform him of the orders he carries. The articles for a suspension were signed by Mr St John, June 6, O. S. and the next day Mr St John writes a private letter to Torcy, expressing the utmost confidence in the good faith of the most Christian King; thinks it necessary to hasten the peace; tells him, it will frighten the Dutch, to be told the Queen will act no longer against France; and that, if they do not hasten to make their agreement, they will have a burden upon their backs, which they are not able to bear. On the same day, Mr St John sends to the Duke of Ormond copies of these two last letters, and of the memorial sent to Torcy. They have been, says he, prepared by the Queen's order, in answer to the last express, which came from France: And you will perceive by them, my Lord, that the Queen insists on the execution of the article relating to Spain, and on the delivery of Dunkirk, as points, without which she will not declare for a cessation of arms in the Netherlands: But, if these conditions are accepted, and sent signed by the Marquis de Torcy to your Grace, and Dunkirk put into your possession, you are publicly to own, that you can act no longer against the French. If they are not consented to, you are entirely free from restraint, and at liberty to take all reasonable measures, that are in your power for annoying the enemy. It is probable Marshal Villars may receive the orders, which will be sent him from Versailles, within a day after this letter will come to your hands. Your Grace will therefore lose no time in acquainting him, that you are in expectation of hearing from his Court that, which must determine your proceedings; and that, according to the King's resolution, you are either to look upon yourselves on both sides

1712. 'sides as freed from any restrictive orders, and
'in full liberty of acting against each other;
'or that you are openly to declare for a cessa'tion.' This order was in itself of a very extraordinary nature, though conditional; and the British Ministry seemed in very great haste to give all up into the hands of France, when the Queen's General, at the head of a Confederate army in the field, at that time covering a siege, which the Allies were engaged in, should be ordered to govern himself according to such significations, as should come from the Court of France, and those transmitted to him by the General commanding the enemy's army, whose duty it was by force or stratagem to raise the siege, or gain any advantage he could over the Allies.

On the 22d of June, N. S. an answer to the proposals last sent over was transmitted to Mr
St John, signed by Torcy, with two alterations;
one no less material, than whereas it was demanded, that the renunciation should be ratified in the most solemn manner by the States of France, which had been mentioned before as one of the chief securities to make it as effectual as any thing could, it is here substituted, that it shall be registered in the several Parliaments:
And to the article of Dunkirk is added, 'That all the King's officers, both land and sea-officers, shall have liberty to stay at Dunkirk, and to execute their several offices.' And on the same day Torcy writes two letters, the one a public letter, explaining at large the alterations; the other a private letter to prevail with him to consent to these alterations; of which private correspondence carried on between the two Secretaries there are several instances.

Upon the foundation of these Preliminaries, though not then fully settled, the Queen, on Friday the 6th of June, came to the House of Peers with the usual solemnity, and made the following speech to both Houses:

The Queen's speech to both Houses, containing the plan of peace.
Pr. H. C.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'THE making peace and war is the un-
'doubted prerogative of the Crown; yet,
'such is the just confidence I place in you, that
'at the opening of this Session I acquainted
'you, that a Negotiation for a general peace
'was begun; and afterwards, by messages, I 'promised to communicate to you the terms of 'peace, before the same should be concluded.

'In pursuance of that promise, I now come to 'let you know upon what terms a general peace
'may be made.

'I need not mention the difficulties, which a'rise from the very nature of this affair; and it 'is but too apparent, that these difficulties have 'been increased by other obstructions artfully
'contrived to hinder this great and good work.

'Nothing however has moved me from 'steadily pursuing, in the first place, the true in'terest of my own Kingdoms; and I have not 'omitted any thing, which might procure to
'our Allies what is due to them by treaties,
'and what is necessary for their security.

'The assuring of the Protestant Succession as
'by law established in the House of Hanover to 'these Kingdoms, being what I have nearest at 'heart, particular care is taken, not only to 'have that acknowledged in the strongest terms,
'but to have an additional security by the removal of that person out of the dominions of France, who has pretended to disturb this settlement.

'The apprehension, that Spain and the West- Indies might be united to France, was the chief inducement to begin this war; and the effectual preventing of such an union was the principle I laid down at the commencement of this treaty.

'Former Examples, and the late Negotiations, sufficiently shew how difficult it is to find means to accomplish this work. I would not content myself with such as are speculative, or depend on treaties only. I insisted on what is solid, and to have at hand the power of executing what should be agreed.

'I can therefore now tell you, that France at last is brought to offer, that the Duke of An- jou shall, for himself and his descendants, renounce for ever all claim to the Crown of France. And, that this important article may be exposed to no hazard, the performance is to accompany the promise.

'At the same time the Succession to the Crown of France is to be declared, after the death of the present Dauphin and his Sons, to be in the Duke of Berry and his Sons, in the Duke of Orleans and his Sons, and so on to the rest of the House of Bourbon. As to Spain and the Indies, the Succession to those Dominions, after the Duke of Anjou and his Children, is to descend to such Prince, as shall be agreed upon at the treaty, for ever excluding the rest of the House of Bourbon.

'For confirming the renunciations and settlements before mentioned, it is further offered, that they shall be ratified in the most strong and solemn manner, both in France and Spain; and that those Kingdoms, as well as all the other Powers engaged in the present war, shall be guarantees to the same.

'The nature of this proposal is such, that it executes itself. The interest of Spain is to support it; and in France the persons, to whom that Succession is to belong, will be ready and powerful enough to vindicate their own right.

'France and Spain are now more effectually divided than ever. And thus, by the Blessing of God, will a real balance of Power be fixed in Europe, and remain liable to as few accidents, as human affairs can be exempted from.

'A treaty of commerce between these Kingdoms and France has been entered upon; but the excessive duties laid on some goods, and the prohibitions of others, make it impossible to finish this work so soon as were to be desired. Care is however taken to establish a method of settling this matter; and in the mean time provision is made, that the same privileges and advantages, as shall be granted to any other Nation by France, shall be granted in like manner to us.

'The division of the island of St Christopher between us and the French having been the cause of great inconvenience and damage to my subjects, I have demanded to have an absolute cession made to me of that whole island;
and France agrees to this demand.

'Our interest is so deeply concerned in the trade of North America, that I have used my utmost endeavours to adjust that article in the most

1712. ' most beneficial manner. France consents to restore to us the whole Bay and Straits of Hudson; to deliver up the Island of Newfoundland, with Placentia; and to make an absolute cession of Annapolis with the rest of Nova Scotia or Acadia.

' The safety of our home-trade will be better provided for by the demolition of Dunkirk.

' Our Mediterranean trade, and the British interest and influence in those parts, will be secured by the possession of Gibraltar, and Port-Mahon, with the whole Island of Minorca, which are offered to remain in my hands.

' The trade of Spain, and to the West-Indies, may in general be settled as it was in the time of the late King of Spain, Charles II., and a particular provision be made, that all advantages, rights, or privileges, which have been granted, or which may hereafter be granted, by Spain to any other Nation, shall be in like manner granted to the subjects of Great-Britain.

' But the part, which we have borne in the prosecution of this war, intitling us to some distinction in the terms of peace, I have insisted and obtained, that the Assiento or Contract for furnishing the Spanish West-Indies with Negroes, shall be made with us for the term of thirty years, in the same manner, as it has been enjoyed by the French for these ten years past.

' I have not taken upon me to determine the interests of our Confederates. These must be adjusted in the Congress at Utrecht, where my best endeavours shall be employed, as they have hitherto been, to procure to every one of them all just and reasonable satisfaction. In the mean time, I think it proper to acquaint you, that France offers to make the Rhine the barrier of the Empire; to yield Brissac, the fort of Kehl, and Landau; and to raze all fortresses, both on the other side, of the Rhine, and in that river.

' As to the Protestant interest in Germany, there will be, on the part of France, no objection to the resetting thereof, on the Foot of the treaty of Westphalia.

' The Spanish Low-Countries may go to his Imperial Majesty: The Kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, the Duchy of Milan, and the places belonging to Spain on the coast of Tuscany, may likewise be yielded by the treaty of peace to the Emperor.

' As to the Kingdom of Sicily, though there remains no dispute concerning the cession of it by the Duke of Anjou, yet the disposition thereof is not yet determined.

' The interests of the States-General with respect to commerce are agreed to, as they have been demanded by their own Ministers, with the exception only of some very few species of merchandize, and the entire Barrier, as demanded by the States in 1709 from France, except two or three places at most.

' As to these exceptions, several expedients are proposed; and I make no doubt, but this Barrier may be so settled, as to render that Republick perfectly secure against any enterprize on the part of France, which is the foundation of all my engagements upon this head with the States.

' The demands of Portugal depending on the disposition of Spain, and that article having been long in dispute, it has not yet been possible to make any considerable progress therein; but my Plenipotentiaries will now have an opportunity to assist that King in his pretensions.

' Those of the King of Prussia are such, as, I hope, will admit of little difficulty on the part of France; and my endeavours shall not be wanting to procure all I am able to so good an Ally.

' The difference between the Barrier demanded for the Duke of Savoy in 1709, and the offers now made by France, is very inconsiderable. But, that Prince having so signally distinguished himself in the service of the common cause, I am endeavouring to procure for him still further advantages.

' France has consented, that the Elector Palatine shall continue his present rank among the Electors, and remain in possession of the Upper Palatinate.

' The Electoral dignity is likewise acknowledged in the House of Hanover, according to the articles inserted, at that Prince's desire, in my demands.

' And, as to the rest of the Allies, I make no doubt of being able to secure their several interests.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

' I have now communicated to you, not only the terms of peace, which may by the future treaty be obtained for my own subjects, but likewise the proposals of France for satisfying our Allies.

' The former are such, as I have reason to expect to make my people some amends for that great and unequal burden, which they have lain under through the whole course of this war; and I am willing to hope, that none of our Confederates, and especially those, to whom so great accessions of Dominion and Power are to accrue by this peace, will envy Great-Britain her share in the glory and advantage of it.

' The latter are not yet so perfectly adjusted as a little more time might have rendered them; but, the season of the year making it necessary to put an end to this Session, I resolved no longer to defer communicating these matters to you.

' I can make no doubt but you are all fully persuaded, that nothing will be neglected on my part, in the progress of this Negotiation, to bring the peace to an happy and speedy issue; and I depend on your entire confidence in me, and your chearful concurrence with me.

This speech occasioned a general surprize, so The public that the public funds, which, upon the expectation of better conditions of peace, had that morning risen four or five per cent, fell immediately to their former value. It was now easy to discern, what reasons induced some persons to keep secret the result of the Negotiation between Great-Britain and France; for, if such a plan had been communicated to the Parliament, before a majority had been secured in both Houses, and the minds of the people prepared by a long train of artful and plausible insinuations, it would, in all probability, have been exploded.

1712. ploded with indignation. But by the dexterity of the prime Managers things were brought to such a pass, that, though in the House of Commons, one or two Members proposed the taking the important matters, mentioned in her Majesty's speech, into consideration, they were presently silenced by a general cry for an address of thanks. It was unanimously resolved, 'That an Address be made to her Majesty, acknowledging her great condescension in communicating the terms, upon which a general peace might be made; expressing the satisfaction of this House in what she had already done, and their entire confidence in her steady pursuing the true interests of her Kingdoms, and in her endeavours to procure for all her Allies what is due to them by treaties, and necessary for their security; and humbly to desire, that she would be pleased to proceed in the present Negotiation for the obtaining a speedy peace.' A Committee was appointed immediately to draw up that address, which Mr Freeman, their Chairman, soon after reported, and which, with some amendments, being agreed to, was presented by the whole House to the Queen, who returned the following answer:

'I have the safety and interest of all my people so much at heart, that I cannot but take a great deal of pleasure in this your dutiful and prudent address; and I thank you most kindly for it.

'I have studied your welfare, and by this you will find the good effects of that confidence, which you place in me, and which ought always to remain between so affectionate a Prince, and such faithful Subjects.'

Things went not so smoothly in the House of Peers. As soon as the Queen was withdrawn, a motion being made for an address of thanks, the Earl of Wharton said, 'They had all the reason in the world to do it, especially for that part of her Majesty's speech, wherein she was pleased to declare, That the assuring the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover to these Kingdoms, was what she had nearest at heart. But that, her Majesty's speech containing many other particulars of the greatest consequence, he was of opinion, the House would do well to take it into serious consideration the next day;' which was readily agreed to. Accordingly, on the 7th of June, the Earl of Wharton proposed, that the letter from the States-General to the Queen, inserted in the Supplement to the Amsterdam French Gazette, which arrived that very morning, might be read. But this was opposed, it being suggested, that the House ought not to take notice of a writing, that carried no authority with it. After this, the Lords took the Queen's speech into consideration, which occasioned a warm debate. Among the rest, the Duke of Marlborough represented, 'That the measures pursued in England, for a year past, were directly contrary to her Majesty's engagements with the Allies, sullied the triumphs and glories of her Reign, and would render the English name odious to all other Nations.' The Earl of Strafford said, 'That some of the Allies [meaning the Dutch] would not shew such backwardness to a peace, as they had hither to done, but for a Member of that illustrious Assembly [meaning the Duke of Marlborough] who maintained a secret correspondence with, and endeavoured to persuade them to carry on the war; feeding them with hopes, that they should be supported by a strong party here.' The Lord Cowper answered this speech; and, because the Earl of Strafford had not expressed himself with all the purity of the English tongue, he took occasion to say, 'That noble Lord had been so long abroad, that he had almost forgot, not only the Language, but the Constitution of his own Country. That, according to our laws, it could never be suggested as a crime in the meanest subject, much less in any Member of that August Assembly, to hold correspondence with our Allies; such Allies especially, whose interest her Majesty had declared to be inseparable from her own, in her speech at the opening of this Session; whereas it would be a hard matter to justify and reconcile, either with our laws, or the laws of honour and justice, the conduct of some persons, in treating clandestinely with the common enemy, without the participation of the Allies.' The Lords took afterwards into consideration the advantages offered by France to Great-Britain, particularly in settling the trade to Spain, and to the West-Indies, as it was in the time of the late King of Spain, Charles II. To this purpose the Earl of Godolphin said, 'That he did not pretend to any great knowledge in trade; but, that during the time he had the honour to be in the administration of affairs, he had observed, and he could easily make it out by the books of the Custom House, that the single trade to Portugal brought to England, in times of war, double the wealth of the trade to Spain, in times of peace: So that, whatever might be suggested, to cast a mist before the eyes of the people, it was to be presumed, that the trade to Spain would still yield less for the future, because the French had made themselves absolute masters of it.' After some other speeches a motion was made, 'That an address be presented to her Majesty, to return her the thanks of this House for her most gracious speech, and for her extraordinary condescension in communicating to her Parliament the terms, upon which a general peace might be made: And to express the entire satisfaction of that House in her great care for securing the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover; and for her steady pursuing the true interest of her own Kingdoms; and for endeavouring to procure to her Allies what was due to them by treaties; and to assure her, that this House did entirely rely on her wisdom to finish this great and good work.' Some exceptions were made to the words entirely rely; and the House was moved, as the House of Commons had likewise been upon the same occasion, that these words might be added, 'And in order to that, that her Majesty would take such measures in concert with her Allies, as might induce them to join with her Majesty in a mutual guaranty.' This occasioned a debate, in which the Lord-Treasurer and Earl Pawlet spoke against that addition, and the Earl of Nottingham and the Lord Cowper for it. It was urged in opposition to this clause, that it would subject the Queen and the whole treaty

1712. to the pleasure of the Allies, who might prove backward and intractable: And, since England had borne the greatest share of the burthen of the war, it was reasonable, that the Queen should be the arbiter of the peace. On the other hand it was said, that, if the Allies did not enter into a guaranty, we must depend on the faith of the French, and be at their mercy, and so have nothing to trust to but the promises of a Court noted, in a course of years, for a train of perfidy. But many had formed an obstinate resolution to get out of the war on any terms; and therefore nothing, that seemed to obstruct the arriving speedily at that end, was heard with patience, and no regard was had to the faith of treaties. The question being at last put, Whether the clause should be added? It was resolved in the negative by eighty-one voices against thirty-six. On the 10th of June the Lords presented their address to the Queen, who told them, 'That the satisfaction, they had expressed in what she had laid before them, would contribute very much to remove the difficulties, which had arisen in the course of this Negotiation; and that the confidence they placed in her would enable her better to finish this great work, for the advantage of her own

'People, and the safety and interest of her Allies.' Several Lords entered a protest against the rejecting the guaranty clause, and signed their reasons for it, which were soon after published in print (1). But this gave so great offence to the majority of the Peers, that, on the 13th of June, the question being put, 'Whether the protest be expunged out of the books of the House?' It was carried in the affirmative by a majority of sixty-six voices against thirty-one present, and of ninety voices against sixty-four, proxies included. The next day, upon a complaint made in the House of Lords, that both this protest, and the former concerning the orders produced by the Duke of Ormond, were in print, a Committee was appointed to inquire who were the Printers and Publishers of the same; but, this Committee not having been able to make any discovery in that matter, the Lords applied themselves by address to the Queen for that purpose. But neither an order of the Queen in Council, nor a hundred pounds reward, had any effect.

The Commons were no less offended than the Lords at several papers published about this time, particularly Bishop Fleetwood's Preface to four sermons which he had formerly preached, and

(1) The protest was in these terms:

We think it necessary to have the security proposed of a general Guaranty; and the rather, because we conceive the terms of peace, that are offered, have proceeded from a separate Negotiation, carried on by the Ministers with France, without any communication thereof with the principal Allies, particularly the States-General, as they say in their letter to her Majesty, (whose interest, her Majesty was pleased to declare to this Parliament, she looked upon as inseparable from her own) and we conceive this Negotiation to be contrary to those orders, which her Majesty declared to this House, in answer to their address, that she had given to her Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, to concert with those of her Allies; and the resolution expressed in her message of January the 17th, of a strict union, in which she proposed to join with them, in order to obtain a good peace, and to guaranty and support the same, as she had before declared in her speech at the opening of the Session, that she would unite with them in the strictest engagements for continuing the Alliance, in order to render the general peace secure and lasting; and contrary to the eighth article of the grand Alliance, which expressly obliges all the Allies not to treat, unless jointly, and with the common advice of the other parties.

And we conceive, that the refusal of these words, proposed to be added, may be looked upon by the Allies, as if this House approved this method of transacting with France, which may seem to them to tend to a separate peace, of which her Majesty has declared her dislike, and which was acknowledged in this House to be foolish and knavish, and would be of pernicious consequence to this Kingdom, by preventing that guaranty of peace by the Allies, which is so absolutely necessary for their mutual security, and leave us exposed to the power of France, there being little reason to expect their future help, after such a gross breach of trust.

And we further conceive, that such a separate proceeding may create in the Allies so great a distrust, as may tempt them to take the like measures, and so give the French opportunity to break that union, which has hitherto been so useful to us, and formidable them; any appearance whereof must encourage France, either to delay the conclusion of a peace, or to impose upon the Allies in the further progress of the treaty.

A perfect union among the Allies seems to us to be more necessary in the present case, because the foundation, upon which all the offers of France, relating to Great-Britain as well as to the Allies, are built, viz. A renunciation of the Duke of Anjou to that Kingdom, is in our opinion, so fallacious, that no reasonable man, much less whole Nations, can ever look upon it as any security. Experience may sufficiently convince us, how little we ought to rely upon the renunciation of the House of Bourbon: And though the present Duke of Anjou should happen to think himself bound by his own act, which his Grandfather did not; yet will his Descendants be at liberty to say, That no act of his could deprive them of their birth-right; and especially when it is such a right, as, in the opinion of all French men, ought invariably to be maintained by the fundamental constitution of the Kingdom of France. And we humbly think it unsafe to depend upon this principal part of the treaty's executing itself, by supposing it will be the interest of France to support it, since, on the contrary, it is manifest by the French endeavours, ever since the Pyrenean treaty, to unite the Monarchies of France and Spain, they look upon that union to be their greatest interest, and the most effectual means to bring about the universal Monarchy in the House of Bourbon.

And if it were reasonable to imagine, that the two Crowns of France and Spain should remain in distinct branches of the House of Bourbon; yet this is contrary to the grand Alliance itself, which recites the usurpation of the Spanish Monarchy by the French King for the Duke of Anjou, as the principal cause of this war.

As to Port-Mahon, Gibraltar, the Assiento, and the other advantages to Britain proposed by France (besides that they are all precarious, and in the power of France and Spain to take from us when they please) considering the situation of those Kingdoms, and the vast wealth and strength, which will be left to them, we conceive it impossible for any man to look on those as a compensation to Britain in any degree; for the leaving Spain and the Indies in the possession of the House of Bourbon, besides other manifestly fatal consequences, must be extremely prejudicial to our woollen manufacture, if it does not entirely ruin it.

As to the demolition of Dunkirk, though we own it will be a great safety to our home-trade, yet we have reason to apprehend by what was said in the debate, that it is not yet agreed to be demolished, without an equivalent for it to the French King's satisfaction.

And in all the particulars relating to the Allies, though they are not perfectly adjusted, yet, by what does appear concerning them, the Allies are likely to be left in

1712. now reprinted (1). The Bishop concludes this Preface by saying, ‘ Never did seven such years together pass over the head of any English Monarch, nor cover it with so much honour. The Crown and Scepter seem’d to be the Queen’s least ornaments. Those other Princes were in common with her; and her great personal virtues were the same before and since. But such was the fame of her Administration of affairs at home; such was the reputation of her wisdom and felicity in chusing Ministers; and such was then esteem’d their faithfulness and zeal, their diligence and great abilities in executing her commands; to such a height of military glory did her great General and her Armies carry the British name abroad; such was the harmony and concord betwixt Her and her Allies; and such was the blessing of God upon all her counsels and undertakings, that I am as sure as History can make me, no Prince of ours was ever yet so prosperous and successful, so loved, esteem’d, and honoured by their subjects and their friends, nor near so formidable to their enemies. We were, as all the world imagin’d then, just enter’d on the ways, that promised to lead to such a peace, as would have answer’d all the prayers of our religious Queen, the care and vigilance of a most able Ministry, the payments of a willing and obedient People, as well as all the glorious toils and hazards of the Soldier; when God, for our sins, permitted the spirit of discord to go forth; and, by troubling sore the Camp, the City, and the Country, (and oh, that it had altogether spared the places sacred to his worship) to spoil, for a time, this beautiful and pleasing prospect; and give, in its stead, I know not what——Our enemies will tell the rest with pleasure.’

The complaint against this preface was made by Mr Hungerford, seconded by Mr Manley, and supported by the Court-party. But Sir Peter King, Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr Lechmere, and other Gentlemen, were very strenuous advocates in its behalf, but to no purpose; for the Commons, by a majority of a hundred and nineteen against fifty-four, voted the Preface to be malicious and factious, highly reflecting upon the present Administration of public affairs under her Majesty, and tending to create discord and sedition amongst her subjects, and condemn’d it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. It was observ’d, that, when the Bishop’s friends brought him the news of the Vote, far from appearing disturb’d at it, he said, ‘ That he esteem’d himself very happy to suffer with the Duke of Marlborough, the Earl such a state of insecurity, as is absolutely inconsistent with our own safety.

The Rhine is propos’d for a barrier of the Empire, which leaves Strasbourg and Hunninghen in the hands of the French; the former of which has always been look’d upon as the key of the empire.

The proposals of France, relating to the Barrier for the States-General, not only deprive them of all the places taken since the year 1709, but also of two or three places more, included in the demand made by the States in that year; which will render their Barrier wholly insufficient, and consequently very much weaken the security of Britain.

Portugal seems to be wholly abandoned to the power of Spain; notwithstanding the great advantage we have receiv’d during this war by our trade with that Kingdom, which might still be extremely beneficial to us.

Upon the whole, there is so very little and inconsiderable a difference between the offers of France and those made at Utrecht, February the 11th, N. S. and sign’d d’Uxelles, (as appears to us upon comparing them together) that both seem to be the effect of a secret and particular Negotiation with France; and, this House having unanimously concurr’d in expressing to her Majesty their utmost resentment at those terms offer’d to her Majesty and her Allies by the Plenipotentiaries of France, and her Majesty having graciously accepted that our address, and rewarded that duty and zeal with her hearty thanks, we cannot, in respect to her Majesty, or justice to our Country, retract that opinion, nor think the terms now good for Us or the Allies, or giving any seeming approbation of them, which then were receiv’d by this House, and all the Allies, with scorn and detestation.

For these reasons we are of opinion, that the offers of France are fallacious and ensnaring, no way proportion’d to the advantages, which her Majesty (from the great successes, with which it has pleas’d God to bless Her and her Allies during the whole course of this war) might justly expect for her own Kingdoms and for Them; very insufficient for preserving a balance of power in Europe, for the future security of her Majesty and her Allies, though they should be never so exactly perform’d; and yet even such as they are, there is no effectual security offer’d for the performance of them; which makes it absolutely necessary, as we conceive, that such measures should be taken, in concert with the Allies, as may induce them to join with her Majesty in a mutual Guaranty,

(1) The four sermons were, I. On the death of Queen Mary, 1694. II. On the death of the Duke of Gloucester, 1700. III. On the death of King William, 1701. IV. On the Queen’s accession.

Among the reasons alledg’d by the Bishop for publishing those sermons, he gives the following:

‘ Another reason of my publishing these sermons, at this time, is, that I have a mind to do myself some honour, by doing what honour I could to the memory of two most excellent Princes, and who have very highly deserv’d at the hands of all the people of these Dominions, who have a true value for the Protestant Religion, and the Constitution of the English government, of which they were the great Deliverers and Defenders. I have liv’d to see their illustrious names very rudely handled, and the great benefits they did this Nation, treated slightly and contemptuously. I have liv’d to see our Deliverance from Arbitrary Power and Popery traduced and villified by some, who formerly thought it was their greatest merit, and made it part of their boast and glory to have had a little hand and share in bringing it about: And others, who, without it, must have liv’d in exile, poverty, and misery, meanly disclaiming it, and using ill the glorious instrument thereof. Who could expect such a requital of such merit? I have, I own it, an ambition of exempting myself from the number of unthankful people; and, as I lov’d and honour’d those great Princes living, and lamented over them when dead; so I would gladly raise them up a monument of praise as lasting as any thing of mine can be;

Earl of Godolphin, and so many other illustrious Patriots, whose reputation their enviers endeavoured to blast (x). On the other hand, this treatment of a Prelate so universally esteemed, particularly by the Queen herself, who was used to call him her Bishop, was highly resented, even by many zealous Churchmen. But the Commons carried still further their obsequiousness to the Ministry; for, the same day, the letter from the States to the Queen, in vindication of their conduct, being complained of and read, it was resolved, 'To address her Majesty, to assure her of the just sense this House had of the indignity offered to her, by printing and publishing a letter from the States-General to her Majesty: and to desire her, that she would so far resent such indignities, as to give no answer for the future to any letters or memorials that should be printed and published.' But, the day before, the Queen had thought fit to answer this letter. And it was observed, that a censure was passed upon it merely to gratify Mr Secretary St John; though, on the other hand, several speeches were made, particularly by Mr Lechmere, to justify the States-General; which gave occasion to some people to say, 'That a vote of the Commons was the only answer, that could be returned to their High Mightinesses letter.'

On the 17th of June, Mr Hampden made a motion, 'That an address be made to the Queen, that she would be pleased to give particular instructions to her Plenipotentiaries, that, in the conclusion of the treaty of peace, the several powers in Alliance with her Majesty might be Guarantees for the Protestant Succession to the Crown of these Realms, as settled by act of Parliament in the illustrious House of Hanover.' Endeavours were used to have this motion dropped; but Mr Hampden, and some of his friends insisting to have the question put, it was carried in the negative by a majority of one-hundred and thirty-three voices against thirty-eight. After which it was resolved, '1. That this House had such an entire confidence, in the repeated declarations her Majesty had been pleased to make of her concern for assuring to these Kingdoms the Protestant Succession, as by law established, that they could never doubt her taking the proper measures for the security thereof: And that this House would support her Majesty against faction at home, and her enemies abroad; and did humbly beseech her, that she would be pleased to discountenance all those, who should endeavour to raise jealousies between her Majesty and her Subjects, especially by misrepresenting her good intentions for the welfare of her People.' The Commons having attended the Queen on the 19th of June with this resolution, she returned the following answer:

Gentlemen,

'I return you hearty thanks for this resolution, which is very becoming you, who truly represent all my Commons.
'You have shewn yourselves honest assertors of the Monarchy, zealous defenders of the Constitution, and real friends of the Protestant Succession.
'What I have said and done, is sufficient to satisfy any person, who is in earnest for the Succession, as by law established, in the House of Hanover, that I need not be put in mind of doing any thing, which may contribute to render that succession secure.'

Two days after, the Queen came to the House of Lords, and made the following speech to both Houses:

My

be; and I choose to do it at this time, when it is so unfashionable a thing to speak honourably of them.

The fourth sermon was preached upon the Queen's Accession to the Throne, and in the first year, in which that day was solemnly observed (for, by some accident or other, it had been overlooked the year before) and every one will know, without the date of it, that it was preached very early in this reign, since I was able to promise and preface its future glories and successes, from the good appearance of things, and the happy turn our affairs began to take; and could not then count up the victories and triumphs, that for seven years after made it, in the prophet's language, a name and a praise among all the people of the earth.

(1) The Bishop wrote the following letter to Bishop Burnet upon this occasion:

My Lord,

June 17, 1712.

I received the favour of your Lordship's letter, and took it, as I knew it was intended, very kindly. The manner of my receiving the indignity put upon my Preface was neither like a Christian, nor Philosopher, but like a very worldly man. I knew the whole process, and knew it to be a piece of revenge taken by a wicked party, that found themselves sorely stung; and it affected me accordingly, i. e. very little. I am not one, that love to be the talk of the town; and in this part, I confess, I was uneasy, although I think the talk was very much in my favour. The complaint was made by Hungerford, and seconded by Manley (people, that should indeed have been ordered to have burnt it) and thirled by what we call the Court, and carried by numbers, without a word said against it. Sir Peter

King, Sir Joseph Jekyll, Mr Lechmere, and others of the Robe, were very strenuous advocates in its behalf; and so were other Gentlemen, but to no great purpose; for the Court divided one-hundred and nineteen, and my friends but fifty-four. If their design was to intimidate me, they lost it utterly; or, if to suppress the book, it happened much otherwise; for every body's curiosity is awakened by the usage, and the Bookseller finds his account in it above any one else. The Spectator has conveyed above fourteen thousand of them into other people's hands, that would otherwise have never been nor heard of it. In a word, my Lord, when I consider, that these Gentlemen have used me no worse, than, I think, they have used their own Country, the Emperor, the States, the House of Hanover, and all our Allies abroad, as well as all the bravest, and wisest, and the honestest men we have at home; I am more inclined to become vain, than any ways depressed at what has befallen me, and intend to let up for a man of merit upon this very flock. But, pleasantries apart, my heart is wounded within me, when I consider seriously whereabouts we are, and whither we are tending. The Court party do now own publicly, that, except the Allies accept of the conditions, that are offered them, King Philip is not to make any Renunciation: And certainly the Allies cannot accept of these conditions, unless they are distressed to the last degree. We must, and shall have a separate peace, in spite of all that can be said; and that must be without a Renunciation on the part of France, and without a Guaranty from the Allies: And what a peace is that like to be? It is now said, that England is to constrain the King of France to content the States with a barrier to their liking; and that the rest will come in, or stand out, without any

speech to both Houses.
June 21.
Fr. H. C.*

‘THE last time I was here, I spoke so fully, and afterwards received from both Houses such satisfactory addresses, that there remains little more for me to say at the close of this meeting of Parliament, but to repeat my hearty thanks for your late solemn assurances. They will give me strength to struggle with any difficulties, which may yet be raised; and I hope, that neither they, who envy the making a good peace, nor who think it their interest to continue the war, will be able to defeat our joint endeavours for the honour and advantage of Great-Britain, and the security of all our Allies.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

‘At the same time that I thank you most kindly for the supplies you have cheerfully granted, I cannot but let you know my satisfaction in the near view I have of a peace, since it will in some measure recompense my subjects for their vast expences, and alighten that heavy burthen they have borne during the war.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

‘You have expressed how sensible you are of the advantage and security, which accrue to Great-Britain and our Allies, by the terms proposed for a peace. And I need not mention to you the mischiefs, which must follow from the breaking off this treaty. Our burthens would be at least continued, if not increased; the present opportunity would be irrecoverably lost of Britain's establishing a real balance of power in Europe, and improving our own commerce; and, if any of our Allies should gain something by such a proceeding, the rest would suffer in the common calamity. But I hope, by God's Blessing, such fatal designs will be disappointed.

‘You are now returning into your respective countries, and I persuade myself you will not be wanting in your endeavours to obviate the designs of any ill-minded persons, who may attempt to sow sedition amongst my subjects, and, under specious pretences, carry on designs they dare not own.

‘I hope, at your next meeting, there will be an opportunity of perfecting what I recommended to you, which you have left unfinished in this Session.

‘I cannot conclude without assuring you, that nothing shall move me from steadily pursuing the true interest of so dutiful and affectionate a people.’

After this speech, both Houses were adjourned to the 8th of July. This adjournment; instead of a prorogation, occasioned various discourses; some furnishing, it was intended as a further mortification to Mr Walpole, who rather chose to continue prisoner in the Tower, than to make his submission. Others imagined, it was intended, that, at the expiration of the adjournment, the House should sit again for the dispatch of business. But, whatever ground there was for the first of these conjectures, it appeared there was none for the latter; for at their next meeting, on the 8th of July, the Parliament was prorogued to the 31st of the same month. Upon which Mr Walpole, and the other persons, who were under confinement by order of the Commons, were of course set at liberty.

Though the Queen in her speech said, they approved of her scheme of peace, yet that was not in any of the addresses; many indeed, who intended to merit by their officious zeal, had magnified it in their speeches, but both Houses had observed one caution, not to express their being satisfied with the plan of the peace, tho' it was covertly insinuated.

On the 12th of June, at an assembly of the Address of Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of the City of London, a motion was made for addressing the Queen about the peace; against which some objections were made by Sir Gilbert Heathcote and Sir Charles Peers, who alledged ‘That, the making peace or war being the prerogative of the Crown, they ought not to meddle with it.’ But, the majority, who knew, that such a step would be very acceptable to the Court, being of a contrary opinion, it was carried for an address; which being, two days after, presented, with another from the Lieutenantcy, the Queen knighted John Cais and William Stuart, the Sheriffs, and Samuel Clarke. Upon this a new set of addresses were promoted every where, full of gross flattery; magnifying the present conduct, with severe reflections on the former Ministry, which some carried back to King William's Reign. Some of those addresses mentioned the Protestant Succession, and the House of Hanover, with zeal; others did it more coldly, and some made no mention at all of it. And it was universally believed, that no addresses were so acceptable to the Ministers, as those of the last sort.

But neither the number, nor the noise of addresses, which, during the remaining part of the year, were presented to the Queen, were able to suppress the murmurings of the Whigs, and even of many Tories, who did not like the terms of peace contained in the Queen's speech. On the other hand, the astonishment, not to say indignation with which the Queen's speech was received in Holland, is scarce to be expressed; and exceptions against it were published both by the Dutch and Imperialists (1).

any danger. But I am afraid England has lost all her constraining power, and that France thinks she has us in her hands, and may use us as she pleases, which, I dare say, will be as scurvily as we deserve. What a change has two years made? Your Lordship may now imagine you are growing young again; for we are fallen, methinks, into the very dregs of Charles the Second's Politics; saving, that then they were more reasonable, because our enemy was then in so full power and lustre, as might both terrify and dazzle a Numb. poor luxurious Prince, that would not be disturbed, nor seemed to care much what became of England after he was gone. The present times may put you in mind of those, with this bad difference still, that now the ruinous effects of those advices seem to be taking place after an interval of five or six and twenty years; and after such an interruption, as one would have thought should have quite baffled and destroyed them.’

1712. The States having rightly concluded from the The Dutch declarations of the British General in the army, and of the Bishop of Bristol at Utrecht, that the Ministers of Great-Britain had agreed upon a suspension of arms with France, and would impole it upon the Allies, by withdrawing from the Confederate army, not only their national troops, but also the auxiliaries in their pay, which would make them absolute masters of the Negotiation of peace; they took early measures to prevent it. Messieurs Van Welden and Hop were sent to the army, to concert with Prince Eugene of Savoy proper methods to engage the Generals of those Auxiliaries, and to provide for their subsistence, which commission was executed with success. The Duke of Ormond having caused bread for six days to be distributed to the army under his command (which shewed he designed to make some motion) Prince Eugene asked the Generals of the Auxiliaries, 'Whether they had any orders from their Sovereigns to regulate themselves by, in case the English should withdraw.' It appeared by their answer, that they had received secret instructions, for two only excepted, they unanimously assured the Prince, 'That they would not march with the British General, without communicating the orders they should receive from him to his Highness: And, in case the same were not agreeable to the intentions and interest of the Allies, they would not follow the Duke, but look upon themselves as disengaged from his command.' On the other hand, the States having resolved to prosecute the operations of the war, the trenches were opened before Quefnoy, and the siege carried on with all imaginable vigour under the command of General Fogel.

And having received a copy of the articles signed by the Marquis de Torcy (though not entirely as the Queen had demanded) he immediately directed the Earl of Orkney to prepare himself to march with ten battalions, in order to take possession of Dunkirk; and the same morning he wrote to the Marshall de Villars, 'That he wished the trouble to have signed the copy of the articles, which would have been more regular and more agreeable to the Duke's instructions. However, he would not obstruct the accomplishing of good work, by raising difficulties and scruples, and insisting too much upon the want of formality. That he was just going to make Prince Eugene and the States Deputies a visit, with whom he was to keep measures to the last; and that he should endeavour to persuade them to desist from the siege of Quefnoy, and declare to them, that, in case of their refusal, he should be obliged to withdraw the army of the Queen. That he should send away a detachment the next day, to take possession of Dunkirk; but was of opinion, that the Marshall should have given him an order in form for its surrender; and desired he would lose no time in a matter of so great importance: Concluding, that, as soon as he knew the resolutions of the Prince and the Deputies, he would not fail to let him have notice of it.' The same day, the Duke visited Prince Eugene, and the States Deputies, in pursuance of his promise to acquaint them with any fresh orders he should receive from England, incompatible with his covering the siege of Quefnoy; and told them, 'That the French King had agreed to several articles demanded by the Queen, as a foundation for a suspension of arms; and, among others, the giving up immediately into our possession the Town of Dunkirk. That the Duke therefore could no longer cover the siege of Quefnoy, being obliged by his instructions to march with the Queen's troops, and those in her pay, and to declare a cessation of arms, as soon as Dunkirk was delivered up: And he hoped, they would readily concur therein, which would be the most powerful motive to induce the Queen to take all possible care of their interests at the peace. He likewise endeavoured to shew them, that Dunkirk, as a cautionary town, was a place of greater consequence to the Allies than Quefnoy.'

The Deputies desired five days to consult their Masters upon so important a matter; which the Duke would have allowed them, if, in the mean time, they would have agreed to desist from the prosecution of the siege, or at least to make some delay in it; which, they said, intentions of Great-Britain towards this State, set forth at large, in the Queen's speech to her Parliament. The Emperor finds likewise in it very sensible proofs of affection for him, since he may be left in possession of the Milanese, Naples, Sardinia, and the Low-Countries. But it unluckily falls out, that neither the Imperialists, nor the Dutch, will put a favourable construction on these good intentions. On the contrary, they say, that it is very hard for a Prince, who begins his reign so gloriously as the Emperor, to see himself abandoned, and reduced to give up Catalonia without any equivalent; since he is not to have even Sicily, which, it seems, is to be kept in Petto, the better to allure the Duke of Savoy, in case he should stand out: Besides the securing to him the Succession to the Spanish Monarchy, after the Duke of Anjou, and his issue, by excluding for ever the House of Austria from its rights to Spain. As for the Dutch, they complain, that they are not allowed even the Barrier agreed on, between them and the Queen, in 1709. That by the two or three places, which are to be excepted from that Barrier, Lille and Tournay may be meant; besides the towns they have taken since 1709; which will reduce that Barrier almost to nothing: And that the exception of some species of merchandize, from the Tax of 1664, which they insist upon, may reach their fish, linen, and spices, whereby they may be excluded from all their profitable trade, the other branches being more advantageous to France, than to Holland. These are the chief exceptions of the Imperialists and Dutch; nor is it altogether without reason, that the latter take it ill, that the Duke of Savoy's, and King of Prussia's services to the common cause, are only mentioned and extolled in the Queen's speech; and that no manner of notice is taken of this State, which hitherto has signalized its resolution and constancy, and never offered to break either its promises or engagements, by treating separately with France, though powerful solicitations have not been wanting to induce them to it.' The exceptions of the Imperialists, against the scheme of peace proposed in the Queen's speech, were afterwards fully expressed in a book, intitled, The fight of Europe, which was published in Holland by Count Zinzendorf's direction. Beyr.

However, he at last consented to give them three days; that being no hindrance to the execution of his orders; because he could not expect to have an account before that time from the French Court, how Dunkirk should be delivered up to him. The Deputies refused to let a detachment go through any of their towns in the way to Dunkirk, and both they and Prince Eugene told the Duke, 'That his marching away with the Queen's troops and the foreigners in her pay would leave them to the mercy of the French; but that they were sure the foreigners would not march.' The Duke having taken the first opportunity to sound the Generals of the foreign troops in the Queen's pay, they seemed at first well inclined to continue steady to her interest; and particularly General Bulan, who commanded the Hanoverians, who came to the Duke, seemingly with great joy and satisfaction, as soon as he had read the Queen's speech, and told him, he was ready, with his master's troops, to follow all such orders, as he should think fit to give him. But, upon discoursing with him now, the Duke found, that means had been used to prevail upon him, as well as the rest; who agreed in making excuses, and pretended they could not separate from the Confederacy, without express directions from their Masters, to whom they had sent Couriers. They alledged, 'That neither the grand Alliance, nor the particular Conventions, admitted of any parties treating of, or making peace, or even a suspension of arms, without the consent of the others.' The Duke thought it belonged not to him to enter into these particulars; but insisted on the commands he had received from the Queen, and on the engagements they were under to assist him, their General, in an effectual compliance with them; representing, at the same time, the just reasons the Queen had to resent, and the ill consequences, that would attend their refusal. However, the Duke finding, that the foreign troops would obey no orders, but what they themselves, in conjunction with Prince Eugene and the Deputies, should approve, countermanded the detachment designed for Dunkirk; and in the afternoon sent to Marshal Villars an account of the result of his visit, and desired to know of him more particularly, in what manner Dunkirk was to be put into our hands, in case the English troops marched alone, without the Auxiliaries; which he had reason to suspect might scruple to go along with him: Adding, He hoped he would not defer sending the necessary orders for the delivery of that town, which would be a means to make every thing relating to the peace go on the more easily, and the cessation of arms take effect the sooner.

It is observable, Villars having, at this juncture, caused several bridges to be laid over the Senfet, it occasioned a surmise, that he might intend to attack the Confederate army, in case the Auxiliaries in British pay had marched off with the Duke of Ormond. On the other hand, it was apprehended, that the British General might have a design upon some of the strong towns garrisoned by the Dutch; and therefore Prince Eugene sent for General Hompesch, Governor of Doway, and desired him to take care, that the English troops designed for Dunkirk might not go through Doway. And the like caution was given to other Dutch Governors in relation to the British forces.

Upon the arrival of two expresses from the Confederate army at the Hague, with an account of the Duke of Ormond's declaration about a cessation of arms, the States were immediately assembled; and the same evening invitations were sent to the Ministers of the Allies at Utrecht, to concert measures on the present posture of affairs; and messengers dispatched with circular letters to the several towns of Holland and West-Friseland, to summon an extraordinary meeting of the States of that Province on the first of July, N. S. The city of Amsterdam sent an unprecedented deputation to the Hague, consisting of three Burgomasters, and as many principal Magistrates. Before their departure, the regent Burgomasters held an assembly, in which Monsieur Corver, their senior, a person no less venerable for his age, being eighty-four years old, than for his integrity and wisdom, made a memorable speech; wherein he pathetically laid before them the necessity of carrying on the war, without which their Commonwealth was like to be irrecoverably ruined. He said, 'I am an old man, upwards of fourscore, and have seen far more difficult times, even the French at the very gates; but, by the Blessing of God on our firmness and resolution, we have hitherto preserved our state. I have no private interest in trade, nor any other concern but the good of my country, and the common cause; yet I would give the half of what I have in the world, nay all, rather, than suffer the loss of our liberties. But, if at last we are overpowered, then let us lay our Cities under water, betake ourselves to our ships, and sail to the East-Indies; and let those, who see our country laid waste, say, There lived a people, who chose to lose their country rather than their liberty.' These words had not only an effect upon the assembly at Amsterdam, but also on that of the States to whom they were reported. However, though the majority of the cities had given their Deputies instructions to reject the proposal of a cessation of arms; yet the States thought fit not to come to any resolution about that important affair, but rather to gain time; at least till the reduction of Quefnoy; for which delay the Earl of Strafford's absence from the Hague, and the expectation of his sudden return, gave them a very plausible pretence. Mean while the States received assurances from the Princes, who had troops in British pay, 'That they would maintain them wholly at their own expence under Prince Eugene's command, for one month; and afterwards continue them in the service, and pay half the charges, provided the Emperor and the States would pay the other half.' To which the Dutch were ready enough to consent.

In the mean time the Bishop of Bristol executed his instructions at Utrecht with the same of British punctuality as the Duke of Ormond in the army; and, a Conference being held between the Ministers of the Allies, that Prelate in a solemn manner communicated to them the concession, which the Queen had prevailed on France to make to the Allies, and proposed to them a suspension of arms for two months, in order to treat with the French, and, in a friendly manner, adjust the demands of all the Confederates. None of the Ministers there present having thought fit to return him an answer, all of them looking on one another 1712. another with surprize, the Bishop left them to consult together; upon which some of them spoke very feverly against the proposál. In the afternoon he was in Conference with the rest of those Ministers, and urged to them the necessity of a cessation of arms; but he found them unanimous in their answers, that they had no instructions about that matter, and must wait for fresh orders from their Principals. The next day the Plenipotentiaries of the Allies met at the Deputies of the States, and having concerted some measures, most of them repaired afterwards to the Hague, to assist at the Consultations, that were held in that place.

The Duke of Savoy's Ministers were so highly offended at the report, which had been industriously spread, that their Master had agreed to a suspension of arms, and to the terms of peace concerted between Great-Britain and France, that they publicly disowned it as false and scandalous, declaring, 'That his Royal Highness, their Master, would remain firm in the grand Alliance, being sensible, he had been imposed upon by the insinuations of a certain Minister.' On the other hand, Count Zinzendorf, the first imperial Plenipotentiary, on the 28th of June, N. S. presented to the States-General a memorial, which he called his sentiments upon the affairs of the present conjuncture; wherein having shewed, 'The tendency of the Queen of Great-Britain's speech to her Parliament, and touched upon the declarations of the Duke of Ormond and the Bishop of Bristol, he insisted on the danger, that would result to the common cause from a cessation of arms; commended their High-Mightinesses for approving what Prince Eugene of Savoy and their Deputies had done in the army, and in particular their having furnished bread to the foreign troops in English pay; exhorted them to persevere in these generous and vigorous resolutions; and, in order to maintain a strict union among the Allies, he proposed these five points: 1. That the Alliance ought to be renewed, in order to compass these ends, the recovery of the Spanish Monarchy to the House of Austria; the security of that State by a Barrier in the Netherlands, and of their trade in Spain and the West-Indies; the procuring a Tariff with the King of Portugal and Duke of Savoy, with relation to the Spanish Monarchy; as also those with the King of Prussia, the Elector Palatine, the Elector of Hanover, and all the other Confederate Princes; and that likewise for the security of the associated Circles. 2. That all the Allies should be invited to join in it. 3. That it was necessary to form a plan of the war, so as it might be carried on with most success and least expence. 4. That they should come to some resolution about the war in the North, so as they might be sure of the assistance of the Princes engaged in it, most of whom furnished troops against France. And, 5. That, after these measures were concerted, representations should be made to the Queen of Great-Britain, requesting her to perform her engagements, and to persuade her, that it was the intention of the other Allies to maintain the common cause with inviolable firmness; and that they desired nothing so much, as that she would be pleased to persist in what she had hitherto done so gloriously for that end. He afterwards assured the States, that the Emperor would continue to furnish 20,000 men in Savoy, 30,000 in Spain, 14,000 on the Rhine, 24,000 in the Netherlands, 8,000 in Lombardy, 8,000 in Naples, and 4,000 in Bavaria, in all 108,000 men: That he would furnish the third of four millions of crowns for the war in Catalonia. That he would endeavour to bring more of his troops into the field against France than hitherto, and do his utmost to engage the Empire in general, and all the Princes and States in particular, to make new efforts.³

Whilst these things passed in Holland, a remarkable action was performed in the beginning of the campaign, which greatly alarmed the Court of France. Prince Eugene of Savoy resolved to put Champagne and other Countries under contribution; and, the Deputies of the States having approved his resolution, he detached fifteen hundred horse, dragoons, and hussars, under the command of Major-General Grovesstein, with orders to penetrate into France as far as possible. Those troops were detached with the utmost privacy from the camp at Haspre on the 10th of June. The next day they met at night at Grouville, within three leagues of Neufchatel, on the river Aisne, which they passed the 12th, and advanced at night to Suippe in Champagne. The 13th, they passed the river Noire near St Menesbold. The next day, they passed the Meuse at Seneri, and got into Lorraine; and, the 15th, passed the Moselle at Pont-a-Mousson. The 16th, they came before Metz; and, the 17th, passed the Saar, and retired leisurely towards Traarbach, carrying off with them a vast booty, and a great number of hostages for the payment of the contributions, they had demanded from the Countries, through which they passed, amounting to some millions. They burnt several villages and little towns; and at Metz Grovesstein sent a letter to the Marquis de Refuge, the Governor, and another to the Intendant, to summon them to send Deputies to agree about contributions. The Governor answered him, that he had nothing to send but fire and ball; and that, instead of contributions and hostages, he would only send him some guides, to conduct him whither he deserved to go. Grovesstein, being incensed at this answer, caused about thirty or forty villages, and about twenty castles or forts, to be burnt in sight of Metz, after having plundered them, and retired safe with his booty; for, Villars not being informed of this detachment till twenty-four hours after they were marched, the troops, which he sent after them, could not overtake them. It is impossible to express the great surprize, this expedition caused in the adjacent parts, and even in the Suburbs of Paris; it being reported, the detachment were advancing to that City. The King himself was not thought safe at Versailles with his usual guards; and therefore all the troops quartered in and about Paris were ordered to repair immediately to the King's palace. But Grovesstein, making his retreat, soon put an end to the alarm.

The French were resolved to revenge this excursion, and intrusted Major-General Poiteur, a famous Partisan, with the execution of their design, which he managed with great diligence and dispatch. For, though he had fifteen or sixteen hundred men with him, the Allies had not the least notice of his march, till he was advanced farther than Bergen-op-Zoom, and had plundered Torile, an island belonging to Zea- land,

1712. land, with the town of that name, and several other places. Thirty squadrons were detached from the Confederate army, and all the garrisons were drawn out, to intercept the enemy in their retreat. But Passeur took so well his measures, that he returned safe to Namur with a great booty, and several hostages for contributions.

The siege of Quefnoy being carried on with great vigour and success, and the Duke of Ormond foreseeing the reduction of that place might increase the hopes of the Allies, and obstruct the British measures for a general peace, sent to acquaint Prince Eugene, 'That his troops should continue in the army, provided he would give over the siege of Quefnoy.' But the Prince answered, 'That, instead of relinquishing the siege, he would cause it to be prosecuted with all imaginable vigour, and would let his Grace be eye-witness of another expedition, immediately after the taking of that town.' From this time all correspondence ceased between the Prince and the Duke; and the Prince perceiving, that frequent expresses went between the Duke and the French army, which might prove detrimental to the Confederate cause, held private Conferences with the other Generals, in order to separate their forces from the English, and insinuated, 'That he should be glad, if the English would march off, they being now only a burden to the Netherlands, since they had declared, they would not fight against France.' These passages were not wholly unknown to the Duke of Ormond, who on the 28th of June, N. S. sent his Adjutant with a written order to the Generals of the foreign troops in British pay, commanding them to hold themselves and the forces under their command, in a readiness to march; but, excepting Major-General Berner, who commanded four squadrons, and one battalion of the troops of Holstein-Gottorp, and Major-General Walef, Colonel of a regiment of Dragoons of the troops of Liege, who had the Queen's commission, all those Generals unanimously answered, as they had done before, 'That they could not follow him, nor separate from Prince Eugene, without expresses orders from their respective Princes.' Among the rest the hereditary Prince of Hesse-Cassel bid the Adjutant tell the Duke, 'That the Hessians desired nothing more than to march, provided it were to fight the French; and that he would wait upon the Duke the next day, to give him his reasons for not obeying his orders at that time.'

In the mean time, the siege of Quefnoy was prosecuted with such success, that on the 1st of July, N. S. the Confederates stormed and carried the counterscarp in four places; and on the fourth Monsieur Labadie, the Governor, surrendered the place, and the garrison prisoners of war, which consisted of 2,662 private men; besides several persons of a superior rank. The Confederates put a good garrison into the place under Major-General Ivoy; and all possible expedition was used to repair the breaches, and level the works.

The Earl of Strafford, soon after the prorogation of the Parliament, was again sent over to induce the States to accept the offers the French were making, and to consent to a cessation of arms. Accordingly, at his arrival at the Hague (1), July 6. he desired they would name Deputies to confer with him about matters of the last importance, which he had to lay before them. The States made a solemn deputation from their own body, to whom the Earl of Strafford proposed a suspension of arms for two months, and the entering into the Negotiations for a peace upon the offers of France. After a long Conference, the Deputies returned to the Assembly of the States, and made their report. The Bishop of Bristol being also come to the Hague, several Conferences were held, in all which there were great debates about a cessation of arms, and the conditions, which France might be brought to grant to the States, if they would treat of a general peace. As to the cessation, the British Ministers urged, that Dunkirk would be delivered up to the English, as a security for the performance of what the French had promised; to which it was answered, 'That there ought to be a security for the States, and other Allies, as well as for the English;' and, to that purpose, mention was made of Strasbourg to the Germans, and Namur, Charleroy, and Tpres to the Dutch. It was replied, that Maubeuge and Condé might be put into the hands of the States-General. But this was rejected, because it was suggested in the other part of the debate, that the States should surrender to the French Doway, Lisle, and Tournay. The Dutch Deputies being startled at this proposal, which, they said, was more in favour of France, than of the Allies, the British Plenipotentiaries answered, They hoped France might be prevailed with to be contented with Lisle and Doway, as an equivalent for Dunkirk; and, upon that condition, to grant to the States the Barrier, which they demanded in 1709, and the Tariff of 1664, excepting only the following species of merchandize, which the Dutch should not be permitted to import into France: Whale-oil, soap, sugar, and dry fish; as also the duty of fifty sols per tun, which the French King would not remit. The Earl of Strafford likewise insisted, that the States should withdraw their forces from Spain and Portugal, and forthwith return a categorical answer to their proposals. During the debate, the States sent to the Ministers of Prussia and Hannover, to know what they might depend upon as to the troops of their Masters; to which they returned not only a favourable answer, but, at the desire of the States, wrote letters to the Generals of those forces, to act according as those Ministers had promised they should. On the other hand, the Emperor's Ministers, suspecting what would be proposed, signified to the States, that, if they agreed to a cessation of arms, Prince Eugene had orders immediately to march off with all the Emperor's forces into the Empire, and leave the Dutch to the mercy both of their old and new enemies. This, together with the remonstrance of the Pensionary, the Register Fogel, and Monsieur Slingerland, inclined the States of the province of Holland and West-Friseland to come to an unanimous resolution on the 9th of July, N. S. 'That they were entirely son, he said, They made a great noise for a paity town.

1712. tirely disposed to put an end to this bloody and expensive war by a good peace: That, in order to that, they were ready to listen to such proposals, as France should be willing to make in writing, in answer to the specific demands of the Allies: That, if the same were just and reasonable, in such a case their High Mightinesses would readily consent to a general peace; but that they would never depart from their engagements with their Allies, without whose consent they could not agree to a cessation of arms.' This resolution was so great a mortification to the British Ministers, that the Earl of Strafford said with some vehemence, 'That he would go to the army, and execute his orders.' He was prayed to defer his journey for one day, which he refused, unless Prince Eugene were desired to forbear hostilities. After some deliberation, he was told, an express should be sent to Prince Eugene, to desire, that he would undertake nothing till forty-eight hours after the Earl of Strafford's arrival in the army.

Sir Thomas Hanmer's conduct in Flanders.

About this time a report was spread in Holland, that the English had formed a design to seize Ossend, which was occasioned by Sir Thomas Hanmer's repairing to that town towards the end of June, N. S. his causing the depth of the harbour to be sounded; and his viewing the fortifications with the Burgomaster Bauwens, who was supposed to be in the British interest. Sir Thomas having spent some days at Bruges and Ghent, where his presence was thought necessary to prepare matters for future designs; that Gentleman, who from this time began to appear with the title of the Queen's Minister, repaired to Brussels, where the Earl of Strafford arrived the 11th of July, N. S. From thence the Earl went the next day to the Duke of Ormond's army, then encamped at Cheateau Cambresis, and found, it was high time to separate the British forces from the Germans, between whom there had been frequent quarrels, in which many men, and even some Officers, had been killed on both sides. The day before, a Council of war was held at Prince Eugene's quarters at Hafpre, wherein it was agreed, that the army should make a movement to attack Landrecy; that the Prince of Anhalt Dessau should command the siege of that place; and, if the English retired from the army, nothing should be omitted to carry on the war with the utmost vigour, in order to take winter-quarters in Picardy. The Earl of Strafford, foreseeing what a martial answer he must expect, in case he should propose a cessation of arms, continued at the Duke of Ormond's quarters, where he conferred with none of the Commanders of the auxiliary troops, except the General of the Hanoverians, who was instructed to declare, that his Master, as an Elector of the Empire, was obliged to follow the resolutions of the head and members of that great body. Whether the Earl of Strafford expected the first visit from Prince Eugene and the States Deputies is uncertain; but, if he did, he was disappointed; and, having notified to them his arrival in the Duke of Ormond's camp no sooner than the 14th of July, the Prince and the Deputies contented themselves with returning him a compliment upon it.

The news of the auxiliaries refusing to obey the Duke of Ormond variously received in England.

The news of the British Auxiliaries refusing to march with the Duke of Ormond was variously entertained in England, according to the different inclinations and views of the several parties.

Those, who had either opposed or disapproved the late measures, could not but rejoice at it; openly declaring their hopes, that the Confederates would carry on the war without England; others spreading reports of the Duke of Ormond's having been threatened by some German Generals; and others again whispering about their secret wishes, under the notion of apprehensions of a design formed by those Generals to confine the Duke for their arrears, and even to disarm the British troops, lest they should join the French army. Whether such a thought was entertained by any of those Commanders, is very difficult to determine; but it is certain no such thing was ever proposed to the States Deputies; and it is more than probable, that, if it had, it would have been rejected with indignation. However, it is observable, that the friends of the new Ministry were apt enough to suspect such a design, and very industrious in insufling the belief of it, in order to render the Allies still more odious to the people.

However this be, the Duke of Ormond found himself in a very uneasy posture. Upon a supposition, that Villars would send him a satisfactory answer, and the foreign troops persist in their refusal to obey his orders, he designed to march with all the English troops, and the artillery, to Dunkirk, where he thought they would be most secure, and would have the sea open, in case the Queen should think fit to recall them. But on the 27th of June he received a letter from Villars which imported, 'That the King (of France) might very well be astonished, that, in case of a cessation, the Generals of the auxiliary troops should make any difficulty to separate from Prince Eugene; and that it was surprising, the Dutch should have more power over men, whom they did not pay, to make them hazard their lives, than the Queen, who had paid them this dozen years, should have to persuade them not to expose themselves to any danger.' The Duke received also the copy of a letter from the Marquis de Torcy to Mr St John, wherein the Marquis urged, 'That in the articles agreed on it was expressed, the cessation should be between the armies which were at present in the Netherlands: That it was upon this view of a general cessation, so important a place as Dunkirk was to be delivered up: That the chief motive, which made England and France agree to a cessation, was, that nothing might happen between the armies to interrupt the measures, which were taken for a peace. That, to effect this, nothing but a general cessation would be sufficient; and, if the enemies of peace had still the liberty, the means, and the power of acting left them, the condition, upon which the King was to surrender Dunkirk to the Queen, would not be complied with on her part: That the King always thought, the Queen was entire mistress of the troops, which composed her army; and that they had all orders to follow the Duke of Ormond's directions; and therefore upon a cessation were to forbear action, as well as the English. That in case the English alone left the army, Prince Eugene, finding himself the sole General at the head of great numbers of men, would hazard any thing to come to an action, and would not at all scruple to sacrifice troops, which his Master did not pay, and which were to be under the Prince's command only during the remainder of the campaign. There-

1712. Therefore, since these proposals for a cessation neither answer the measures, which the Queen had hitherto taken for a peace, nor agreed to the articles, which had been concerted between her Majesty and the King upon that subject, the King was persuaded, that the Queen would give the Duke of Ormond full instructions to separate the whole entire army, which was in her pay, and actually under the Duke's command, from that of Prince Eugene: And, when this was done, the King would be ready to deliver up Dunkirk, as it had been agreed upon in the articles for the cessation.* This letter gave the Duke good reason to hope, that the Queen would approve of his desiring to separate her troops, and to march towards Dunkirk; till he had sufficient assurance, that the place would be delivered up to him; whereas now the contrary appeared so evidently, that he should have thought himself immediately at liberty to act in conjunction with the Allies, would he have taken upon himself to make a step of that consequence, without the Queen's particular orders; but these he had further room to expect, since the Allies were now engaged in the siege of Quenoy, and in no condition therefore at present of attacking the enemy. And the Duke was the less uneasy under this delay, being sensible, that England had not been able, on her part, to make good the condition of a general cessation, upon which the immediate delivery of Dunkirk was promised. Villars, in his letter, had invited the Duke to an interview, which the Duke (being no way empowered to agree to it) declined, and excused himself in a letter to the Marshal. While he was dispatching an express with an account of all these proceedings, a Messenger brought him a letter of the 14th of June from Mr Secretary St John, which gave the Duke an account * That the Courier returned from France the night before, and that her Majesty's demands were complied with to her satisfaction. If therefore his Grace had any difficulties, as several were foreseen, which might arise in taking possession of Dunkirk, he might keep his army entire, and the measures were ready in England for sending over troops sufficient for that service. That nothing could be more dreadful to the Dutch than this town in English hands. That he was therefore to consider the temper they were in; and, if he were likely to have the least disturbance given him on this account, he was to keep the secret, send his accounts to the Queen, and, in the mean time, the troops should be ready to enter the place from England; where means would be found of concerting things so, that the declaration for a suspension of arms should be exactly timed with the evacuation of Dunkirk. If he had taken possession, well; if not, they could be able to do it from thence; and perhaps, in the present ferment, he had better lie still, and let Dunkirk be possessed first, and the clamour happen afterwards.* On the 5th of July came another letter, of June 20, from the Secretary, informing the Duke, * That the Queen had ordered Lord Strafford to make all possible haste to the army, with instructions, which were necessary in this critical conjuncture: That the foreign Ministers had been told, that the Queen would look upon herself as acquitted from all obligations of arrears or subsidies to that Prince, whose troops should refuse to obey her General's orders without hesitation: That his

Grace should declare as much to those, who commanded them, and require a positive answer from them: That, till Lord Strafford came, the best use, his Grace could make of the intermediate time, would be to continue vigilantly on his guard, and to speak in the plainest and most resolute manner to them.* In this letter was inclosed the copy of one from the Secretary to the Marquis de Torcy of the same date, the subject of which was, * That the Queen, having received an account of what had passed, both from the Duke of Ormond and from France, commanded him to acquaint the Marquis, how great a dissatisfaction it was to her to see, that the enemies of peace had again found out means to retard its conclusion, by exposing the methods, by which it was to be gained, to new difficulties and dangers. But as she had taken a firm and immoveable resolution, not to give the least way to those obstructions, and to continue her utmost endeavours, in concert with the King, towards establishing a general peace; so she did not doubt, but she should be able to defeat the last efforts of those, who either sought their own interest, or gratified their private resentments, in prolonging the miseries of war. That he, in the Queen's name, had declared to the Ministers of those Princes, who had troops in her pay, that, in this juncture, she would look upon the conduct of the foreign Generals, as a declaration of their Masters for or against her, since they must either follow the plan, which she had laid for obtaining a peace, or that, which the Emperor and the States had formed for the breaking it off. That the Queen could not but persuade herself, that those Generals, after a little reflection, would obey the Duke of Ormond's orders without the least hesitation; but, if they did not, she would pay those troops no longer. That those Ministers had writ to their Generals by this Courier; and the Duke of Ormond would receive orders, not only to make the same declarations, but to put them immediately in execution, if they refused. That the Queen thought this method could not fail of succeeding; but, in case any of the foreign troops persisted in their design of staying with Prince Eugene, the Duke of Ormond should retire with the English forces, and all the Foreigners, who would march with him (which to be sure would be the greatest part of them) and declare, that her Majesty would no longer act against France, nor pay those, that did. That she, who had hitherto observed measures with her Allies, being forced by them to such an extremity as this, thought herself justified before God and man, and at liberty to carry on the Negotiation at Utrecht, or elsewhere, without regarding, whether they concurred with her or no. So that, if the King would surrender the town and forts of Dunkirk into the Queen's hands, tho' all the foreign troops, or some of them, should refuse to obey the Duke of Ormond, she would no longer make any scruple of concluding her particular peace, and would set a time for the others to come in upon those conditions, which should be agreed upon between her and France. That the peace was now in the King's breast. If all the army of the Duke of Ormond should agree to a suspension of arms, the first project, which was concerted between them, had its effect: If they did not, the Duke would withdraw with the

1712. the English from the Allies, and the foreign troops would be left to take service with the Dutch, who were so far from being able to furnish this new expence, that they were not in a condition to support the charges they were already at. In short, that England would retire from the theatre of war, and, since there would be but a few powers left in a capacity to make head against France, the peace might be concluded between those two Kingdoms in a few weeks. These were the proposals her Majesty made; and she believed the King would find his account in them, as well upon the latter as the former plan; and that, besides, he would think it for both their interests, to make immediately a general cessation, as well by sea as by land, between the two crowns. That every moment of time was precious in such a juncture; and that therefore the Marquis is desired to dispatch a Courier to the Duke at the same time he sent to England. If the Duke had notice, that the King had given orders to the Officer, who commanded in Dunkirk, for the surrender of it, he would immediately execute what the Secretary had proposed; and in that case her Majesty would send some regiments from England to take possession of that place, which would be a way less liable to accidents, than making a detachment from the Duke's army, as was at first designed. The letter concludes, that the Queen had resolved to send the Earl of Strafford directly to the army. In the postscript of the Secretary's letter, wherein this to the Marquis de Torcy was inclosed, he writes thus: 'I need not caution your Grace, that the inclosed for Monsieur de Torcy is fit to fall under the eye of no person whatsoever but your Grace.' And he orders the Duke to give Villars an account of the endeavours, which the Queen had used to subdue the obstinacy of those, who refused to obey, and of his expectations to hear from him in an express sent to France; and a second time, according to what was said to the Marquis de Torcy, the Duke is ordered, 'That, if he received an account from the Court of France, that her Majesty's last proposals are agreed to, and orders dispatched for the surrender of Dunkirk, without any more ado to declare the suspension of arms between Great-Britain and France, and to keep the whole body, which shall obey his orders, entire, and to withdraw in the best manner his circumstances will allow.'

This offer was no sooner received in France, but without the loss of one moment's time it was accepted and consented to, as Torcy acquainted Mr St John in a letter of the 5th of July, N. S. wherein he mentioned very particularly all the reasons and engagements, which had been so plainly and explicitly proposed; and upon condition, that the Queen immediately made a separate peace, kept no measures with her Allies, but only left them a time to submit to the conditions, which should be agreed upon for them between France and England, the King of France had determined to send his orders to permit the English troops to enter into Dunkirk. And at the same time a Courier was dispatched to Villars to carry him these orders. And as a general cessation from all Hostilities both by land and sea between the two Nations had been proposed by England, till their treaties could be finished, the King of France with the same readiness consented to that.

Hereupon Sir John Leake set out for Deal to 1712, take upon him the command of the fleet in the June 27. Downs; and to provide transports for the troops, that were appointed to take possession of Dunkirk, under the command of Brigadier Hill, brother to the Lady Masbam; namely, a battalion of Scots guards, about a thousand men detached from several regiments of Marines, and the regiments of Hill, Desaulny, and Kane. At the same time Sir James Abercrombie, a creature of Duke Hamilton, and Colonel King, were sent to Dunkirk, to regulate matters with Count d'Aumont, the French Governor, who on the 7th of July, N. S. caused a royal order to be published there, by which the French troops in that town, and in the citadel, Risbank, and other forts, were enjoined to be in a readiness to march out on the appearance of the English. The day the Earl of Strafford arrived in the Duke of Ormond's camp, the Duke received advice from Dunkirk, that Sir James Abercrombie and Colonel King were come thither from England, whereupon he immediately sent Colonel Lloyd, who returned the 15th of July, N. S. in the evening with an account, that Count d'Aumont had received the French King's orders to resign the town and forts, as soon as the English came to demand possession. Brigadier Hill having embarked, Sir John Leake, with the Squadron under his command, sailed early the next morning, and at two in the afternoon came to anchor off Dunkirk. The next day the troops were landed, and the keys of the town were delivered to Brigadier Hill, who took possession, and the French garrison marched to Wimborgh. Immediately upon this the Queen's colours were hoisted in three several places of the town; though not only the civil government was continued in the hands of the French, and several of their ships and galleys permitted to stay in the harbour, with two or three battalions of Marines in the town, on pretence of guarding the stores; but the privateers of that place were indulged the liberty of going in and out, provided they brought no English prizes into the port.

On the 14th of July, N. S. Prince Eugene sent the Duke of Ormond word, that he intended to march on the 16th. The next morning the Duke sent to let the Prince know, he was surprized at his message, there having not been of the least previous concert with him, nor any mention made, which way, or on what design he was to march; and therefore he could not resolve to march with him; much less could the Prince expect any assistance from the Queen's army, in any design thus undertaken. That he thought fit to acquaint him of this beforehand, that he might take his measures accordingly, and not attribute to him any misfortune which might happen. The Duke likewise let him know, that, when he marched, he himself should be obliged to take the best care he could for the security of the Queen's troops, and, in order to that, to change his camp. The same day, Marshal Villars giving the Duke of Ormond an account, that he had sent by Colonel Lloyd orders for the delivery of Dunkirk, says: 'Permit me, Sir, to have the honour to tell you, though it be very advantageous not to be obliged to engage the bravest and boldest of our enemies, yet it is very important to know those, that remain so; and I take the liberty to desire you would do me the honour to send me word what Troops and 1712. and what Generals will obey your orders, because the first attempt the enemy makes, I will not lose one moment to meet them. The King gives me liberty to fight, which nothing but the Negotiations have hitherto prevented, and which the army under my command has a great desire to make use of. I think the work is finished, if the army, which is under your orders, obeys them. This then, Sir, is no indiscreet curiosity, that I presume to desire you to give me some lights upon the doubts, which I am in. I shall be very much obliged to you, Sir, if, by the return of this Trumpet, you will honour me with one word of answer upon the lights, which I have desired of you. You will give me leave to join to this packet a letter for my Lord Strafford.² On the 15th of July, the Duke, in answer to this letter, wrote: 'I should be glad I were at present in a capacity to give you all the insight you desire; but it is impossible for me. Notwithstanding, I was unwilling to delay sending back the Trumpet, to let you know I am well assured, I shall be capable of telling you to-morrow particularly what troops will remain under my command. As to the suspension of arms, you already know, Sir, that according to my orders I cannot declare it in form, till I am assured the Governor of Dunkirk shall have executed all the King's orders for the evacuation of the place. In the mean time, you will agree with me, Sir, that the suspension has already its effects on my side, since I have just now informed Prince Eugene and the States Deputies, that, in case they should undertake any new operation, I could not give them any assistance from the Queen's army.'

Prince Eugene marches with the British Auxiliaries.

On the 16th of July, N. S. Prince Eugene broke up from his camp at Haupre, and marched off with the troops under his command; being followed by all the Danes, Prussians, Saxons, Hanoverians, and other auxiliaries in British pay, except four squadrons of Vander Naib, and a battalion of Berners, of the troops of Holstein Gottorp, and Baron Walef's regiment of dragoons. He encamped at Aire, near Landreecy; which place the Prince of Anhalt-Deschau invested the next day, with thirty-four battalions, and as many squadrons; whereupon the Duke of Ormond decamped the same morning from Chateau-Cambresis, and came to Avesne le Secq. The day before, he wrote to the Marshal Villars: 'Your Trumpet just now put into my hands the honour of your letter of the 15th, and I am now to acquit myself of the promise I made you yesterday. Prince Eugene is marched this morning, and all the foreign troops have quitted us, except one battalion and four squadrons of Holstein, and two squadrons of Walef. Things having passed, as I have the honour to tell you, I thought myself obliged to acquaint you of it as soon as possible; and, as I observed to you yesterday, the suspension of arms has already its effect on my part, by the separation I have made of the Queen's troops, and all her artillery, from those of Prince Eugene, and by my declaring to him, I could give him no assistance; and that the payment of the foreign troops is stopped; and that by consequence there is fallen upon the Emperor and Holland a burthen, they will not be long able to support. I trust, Sir, to your good faith, and shall, to-morrow, make a movement to put myself in another situation; and, I hope, I shall have news from Dunkirk, that will authorize me to declare the suspension of arms.' On the same day, Villars acquainted the Duke, that the Governor of Dunkirk was making the necessary preparations to evacuate that place; and told him, 'For my part, Sir, as I already reckon you for our Ally, I am not at all in haste to have you further off. You are at your own liberty to come near us, and encamp on the King's territories, wherever you shall think proper.' Upon this the Duke, the 17th next day, ordered a cessation of arms for two months to be proclaimed by sound of trumpet.
No. 70. Vol. IV.

Had the first design taken effect, which was depended upon by France, and so far presumed by England, as to be undertaken for, that all the foreigners in the Queen's pay, that composed the Duke of Ormond's army, should separate and withdraw from the rest of the Allies, it is notorious, that from that instant Prince Eugene's whole army, unless they submitted to the same measures, had been left at the mercy of the French army to be cut in pieces, or made prisoners at the will of Marshal Villars, which had left the Queen's troops in no better a condition than to have the privilege of being last destroyed. Yet all the Allies, whole honour and conscience would not permit them to abandon their Confederates, and leave them as a sacrifice to France, were punished by England with the loss of their pay and subsidies, which was all that was in the power of the Ministry to do, to shew their resentment at this great disappointment of the measures of France.

This march of Prince Eugene, the Earl of Strafford, in a letter to Mr St John, thought might be turned upon them; and he prevailed with the Duke of Ormond in a message to Prince Eugene to say, 'That his marching without us, and all the Queen's Auxiliaries marching from us, exposed us so, that we have been obliged to send to the French to declare with us a cessation of arms: Nothing less could put the Queen's troops in safety. For though, says the Earl, Matters fell out so fast, that without this we must have declared for the cessation, yet why should we not turn all this matter upon them?'

Upon a thorough consideration of this fatal cessation, it is very evident, that it was of infinite advantage, and absolutely necessary to the affairs of France; and therefore insisted upon by them. And it is as certain, that the English Ministry gave early into it, if they were not the first advisers of it; for which no other account need be required, but that, as all their measures tended to advance the interest of the Queen's enemies, they could not fail to be zealous in a point, which contributed more to those views than any one occurrence during the whole Negotiation; but, as they all along wanted appearances, and consulted them more than any real advantages to the Kingdom, they thought it necessary to annex some conditions to this important article, that might pass upon the deluded people, as a justification of this unprecedented treachery. The demolition of Dunkirk was always so popular, a point, that nothing could strike the imaginations of the people more, than to be told, that this important place was delivered into the Queen's possession. This step, they thought, well improved, would recommend the peace itself, at least justify the cessation. And as the Nation had nothing more at heart than the disposition of the Spanish Monarchy, after the renunciation had been indutiously cried up, and the Queen had declared from the Throne, that France and Spain were thereby more effectually divided than ever, these two articles were made the essential conditions of granting a cessation of arms. For the renunciation, France easily consented to it, having declared it to be null and void by the fundamental laws of France. For the other article, it is evident how unwillingly France was brought to surrender Dunkirk; but this the Ministry were resolved to purchase at any rate, as what would easily amuse and sensibly affect the Nation; and therefore, to obtain this, they engaged not only to grant a cessation of arms, but to conclude a separate peace. The prospect of concluding a separate peace, and the obtaining immediately a cessation of arms, which answered all the purposes of France almost as well as a separate peace, by leaving the whole Confederacy in their power, and, at their mercy, were so great temptations to France, that the surrender of Dunkirk was agreed to. But, when it is considered what England gained by granting this fatal cessation, it will be found, that the demolition of Dunkirk has by no means answered the purposes pretended by it; and, for the renunciation, the English Ministry were told by France, that they should deceive themselves, who received it as a sufficient expedient to prevent the union of the two Monarchies (1).

Condé the Duke of Ormond.

In the evening of the same day, the Duke of Ormond had declared the suspension of arms, Villars sent him word, he had likewise that day declared the same, pursuant to their agreement. On the 18th of July, N. S. the British forces marched from Avesne le Secq to Elines, being joined in the way by two battalions and two squadrons of Great-Britain, which made part of the separate body posted at Denain under the command of the Earl of Albemarle. Before the separation of the Confederate forces, the Deputies of the States said openly, 'That they hoped the Duke of Ormond did not intend to march through any of their towns. But, notwithstanding this declaration, the Earl of Stratford and some English Officers having that day offered to pass through Bouchain, they were refused entrance at the gates, and told by the guards, 'That positive orders were given to let no Englishman into the town.' The Officers, not being satisfied, sent to the Commandant himself, who returned the same answer. When the British army came near Downay, they met with the like treatment from the Commandant of that place, which was the more surprizing, because the British forces had their hospital and great quantities of stores in that town. The Duke of Ormond, the better to provide for the security and subsistence of the troops, that were with him, as well as for those in the town and citadel of Ghent, where part of his artillery and ammunition was kept, made the disposition for marching towards that place. Prince Eugene and the Deputies of the States were so alarmed at the Duke's intention of going towards Ghent, that on the same day they sent Count Nassau Woudenberg to the Duke with a memorial, but not signed, 'To represent to him, that, after the excuses made by the Lord Albemarle the day before at Bouchain, they were extremely dissatisfied to hear by public report, that the Commandant of Downay had likewise refused to admit some of the English Officers, and to let out the undertakers for the Queen's magazines. That they were very much mortified at the extraordinary conduct of those two Commandants, and assured his Grace, they had absolutely no orders for so doing, directly or indirectly; and that they not only disavowed their proceedings, but would give them such a reprimand, as they deserved.' But this memorial made no impression on the Duke, who was persuaded, that the Commandants had express orders for what they had done; and that those orders were general, since, after the presenting of the memorial, the same difficulties happened at Tournay, Oudenard, and Lisse, as had at Bouchain and Downay. But the design of those orders seems to have been, that the British Officers should be permitted to pass through the frontier towns, but that the troops should not be suffered to possess themselves of them. The next day, the Duke pursued his march to Fleurbaey, near Tournay; and on the 26th received a letter from Mr St John, now created Viscount Bolingbroke, acquainting him, 'That, for many reasons, the Queen thought it most advisable, that he should march to Dunkirk, unless some objection, unforeseen in England, might arise: That his Grace should withdraw the Queen's forces and stores, that were in Ghent; and concert every thing with Villars, and promise him full satisfaction for whatever the Queen's forces should take of the subjects of France.' The report was then current*, that, before the Duke of Ormond declared the cessation of arms, the Earl of Stratford went incognito to the French camp, to concert measures with Marshal Villars; and that, amongst other things, it was agreed, that the British troops should make themselves masters of Ghent and Bruges, whereby they should have the command of the navigation of the Lys and Scheldt, and be able to put an effectual stop to any further progress of the Confederate army under Prince Eugene, in case the French Generals found it impracticable to relieve Landrecy. That this was the design of the Duke of Ormond

(1) Burnet observes on this occasion: The withdrawing the English forces in this manner, from the Confederate army, was censured, not only as a manifest breach of faith and of treaties, but as treacherous in the highest and basest degree. The Duke of Ormond had given the States such assurances, of his going along with them through the whole campaign, that he was let into the secrets of all their Counsels, which by that confidence were all known to the French: And, if the auxiliary German troops had not been prepared to disobey his orders, it was believed he, in conjunction with the French army, would have forced the States to come into the new measures. But that was happily prevented; yet all this conduct of our General was applauded at home as great, just, and wise; and our people were led to think it a kind of triumph, upon Dunkirk's being put into our hands; not considering, that we had more truly put ourselves into the hands of the French, by this open breach of faith; after which, the Confederates could no longer trust or depend on us. Nor was this only the act of the Court and Ministry, but it became the act of the Nation, which by a general voice did not only approve of it, but applauded it. Burnet, Vol. II. 610.

1712. mond in bending his march towards Ghent, is highly probable; but, whether or no the same was concerted by the Earl of Strafford and Marshal Villars, it is certain, that the Earl suggested that counsel to the Duke of Ormond; nor is it less certain, that the States-General were extremely alarmed at it.

On the 21st of July, N. S. the Earl of Strafford, accompanied by General Cadogan, having passed through Tournay and Lisle (at both which places he was received with great demonstrations of respect) joined the British forces at their camp at Flourival. The next day in the afternoon, the British troops moved to Petteghem, near Oudenard, and desired passage through that town; but the Commandant, having no orders about it, thought fit to keep the gates shut, which occasioned bitter reflections against the Dutch; but their precaution proceeded from an apprehension, that, if the English were possessed of any of their strong towns, they should be compelled to submit to the scheme of peace concerted between Great-Britain and France. On the 23d in the evening, the Duke of Ormond's army pursued their march to Ghent, of which he took possession, as he did also of Bruges. This done, he detached six battalions to reinforce the garrison of Dunkirk, and sent thither a train of artillery, with some ammunition; the French having drawn off most of their cannon from the ramparts of that place; which, together with the force they had still in it, rendered our possession for some time precarious (1).

It was not long before the Allies felt the fatal effects of their being abandoned by the British forces. Villars having received orders to raise the siege of Landrecy at any rate, and his army being reinforced with part of the garrisons of several places, he resolved to attack the small body of the Confederate troops encamped at Denain, which kept an open communication between Prince Eugene's army and the village of Marchiennes, through which all their artillery, ammunition, and provisions, must necessarily pass; rightly judging, that, if he could possess himself of these stores, the Allies would not be in a condition to carry on their siege. To execute this design, he passed the Scheldt, and encamping on the Selle towards Chateau-Cambreſis, ordered one thousand five hundred men to widen and level the roads towards the Sambre, and to lay bridges over that river. Upon these motions, Prince Eugene caused a great intrenchment to be made before his left, and posted behind it General Fagel with forty battalions, and caused his right to move up nearer about three leagues, that he might be in a condition to maintain the siege with all his forces. Mean while Villars caused the Count de Braglio to advance along the Selle with forty squadrons, causing all the passages of that river to be guarded, to the end that none of the parties of the Allies might pass over it, to observe the motions of the French army. At the same time he ordered the Marquis de Vieuxpont to march with thirty battalions of the left, some artillery and pontons, and lay bridges at Neufville over the Scheldt, between Bouchain and Denain. He caused him to be

(1) That the taking possession of Ghent and Bruges, was not only the desire of Torcy, but was also supported by the advice of the Earl of Strafford, appears by the Earl's letter of July 17, to Mr St John, where he says: 'I am for having the Duke of Ormond send some party on purpose to march through some of their towns, to see whether or no they would refuse them passage. If they did, that might authorize us the more to do a thing very agreeable to the Queen's troops, and what I believe you would approve of.' And, that there might be no doubt of his meaning in what he had advised, in another letter of the 21st of July he tells Mr St John, 'The measure, I mentioned would not be disagreeable to you, was, that of marching to Ghent, which we have now so well executed, that we are within two days march of it, and the English are entire masters of the citadel, as likewise of all the gates of the town. This is a Coup de parti for the States, who did not expect it, else they could not have behaved themselves with the Hauteur they lately did. The thing was so well and secretly managed, that all preparations were made to march about to Warneton, between Lille and Ypres, to have lived upon the French country; and, till we marched a day's march on this side the Scarpe, the Dutch and their friends did not perceive our design, which, as soon as they did, their surprize and uneasiness were equally great.' Rep. of the Com. of Secrs.

How agreeable to the Queen and her Ministers the Duke of Ormond's conduct was, is plain from Mr St John's letter to him, acquainting him: 'That, though the orders, he transmitted to his Grace in his last, did appear to her Majesty, at that time, to be the most proper, the methods he had pursued were so rightly judged, and so well adapted to the present conjuncture of affairs, that they answered, in every point, what she would have wished. That she was unwilling to restrain his Grace, by particular and positive instructions, who made use of the discretionary power given him, so much to her honour, and the good of her subjects.

That the news, of Dunkirk's being in our hands, could not have been followed by any more agreeable, than that of his Grace's having directed his march towards Ghent: For as, by the possession of the former place, we should treat with the French under great advantage; so, by the steps which he had taken for securing the latter, the Dutch and Imperialists would be brought to a more decent way of behaviour to the Queen, than they had hitherto been in. That her Majesty recommended to his Grace the securing to himself the possession of Ghent, as long as might be thought necessary; as also the reinforcing the garrison of Dunkirk, and the furnishing that place with what stores he might spare, and the garrison want.' Cond. of the Duke of Ormond.

The Lord-Treasurer also complimented the Duke of Ormond in a very uncommon strain:

My Lord,

Aug. 5, 1712.

'No pen, nor tongue, is able to express the great pleasure I took in your Grace's successes. It was a very great satisfaction to see so much done for the public; to see such an example of steady conduct, in so great a Nobleman, and so courageous a heart, is what has made you envied by some, dreaded by your enemies, and applauded by all men of knowledge and understanding. Your Grace's march to Ghent, &c. is a Coup de Maitre; it is owned to be so in France and Holland: And I must own, I take a double pleasure in it, because it is done by the Duke of Ormond, to whose person I have so entire a friendship, and in whose success I take so particular an interest. Monsieur Torcy wrote a very just compliment on the affair of Denain, That the Allies might now see, what they had lost by her Majesty's withdrawing her forces, and what value they ought to put upon a Nation, which every where led victory with it. I am, with the utmost respect and attachments, &c.'

be followed by Count Albergotti with twenty other battalions, and by all the army, in four columns, and a fifth of artillery, having some days before sent the heavy baggage to St Quintin. Notwithstanding the Marquis de Vieuxpont made all possible expedition, he could not reach Neufville till the 24th of July, at eight in the morning, where he immediately caused bridges to be laid over the Scheld. Broglie arrived about nine, with his forty squadrons; as did likewise Villars, who ordered him to pass over before the infantry, which he did with great difficulty, by reason of a morass, which was beyond the bridge, which the horse and dragoons were forced to march through four a-breast.

The precautions, which Villars had used, to conceal his true design, and his march from the Confederates, succeeded so well, that Prince Eugene had no intelligence of either till the 24th, at seven in the morning; when being informed, that the enemy laid bridges over the Scheld, he hastened to the Camp at Denain, after having given orders to the troops, which he had drawn to some distance from it, to follow him. The Prince viewed the camp and intrenchments at Denain: gave the Earl of Albemarle such Directions as he thought necessary for the defence of that important post; reinforced the eleven battalions, that were there, with six more from the army; and judging, that fourteen squadrons, which were also in the intrenchments, would be useless, he caused them to retire with the baggage. After which he went away himself, to hasten the march of his troops, in order to attempt the succour of the Earl of Albemarle, or at least to save part of the infantry. The Prince was scarce got out of the lines, when Broglie attacked those between Neufville and Denain; and, finding them weakly guarded, he forced them almost without any resistance; four battalions of Palatines, and other German Auxiliaries, who were posted there, throwing down their arms, upon the first discharge. He found within these lines five hundred waggons loaden with bread for the Confederate army, guarded by five hundred horse, and the same number of foot, who were surrounded, and most of them either killed or taken. Upon the first appearance of the enemy on that side, the Earl of Albemarle advanced with part of his forces to defend the convoy, and sustain the four battalions; but finding, they had cowardly left that post, and a great body of the French infantry were advancing, he returned into his camp, the approach of which was defended by twelve pieces of cannon. The French infantry having passed the Scheld, and the lines, which Broglie had gained, Villars made the dispositions for the attack with thirty-six battalions, in three columns, distant two hundred paces from each other, with a reserve of six battalions, marching in a second line, and the cavalry behind to support them. Villars put himself at the right of the infantry, as did the Marshal de Montequieu and Albergotti at the left. The signal being given, the whole line advanced, and marched seven or eight hundred paces, towards the intrenchment, without firing once. When they were come within half a musket-shot, the troops of the Allies, who lined the rampart, made a discharge of their cannon loaded with cartridge-shot, and three discharges of their muskets, without disordering any one battalion. The enemy coming up within fifty paces of the

intrenchment, the piquets and grenadiers leaped into the ditch, followed by the battalions, and, after a long resistance, they entered the camp, cutting down all who made head against them. The rest retired into the Village and the Abbey, where they were forced and pursued so close, that entire battalions threw themselves into the Scheld; so that of those seventeen battalions, hardly three thousand men escaped, all the rest being killed, taken, or drowned. The action was scarce over, when Albergotti and the Marquis de Nangis marched and possessed themselves of the redoubt and bridge, which the Confederates had built at the village of Provi, by reason of a morass lying over-against Denain, in order to cut off the retreat of the runaways, and hinder their being succoured by Prince Eugene's army, which was seen advancing in columns on the other side of the Scheld. Upon his arrival, the Prince caused that redoubt to be attacked; but, it being defended by the regiment of Navarre, sustained by part of the French army, posted on the bank of the Scheld with artillery, he was obliged to draw off, and encamp the next day near Quefnoy and Bavory, to support the troops employed in the siege of Landrecy. The loss of the French (if we may credit their own accounts) did not amount to above four hundred men killed and wounded; among whom were no persons of distinction, besides the Marquis de Tourville, son of the late Marshal of that name, killed; the Marquis de Moussy-Cboiscul, dangerously wounded; the Chevalier de Tessé, Colonel of the regiment of Champagne, and Monsieur de Gausfac, wounded. As to the Confederates, it was reckoned, they had about one thousand killed, two thousand five hundred taken prisoners, and near one thousand five hundred drowned; among which last was the brave Count Dhona, Governor of Mont; and among the slain Count Nassau-Weidenbourg, an Officer of great merit, and highly esteemed by Prince Eugene. Among the prisoners were the Earl of Albemarle, General, the Prince of Anhalt (Brother of the Prince of Anhalt-Dessein) the Prince of Nassau-Seckin, Lieutenant Generals; the Prince of Holstein, the Baron Dalbergh, and Monsieur Zobel, Major-Generals; the Colonels, Count de la Lippe, Tengnagel, Spaen, Kavanoch, and Greck; and Lieutenant-Colonels, Donelly, Hei sbause, Heuske, Brakel, Munnik, Els, and Goumoins; and the Majors, Winkel, Fabrice, Bulome, Till, and Styrum; 50 Captains, 121 Lieutenants and Ensigns; besides four Aids de Camp, and the Commissary of the Artillery Taurinus. In the camp were found twelve brass cannon, a large quantity of ammunition and provisions, a great number of horses, and a considerable booty, which was given to the soldiers.

As it is usual for the multitude to judge of events, especially those of war, by the success, and to censure the unfortunate, Prince Eugene was blamed, both for seeming to despise the enemy, and leaving the Earl of Albemarle exposed at a great distance from the main army; and for sending him no greater reinforcement than six battalions. As to the first, it is certain, the Prince was not insensible of the danger, which the Earl was in; and therefore he had proposed the removing the stores of artillery, ammunition, and provisions from Marchiennes to Bouchain; but it seems, the States Deputies, thro' parsimony, were against that counsel. As to the

1712. the second point, the Prince, with several other experienced Generals, having viewed the intrenchments at Denain, could not but think seventeen battalions sufficient to defend that post, till he came up to their assistance with the whole army; which they would infallibly have done, had the battalions, attacked by Count Broglie, performed their duty. And, if it had not been for the breaking of the bridge by the weight, which was on it, so that the reinforcement sent by the Prince could not join the troops under the Earl of Albemarle, Villars's attempt might have turned fatally on himself, and to the ruin of his whole army. However, the Prince's march to Landrecy is thought by some to have been the greatest oversight he ever made, considering, that, at this juncture, the French had delivered Dunkirk into the hands of the English; that Villars was greatly reinforced from the Rhine, and all the garriſons about him; and the Duke of Ormond had received his orders for marching off with his troops. It is observable likewise, that the Duke of Ormond, the very evening of the day, on which he declared the cessation of arms, sent to Denain, for the pontons, which he had lent the Earl of Albemarle; nor could all, that either the Earl, Prince Eugene, or the States Deputies say, prevail with him to leave them but for eight days; and the next day it was reported, that two French Engineers in disguise went with those, who took up the pontons, and made such observations on the Earl of Albemarle's works, as served their purpose. However, it does not appear, that the Duke knew any thing of it; but his conduct in this affair was very much censured, and gave his enemies an handle to say, that matters had been concerted between him and those sent by Villars. And it is certain, that the want of the pontons was the loss of Denain; for Prince Eugene, having some notice of the Marshal's design, marched the evening before the action, with the greatest part of the army from Landrecy, and was up time enough to have succoured the Earl of Albemarle; but, by the time he got to the Scheldt, the bridge was broke by the crowd of baggage they had been sending over; so that he was not able to give the Earl the least assistance, but looked on, and saw his fate.

Severe reflections were likewise made upon the Earl of Albemarle; but, the States having appointed some Deputies of their own, and the Council of State some of their Members, to examine his reasons, it was resolved, upon the report of the examination, not only to declare, that the Earl had behaved with prudence and bravery in that unfortunate action, but also to return him thanks for his conduct (1).

But though it be hard to determine what errors were committed either in the counsels or orders, or in the execution of them, and at whose door these ought to be laid, yet this misfortune served not a little to raise the Duke of Marlborough's character, under whose command no such thing had ever happened.

The action of Denain being over, Villars ordered Broglie to invest Marchiennes on the French Scarpe, where the Allies principal stores were lodged, with above a hundred and fifty Bil-landers laden with artillery, and all sorts of ammunition, and provisions for a whole campaign. At the same time he commanded Albergotti to attack St Amand, ordering other detachments to possess themselves of the rest of the posts on the Scarpe. Two hundred of the troops of the Allies, who were in the Abbey of Anchin, and at Pont-a-Rocbe, yielded themselves prisoners of war. At the same time, Count de Esparre made himself Master of the Abbey of Hamon, where he took a hundred prisoners. Albergotti possessed himself likewise of Mortagne, at the mouth of the Scarpe, where he took an hundred men; and then of St Amand, which was defended by eight hundred men, who yielded themselves prisoners of war. In the mean time, Broglie invested Marchiennes, and, having viewed it, found the enterprize much more difficult than he at first imagined; that post being encompassed with morasses and ditches full of water; fortified with several works; defended by Brigadier Berkoffen, with six battalions and five hundred men, detached from the garriſon of Doway, and by the regiment of Schellart, consisting of three squadrons of Cuirassiers, of the Elector Palatine's troops. These difficulties obliged Villars to desire the Marquis de Montesquieu to take upon him the care of the siege. On the last day of July (Villars being returned to the siege) the town surrendered, and the garriſon, to the number of five thousand, were made prisoners of war, and conducted to Valenciennes. The loss of this post was of very bad consequence to the Allies; for they had there a general magazine of all sorts of artillery, ammunition, and provisions, designed for the further operations of the campaign. On the other hand, the advantage the enemy obtained by forcing the intrenchments of Denain, and by the taking of Marchiennes, were so considerable, that the French King wrote an account of it to the Archbishop of Paris (2). After this, Doway was invested, which obliged

(1) Prince Eugene, in a letter to an eminent Minister, says: 'I am surprized and troubled to hear of the injurious people do my Lord Albemarle. — He performed all that a courageous, prudent, and vigilant General could do; and, had all the troops done their duty, the affair would not have gone as it did: But, when they run as soon as they have given one fire, and cannot be rallied, no General in the world can help it: And therefore, Sir, I doubt not that you will contribute to the disabusing those of the Regency, who may have been misinformed.'

and the suspension, which I have agreed on with the Queen of England, have not availed to determine the other Allies to enter into the same sentiments. On the contrary, they formed a design to push on their conquests, and besiege Landrecy. The importance of that place (the taking of which would have opened to the enemy an entrance into my Kingdom) determined me to give my orders to the Marshals de Villars, and de Montesquieu (who command my army in Flanders) to attack and fight the enemy, to oblige them to raise the siege. They have acted with so much conduct and prudence, and the success has been so happy, that the camp, which was possessed by the enemy at Denain (notwithstanding the strength of its intrenchments) was forced and defeated with the entire loss of 17 battalions, which defended

Prince Eugene to abandon the design of besieging Landrecy, and march to the relief of Douay. The Prince tried to raise the siege, but did not succeed. Indeed the States would not put things to so great a venture after such losses: So Villars prosecuted the siege with vigour, and battered Fort Scarpe with eighty pieces of cannon: But, notwithstanding the garrison of the fort consisted but of four hundred men, they defended it fourteen days, and surrendered prisoners of war on the 28th of August, having repulsed the French in several attacks. After the taking of that fort, the enemy redoubled their fire against the town; and, although the garrison was but weak, General Hompesch, the Governor, contrary to the expectations of the Allies or the French, held out till the 8th of September, N. S. when he surrendered the garrison prisoners of War. The enemy during this siege were repulsed in several attacks, and lost a great number of men (especially when they took the counterscarp and a half-moon, which they were obliged to abandon) and, had the garrison been numerous enough in proportion to the extent of the place, it is very probable, the French would not have retaken it. Prince Eugene had the mortification to be a spectator of the loss of this place; but it was not his fault, if a vigorous attempt was not made to prevent it, for, during the siege, he used all possible endeavours to engage the enemy; but the French had so strongly fortified their camp on the one hand, and the Dutch were so cautious of running any hazards in this critical juncture, that the Prince, seeing no possibility of coming to action, returned to his camp at Seclin, from whence detachments were made to secure Lisle, Mons, Betbune, Aire, St Venant, and other places. After the surrender of Douay, advice being brought to Prince Eugene, that the French were advanced to Malplaquet, and posted on the same ground, where the famous battle of that name was fought three years before, a disposition was made to dislodge them, and prevent the siege of Quefnoy. But the enemy having with great diligence advanced within half a league of Quefnoy, and taken a very advantageous camp, Prince Eugene thought fit to stop his march near the wood of Dour, and to encamp with the right near St Guilain, the left at the mill of Saart, near the wood of Lagniere, and the head quarters at Belian. Villars having, with the utmost care, secured all the passes, and fortified his camp, the necessary dispositions were made, for carrying on the siege of Quefnoy, which was invested the 8th of September, N. S. The French expected to have made themselves masters of the town in eight or ten days; but Major-General Ivey, who commanded in the place, made so good use of the heavy artillery, which the Allies left there, after the taking of Quefnoy, that it was the 14th of October, N. S. before he was obliged to submit to the same terms, on which Douay had been surrendered, that the garrison should remain prisoners of war: The French gave out, that they found in the place one hundred and sixteen heavy cannon; a great number of others of small size; forty mortars, five hundred thousand weight of powder; a great quantity of bullets, bombs, grenades, and provisions of all sorts; the whole being valued at three millions of Livres; and that this garrison completed the number of forty battalions of the Allies, killed or made prisoners since the 24th of July, N. S. on which happened the unfortunate affair of Denain. The French being resolved to lose no time in enlarging their conquests, opened their trenches before Bouchain; which place was so indifferently provided, and the garrison so weak, that they made but a slender resistance; for, the enemy having taken possession of the covered-way, and made the dispositions for storming the place, the garrison beat a parley, and surrendered at discretion.

While the French were before Bouchain, the Allies surprized the Fort Knoque in the following manner: Brigadier Caris, Commander of Offend, having received certain intelligence, that the garrison of Fort Knoque was very weak, resolved to try to surprize it. Accordingly Caris detached one hundred and eighty men, under the direction of Captain De Rue, a famous partisan, who, having marched with the utmost privacy, found means to hide themselves in three little houses, and in the governor's garden, standing between four draw-bridges, where they lay close all night. In the morning, at the opening of the gates, some of the detachment advanced on a sudden, and made themselves masters of the bridge nearest the Fort, having killed the guard. De Rue divided his men into four bodies, and with one of them seized a gate, while two other divisions ran to the other two gates, and the fourth drew up near the Cazernis, to hinder the garrison from drawing together; which succeeded so well, that with the loss of only two men killed, and one wounded, that important Fort was taken. The French Governor hearing the noise, leaped out of bed, and, looking out of the window, cried, Quarter! and was made prisoner of war with the garrison, which consisted of three French companies, and one of Swiss, but a great many of them were sick. De Rue, having secured that post, sent out defended it, and of a convoy of about five hundred waggon, who were at the same time on the march towards the camp before Landrecy. The defeat of these troops encamped at Denain was followed by the taking of the post of Marchiennes, where the enemy had six battalions, five hundred foot detached from the garrison of Douay, and three squadrons of horse, who were all made prisoners of war: And being added to those taken in the camp at Denain, and in some other posts along the Scarpe, make the number of above seven thousand men, and upwards of four hundred Officers, prisoners; among whom are several of their general Officers. My troops, who in these two actions shewed all possible valour, took thirty-seven colours, and three standards. The enemy lost with Marchiennes a great number of cannon, and stores of all sorts of ammunition, and provisions laden in above one hundred and fifty Bilanders; and their army being weakened by so considerable a loss, having no longer communication with the places they are possessed of towards the Scarpe, have been forced to raise the siege of Landrecy, to retire towards Mons. And as such an event is a visible mark of the protection of God, who knows the recititude of my intentions, I hold myself obliged to render to him most humble acts of thanksgiving. I desire therefore, that you will cause Te Deum to be sung in the Metropolitan Church of my good City of Paris, &c.

(1) And

1712. part of his men, to seize all the provisions in the neighbouring villages, and to bring the same into the Fort, before the garrison of Ypres could be informed of the loss of the place. He dispatched also an express with an account of this success to Brigadier Caris, who detached forty men to reinforce the garrison. The precautions taken by De Rue were not useless; for the loss of that post occasioned the motion of a great body of troops on each side towards the Lys, as if the French designed to retake it; but they found that Fortrefs was so well and so seasonably provided, that the French entirely abandoned the design of attacking it.

The campaign in the Netherlands ended with the taking of Bouchain by the French; for, a few days after, both armies marched into winter-quarters; and Prince Eugene, having staid some days at Brussels to settle some matters with the Council of Brabant, proceeded to the Hague on the 28th of October, N. S.

The losses in the Netherlands created a great distraction in the Councils at the Hague, and it was expected by the Courts of Great-Britain and France, that the turn of affairs in the field, after the misfortune at Denain, would occasion an alteration in the Negotiation at Utrecht; and that the Dutch would at last agree to a suspension of arms, for which the British Ministers made very pressing instances. The Marquis de Torcy would have persuaded the British Court to force the States to come into their measures. In a letter to Mr St John upon the news of the Earl of Albemarle's defeat at Denain, he took notice of the advantage which the Queen had at this time over the Dutch, and insinuated, 'That she might give law to those people, provided she made the right use of Ghent and Bruges, which the Duke of Ormond was in possession of.' Marshal Villars also at the same time sent a letter to the Duke of Ormond, about the action at Denain, wherein he ascribes the victory to the separation of the brave English, and insults the Allies as common enemies, who must be now sensible what wrong measures they had taken. He likewise desires the Duke to transmit this account to the Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, and to make a thousand compliments from him to Lord Stratford. This letter the Duke of Ormond caused to be made known to his army, several copies of it being handed about, which indeed ought rather to have been burnt*; for it made those, who wished well to the Allies, believe he had not acted fairly by them (1). The Dutch, though the Earl of Stratford continued to press them, and that with great importuness, to agree to a cessation of arms, shewed, on this occasion, a remarkable firmness. The states of Holland and West-Friesland, having agreed to take upon them the paying most of the Auxiliaries lately in British pay, and resolved to treat of peace, sword in hand, the States-General ordered their Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht to insist upon several points, as further preliminaries of the treaty, particularly the restoring of Strasbourg to the Empire, and the demolition of all the fortified places possessed by France on the Rhine. The payment and subsistence of the German and Danish troops in the service of Great-Britain, who had joined the forces under Prince Eugene, being the most pressing affair, several conferences were held about it between the Ministers of the Princes, to whom those troops belonged, the Deputies of the States, and the Imperial Ministers. These last were not wanting to represent the great difficulties, which their Master had laboured under since the death of the late Emperor, his brother; and the vast charge he had been indispensably obliged to be at by his Coronation at Frankfort and Presburg, and other growing expences, for the preservation of the principality of Catalonia, whereby the Imperial Treasury was quite exhausted. That, however, his Imperial Majesty offered to contribute three hundred thousand crowns towards the subsistence of the auxiliary troops, provided the city of Amsterdam would advance that sum under the security of the States, for the payment of which he was willing to mortgage the funds in Silesia, which had punctually answered both the principal and interest of the loan made some years before by the English. But, though no positive answer was then returned to the Imperial Ministers, yet some months after their proposal was closed with. The King of Prussia offered to maintain his troops at his own charge, provided the States would give him satisfaction as to his pretensions to the inheritance of the late King William; and the Elector of Hanover offered, in the first place, to maintain during the war, at his own expence, one half of the troops he had in the service of Great-Britain, besides the regiment of dragoons of Bohmar, and to agree for the maintaining of the rest upon easy terms. The King of Denmark took no less vigorous resolutions than any of the Princes of the Empire, it being his interest not to disoblige the Emperor and his Allies, at a juncture when he and the Czar of Muscovy was threatened with a powerful Confederacy of France, Spain, Great Britain, and Sweden, in order to restore the King of Sweden to all his Dominions.

On the other hand, the British Ministers in Holland proposed and insisted on the admission of King Philip's Plenipotentiaries to the Congress at Utrecht; and it was given out, that, if this was not shortly agreed to, the Congress would be transferred to a town, where the Spanish Ministry might repair without any opposition; and Dunkirk was said to be the place. But, the States not thinking it their interest to disoblige the Emperor so far, as to yield a point so derogatory to his title to the Spanish Throne, the Court of Great-Britain resolved to pursue other measures, to bring the Dutch to compliance; or, if that failed, to conclude the peace upon the scheme near

(1) And, that there might be no part of the world, where it was in the power of the English Ministry to assist their new Friends at the expence of their old Allies, Torcy further proposed, 'That the Queen should put a stop to Count Staremberg's projects in Catalonia, by sending orders to her troops in Tarragona not to let the Germans into that place; and, not content with this, he further desired, that express orders might be sent (and through France, as the shortest way) to the English men of war, that were then cruising in the Mediterranean, to suffer the French ships, that were then returning from the Levant, to pass unmolested; which was immediately complied with.

(1) It

1712. near agreed on with France and Spain. To this end, it was judged necessary to renew the suspension of arms, now expiring; and, the Lord Bolingbroke having had the chief management of the present Negotiation, he was pitched upon to go incognito to the Court of France, 'to remove, as his instructions expressed it, all difficulties and differences, that might obstruct the general suspension of arms between England and France from taking place, or settling the treaty of peace in such a course, as may bring it to a happy and speedy conclusion. But to declare, that he does not imagine there will be any possibility to prevail with the Queen to sign the peace with France and Spain, unless full satisfaction be given to the Duke of Savoy, and unless they can take him along with him in the doing thereof. He is therefore to take particular care to settle his Barrier, and to procure Sicily for him; to settle the renunciation in such a manner, that there may be as little room left as possible for dispute or delay: That the Elector of Bavaria may have Sardinia, and be restored to his Dominions in the Empire, except the Upper-Palatinate, and the first Electorate (1); and, when he has had satisfaction in these points, he is to proceed to speak to such articles, as relate particularly to the interest of Great-Britain, and endeavour to have such of them, as there may appear to be any doubt concerning, explained in the most advantageous manner. And then he is to do his best to discover upon the several parts of the general plan of peace, what the real ultimatum of France may be; and, when the peace between England and France shall be signed, that it may be expedient to fix the Allies a time to come in, wherein the Queen will use her good offices, but will not be under any obligation to impose upon the Allies the scheme offered by France, or to debar them from obtaining better terms for themselves.' By these instructions it appears, that Lord Bolingbroke was empowered to conclude a separate peace with England, France, Spain, and Savoy: That at this time there was some doubt concerning several articles relating to the particular interests of Great Britain, which he was to endeavour to get explained; but no instruction, if his endeavours prove ineffectual, in behalf of Great-Britain, not to conclude the treaty, which in these very instructions is expressly provided for in favour of Savoy; and he is ordered to do his best to discover the ultimatum of France, which hitherto, it seems, the Ministry were ignorant of; but, whether France condescended so far or not, as to let him into this secret, the treaty was concluded; and the Ministry seemed to think, they had sufficiently discharged their duty, in declining to be engaged to impose what terms France should think proper upon the Allies, those Allies, to whom the Queen was bound by the faith of treaties, and all the most solemn engagements and public declarations, to procure all just and reasonable satisfaction, according to their several Alliances. But now it seemed sufficient, that the British Ministry did not debar them from the liberty of endeavouring to obtain still better terms for themselves.

With these instructions the Lord Bolingbroke set out for Dover on the second of August, accompanied by Mr Prior and the Abbot Gaultier. The next day he landed at Calais, and was received with all imaginable demonstrations of joy from the inhabitants, and particular marks of respect from the Governor. On the 17th of August, N. S. he arrived at Paris, and alighted at the House of the Marquis de Torcy, where an apartment was prepared for him. The French Minister received the British with uncommon civility, and assured him, 'That the King his Master had ever entertained a great esteem and respect for the Queen of Great-Britain; to which sentiments

(1) It seems the French had demanded Sicily also for the Elector of Bavaria, as appears from the following particulars: The constant compliances in the English Ministry encouraged Monsieur de Torcy to believe, that they would now stick at nothing that could be proposed. He pressed, on the 18th of July, the concluding the separate peace between England and France, as what they both agreed in to be the most effectual way to make the rest of the Allies comply. He desires, that the troops in Flanders, under the command of the Duke of Ormond, may be left there to make a good use of the towns, which he was in possession of; but as the King of France could not consent to the Duke of Savoy's having Sicily, except the Elector of Bavaria had also the Netherlands besides his Electorate, he thinks the Queen's having a good army in Flanders, under the Duke of Ormond, may render this very practicable; and, as the Queen has done a great deal for her own ungrateful Allies, it will be for her glory now to contribute to the good of a Prince of so much merit as the Elector of Bavaria, whose acknowledgments will be equal to the benefits he shall receive. But this would not pass, even with the Ministry of Great-Britain. The giving Flanders to the Elector of Bavaria was not only contrary to all the propositions of peace, that had been made between England and France, but was what would absolutely engage England in a new war, to oblige the Imperialists and Dutch to agree to it: And they could not think it for the honour or interest of the Queen, to make war upon her Allies, as ungrateful as they had been, in favour of the Elector of Bavaria; and especially, considering, that, although Ghent and Bruges were for him, the Allies had yet an army in Flanders so considerable, both for the number and goodness of their troops, that they were able to defend the conquests they had made. And to give him Sicily, which was likewise demanded, Lord Bolingbroke hoped, that it would not be insisted on; 'because it might be the occasion of continual jealousies; it might, in particular, be the source of disputes and quarrels betwixt England and France, whose strict union and indissoluble friendship were the points in view, to which all our measures had been directed for so long a time.' The Queen's Ministers think, that, when the King of France has made all reasonable efforts for his Allies, he must do something for the love of peace, and that a particular interest should yield to the general. 'You cannot, says Lord Bolingbroke, but feel the force of this argument, because you are not at all ignorant, that this Negotiation was begun and carried on upon a supposition, that the Queen must desist from many conditions, which in right she was obliged to procure for her Allies.' He very strongly urges the necessity of concluding immediately the peace between England, France, and Spain; but absolutely insists upon Sicily for the Duke of Savoy; which at last the King of France consented to, upon certain conditions, wherein very ample provision was made for satisfaction to the Elector of Bavaria; and one express condition was, that a peace be concluded between England, France, Spain, and Savoy. In answer to this letter, Lord Bolingbroke acquaints Monsieur de Torcy, that he had received the Queen's orders to go immediately to France; and he hoped, under the auspices of the Abbot Gaultier, in a week's time, to salute him at Fontainebleau. Bolingbroke sent to France. Rep. of the Com. of Secr.

1712. sentiments he now added to perfect a friendship, that notwithstanding the late successes of his arms in Flanders, he was still willing to make her Britannic Majesty the umpire of the general peace.¹⁹ Compliments being passed on both sides, the two Ministers entered upon business, and having adjusted the principal interests of the Duke of Savoy, and of the Elector of Bavaria, and settled the time and manner of the renunciations, agreed to a treaty for a suspension of arms between Great-Britain and France, both by sea and land, for the space of four months. The next day the Lord Bolingbroke was conducted by the Marquis de Torcy to Fontainebleau, where the King of France then was with his Court; and the apartment formerly belonging to the Marshal de Boufflers was magnificently fitted up for him, and he was received with greater marks of distinction than were ever shewn to any person of his character, who made no public appearance. He was the next morning introduced to a private audience of the King, to whom he presented the Queen's letter. The French King received him in a very gracious manner, and assured him, 'That he ever had the highest esteem for the Queen: That he had proceeded in such a manner, as to turn that esteem into the sincerest friendship; and he hoped, she was satisfied he had done every thing on his part, which might facilitate the peace: That he was pleased to find it so near a conclusion: That there were some indeed, who used all endeavours to obstruct it; but that, God be praised, they would not be long able to do so; and that the success of his arms should make no alteration in him; for he would make good all he had offered.' The Elector of Bavaria, who arrived at Paris on the 16th of August, and repaired to Fontainebleau the same day the Lord Bolingbroke went thither, was also in conference with him, whom he desired to recommend both his and his brother the Elector of Cologne's concerns to her Britannic Majesty. The French Courtiers, in imitation of their Sovereign, vied with each other, who should best entertain the British Minister; and, among the rest, the Duke of Noailles gave him a most magnificent supper, to which the persons of the first rank were invited; as was also General Stanbope, who, being lately exchanged for the Duke of Escalona, took Fontainebleau in his way to England. The Lord Bolingbroke, offered that General to present him to the King of France; but Mr. Stanbope thought fit to decline it. What was transacted in the private Conferences between the King, or his Ministers, and the Lord Bolingbroke, besides the treaty for a suspension of arms, was kept very secret: except only, that it was agreed, that the Court of Great-Britain should pay the annual sum of threecore thousand pounds by way of Dower to the late King James's Queen; and that the Chevalier de St. George should retire out of France. On the 27th of August, N. S. the Lord Bolingbroke took his leave of the King of France who presented him with a fine diamond ring, valued at about 4,000 l. sterling, which formerly belonged to his son the Dauphin, and on the 25th his Lordship returned to Paris, being still accompanied by the Marquis de Torcy.

On the 24th of August, N. S. the suspension of arms for four months was proclaimed at Paris with the same ceremonies usually observed at the proclaiming of peace, except that there were no Numb. LXXI. Vol. IV.

public rejoicings. Two days after, one of the Queen's Messengers, who attended the Lord Bolingbroke, brought the treaty to Whitehall; and, the Lord-Treasurer having, the next day, carried it to the Queen at Windſor, to be ratified, her Majesty, in Council, signed a proclamation, declaring the suspension of arms, as well by sea as land, and injoining the observance thereof. O. S. This proclamation was published both by itself, and in the London Gazette, in which an order of Council was subjoined, importing, "That for preventing any inconveniencies, to which her Majesty's subjects might be liable, by misapprehending the purport or effect of this proclamation, and for the improvement and security of the commerce of her loving subjects, her Majesty was pleased to declare, that, as soon as passes could be interchanged, they would be delivered to such of her subjects, as should desire the same." Upon perusal of this order, which laid the English Merchants under a necessity of buying French passes, many were at a loss to discover wherein the benefit of the suspension consisted, unless it were in gratifying the avarice of the Secretaries of State, who sold, at a dear rate, what had cost them nothing. Besides, it is observable, that, the French Court not having sent over the passes so soon as the English Ministers transmitted theirs, it happened, that several French ships, which were taken by Sir Thomas Hardy, were released upon producing of the English passes, while several English ships were, at the same time, made prize for want of French passes. This good disposition of Lord Bolingbroke to the French Nation appears from his own letter to Mr. Prior, of the 29th of September, wherein he says, 'I have got at last the affair of the Griffin [a rich French East-India ship] compounded, not without very great difficulty: And tho' the sum paid to the Captors was so large as 35,000 l. the ship was plainly prize, and the pass, sent over hither, might have been proved to have been numerically one of those I delivered at Fontainebleau, four days after the Griffin was in Sir Thomas Hardy's power; though Gaultier was ready to swear, that he received it some months before; which part of the Abbot has, I confess to you, done him no good, in my opinion.' Hence it appears that, though this pass was none of them, passes had been granted some months before the suspension was concluded.

It may here be observed, that while the peace was negotiating, various reports were spread about the Pretender, who, after the stile used in the Queen's speech of the 6th of June, was now called, the person, who has pretended to disturb the Settlement of the Protestant Succession of the House of Hanover. About the latter end of June, the public was informed from Utrecht, that he had been obliged to leave St. Germain's, and was already on his way to Lorrain. However, about the middle of August, he made a visit to the King of France at Fontainebleau; but, upon the news of Lord Bolingbroke's landing at Calais, it was thought fit, that the Chevalier should again retire from St Germain's, without his ordinary guard, and go to the castle of Livry. Not many days after he came to Paris, and, going to the Opera, sat in the French King's box, which had been appointed for the Lord Bolingbroke, who thereupon sat in another box; which, when known, occasioned no small noise in England.

land. It was also advised from Paris, that the British Minister had a private interview with the Queen-Dowager of England; which, together with the rumour of the Chevalier's taking upon him the title of Duke of Gloucester, and retiring to Rheims in Champagne, occasioned various speculations. Whatever ground there was for these and other reports, it is certain, that the Pretender's friends in Great-Britain were, at this juncture, extremely elated with the hopes of his Restoration; and some news-writers in Holland, and, after them, others in London, did not scruple to take notice of what was said in Paris, "That the Pretender was to be associated with her Majesty in the Sovereignty."

On the 28th of August, N. S. the Lord Bolingbroke set out from Paris, where he let Mr. Prior to take care of some private affairs still under Negotiation; and with Mr. Hare, and the Abbot Gautier, proceeded to Dunkirk, and, imbarbark for England, arrived at London the 21st of August, O. S.

France was now become intire master of all future Negotiations, and did not fail to make use of the power put into their hands: And upon occasion of a trifling quarrel, which happened at Utrecht between the servants of Monsieur Mefnager, and of Count Rechteren, one of the Dutch Plenipotentiaries, the French made use of it as a pretence to keep the Negotiations in suspension, as long as it served their purpose (1). The Venetian Ministers immediately offered their mediation to accommodate the matter; and at the same time Messieurs de Randwyck and Buys engaged the Bishop of Bristol to interpose his good offices in this affair. But the French Ministers having consulted together refused hearken to any private accommodation, before they had received instructions from their Court; by which they were directed to insist upon a public satisfaction, and on the recalling of Count Rechteren; and appointing another Plenipotentiary in his place. The States not thinking it consistent with their dignity to submit to those demands, the Negotiations at Utrecht were suspended, whilst the Earl of Strafford and some other Ministers used their endeavours at the Hague to find out an expedient to remove that obstruction, but, the French King's pride being now again in exaltation, he was intractable. On the other hand the States seemed resolved not to comply with so extravagant a reparation, being desirous of drawing this dispute into length, that they might avoid entering into a Negotiation of peace, which they thought must be detrimental to their interest, and the common cause, and still hoping, that something might happen, which would occasion some favourable turn in the affairs of Europe. To this purpose it was observed, that at the opening of the Assembly of the States of Holland on the 13th of September, N. S. Pensionary Heinsius, in a very pathetic speech shewed 'the impossibility of concluding a peace at this juncture, without losing the fruits of all the blood and treasure they had expended in the present quarrel, and exposing their Country and the liberties of all Christendom, to imminent danger: Urging, that as, of two evils, they ought to choose the least, so they must make extraordinary efforts to carry on the war, till a safe and honourable peace should be obtained: And concluding, that, thanks to the Almighty, they were not wholly destitute of means for that purpose, provided they would act with the same constancy and harmony, which the Republic had exerted on so many occasions.' This speech had its effect, both with the States of Holland, and the States-General; for the Earl of Strafford having signified to them, 'That the Queen was willing to endeavour to engage France to admit them, or any other of the Allies, into the suspension of arms;' they answered they could not resolve any thing upon it, without the Emperor and the other Allies; and that it would be too great a disgrace to the Confederacy, to ask a suspension of arms, without being assured of obtaining it. As to the Earl of Strafford's proposition of granting passports to the Plenipotentiaries of King Philip, the States alledged, they could not comply with it, without doing a manifest injury to the Emperor, who had at least an equal title with King Philip to the Crown of Spain.

About this time another accident happened at Utrecht, which was like to prove a new obstruction to the Negotiation of peace. The Earl of Strafford had, by his lofty carriage, made himself very obnoxious to the Dutch; and, it being given out, that the Duke of Savoy had abandoned the Allies, and agreed to a suspension of arms, some of the common people, in the night-time, broke the windows, both of the Marquis del Borgo, one of the Duke's Plenipotentiaries, and of the Earl of Strafford; and, as a farther indignity to the Earl they set up a wheel on the rails before his house, with a paper on it, in which was written the Dutch word, Straff-art, alluding to the Earl's name, and implying, that he deserved the punishment denoted by the wheel; the word Straffen in Dutch signifying, to punish or chastise. This insult was highly resented by the British Plenipotentiaries; but the Magistrates of Utrecht having published a reward of four hundred guilders to any one, who should discover the authors of it; and that the name of the Informer should be concealed; the British Court thought fit not to take any notice of the affront at this juncture, the rather, because it was by many suspected, that the French emissaries were at the bottom of this

It was a Count Rutten was passing by the house of Monsieur Mefnager, his footmen were laughing and making sport at his servants that were standing before the door. Monsieur Mefnager complained of by Count Rutten, who expressed the servants should be contented that their master's word, he had examined the matter, and that he denied the fact. Upon this the Count Rutten said that the servants should be contented that their master's word, and Mefnager still repeated, that the Count Rutten said, since he could get no satisfaction, they must decide their own quarrels themselves. Presently after, one of Count Rechteren's footmen struck one of Monsieur Mefnager's, and owned the fact, saying, It was true, he had given him a blow or two on the face; but that it was also true, he was one of those who had hissed at him; which was not denied by the other. This was so highly resented by the French King, and such reparation demanded, that the Dutch would not comply with it: So a full stop was put to all the proceedings at Utrecht for some months.

1712. this insult, in order to irritate the British Nation against the Dutch.

The ascendant, which France had now gained in all the Negotiations of peace, was evident from their insulting upon the restitution of Tournay, which deserves to be particularly set forth. On the 30th of August the British Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht acquainted the Lord Bolingbroke, that in some discourse with the Ministers of the Allies they had carried matters so far as to tell them, that though her Majesty would endeavour to promote their interest in a peace, and obtain for them the best terms, that should be possible; yet, if those endeavours should not procure more than the contents of her Majesty's speech, or even in some degree fall short of that plan, the fault would be intirely theirs, who had rendered things difficult and uncertain, which otherwise would have been easy and practicable. And having thus far complied with their late orders to lay all the blame upon the Allies, they further inform his Lordship, that they had however obtained the consent of the Ministers of the Allies to come to a Conference with those of France, in order to renew the Negotiations; the time to be fixed between the British and French Plenipotentiaries, who meeting to have some discourse previous to the general conference, parted without coming to any conclusion. The occasion of their difference, that prevented renewing the Conferences, arose upon proposals made by the British Ministers in relation to Tournay. They, in a letter of the 2d of September, N. S. to Lord Bolingbroke, state the case in this manner: 'In her Majesty's speech it is expressed, That the Dutch are to have the intire Barrier, as demanded in 1709, except two or three places at most. The French Ministers insist, that they must have Lisle as an equivalent for Dunkirk; and that the same is not to be understood as one of the three places mentioned in the speech; and consequently that they must, in all, have four of the places mentioned in the demands of 1709. This to us appears to be altogether inconsistent with what her Majesty has declared; and we accordingly think it contrary to our duty to bring on a Conference, in which such an explication is to be made. The French Ministers, on the other hand, have shewed us their orders, which positively require them to insist upon the restitution of Tournay as well as Lisle; and that they can by no means consent to the cession of Maubeuge or Condé. The British Ministers then pressed the French to speak at first in terms as general, as their proposal was conceived in; but the French thought it necessary to be particular and express in that point above all others, because they shall otherwise have tied themselves up, and given the Dutch an advantage. The result of this debate was, not to proceed to a Conference, till this point be determined; the French insisting, that their orders were so plain, as neither to need nor admit any explication; and the British Ministers thinking the matter as plain on their side. They hoped, their zeal for her Majesty's honour would be graciously approved, and desire to be directed what further they are to do in this matter, which they apprehend to be of a decisive consequence; because they find even those among the Dutch, who appear to be most cordially disposed to such a peace, as may re-establish a good harmony between her Majesty and the States, as absolutely necessary for their mutual preservation, fully resolved, either to retain Tournay, and have Condé yielded to them; or to take one of these two courses, either to come into any terms, that France offers, or to continue the war at all hazards.' The language, which our Plenipotentiaries had used to the Allies, is very much approved of by Lord Bolingbroke, in his letter of the 26th of August, who says, they had spoke the sentiments of the Queen's heart, in what they declared the 30th of August, N. S. and that, 'if the Allies did fall short of the plan laid down in the Queen's speech, the fault was intirely their own. His Lordship says, 'Sure it is, that this plan was nothing more than an ultimatum of what France would offer; but he wished, that the Imperial and Dutch policy had not rendered it the ultimatum of what France will grant. The same general reflections might be applied to the particular case mentioned in their Lordships letter. France would have yielded Tournay, though much against the grain. If France has now any advantages, and refuses flatly to yield what she only begged to have restored, the fault is intirely theirs.' But the dispatch of the Plenipotentiaries, of the 2d of September, relating to Tournay having not yet been considered by the Lords of the Council, his Lordship could not give any positive instructions about it till the next opportunity; but, in the mean time, recommended to them two considerations: That the keeping of the Dutch in hopes of her Majesty's good offices will prevent them from taking any desperate resolutions; and the French insisting to have Count Rechteren disavowed, before any further treaty, will put off, for some time the decision of that great point. The Earl of Stratford, in the mean time, by his letters of the 13th and 16th of September, N. S. represented the States, 'as mightily sunk with their misfortunes, and not knowing well what measures to take; but that they insisted upon Tournay as so essential to their Barrier, that they had actually none without it: And his Lordship was so much of that opinion, that he wished they might have Tournay, though they were forced to truck Tpres, for it: That if he could positively assure them they should have Tournay, he believed they would submit to the plan of the Queen's speech.' This opinion of his Lordship is not very easily reconcilable to what he afterwards wrote to Mr. Prior upon this subject Octob. 12, 1712: 'If we had a mind to have Nick Frog sign with us, we might, for he is ready to do it for Tournay; which, if we sign together, we cannot well refuse him: But I expect you will cut that matter short, and I long to hear from you.' But this affair of Tournay was not so soon settled in England; although the difficulty does not seem to be, whether the French or Dutch were to have it; but in what manner it was to be procured for France, without a manifest contradiction to what was said by the Queen, in her speech concerning the Barrier. Lord Bolingbroke, on the 10th of September, O. S. writes three letters upon this subject, to Monsieur de Torcy, to Mr. Prior, and to the Plenipotentiaries. In that to Monsieur de Torcy, he desires him 'to remember the proposition, which was often laid down by him when in France, and insisted upon as a fundamental in all their future proceedings upon the general peace: That the conduct of the Queen, in regard to the interests

1712. of her Allies, was in a great measure determined by their behaviour: That the violent measures, which they had taken to obstruct the peace, had put the Queen in a condition to make her peace, without waiting for their concurrence; in which case the Queen would declare, that she had signed the treaty with France and Spain, and would propose the plan brought over by Abbot Gaultier, and delivered the 29th of April 1712, for the Allies to treat upon, and would do no more than by her good offices, as a common friend to both parties. But, in case the Dutch in particular, or the other Allies, should, before the conclusion of her peace with France, enter into concert with her Majesty, we should have more measures to keep with them; the compassion of our people would be moved in their behalf; and the Queen's Ministers obliged to make some steps, which otherwise they would absolutely refuse to do. Upon this foundation, continues his Lordship, the King's Ministers seem to act something more, when they insist the Queen's Ministers should propose the holding a Conference, in which the first propositions started would appear, in some measure, contrary to what the Queen said in her speech, touching the Barrier of the States. The point in dispute between your Plenipotentiaries and ours is not to know, Whether Tournay shall be restored to the King, or not? For, to obtain that place, it is not necessary you should begin by making this specific declaration. But the question is, Whether the Queen ought formally, and at present, to declare that Tournay shall be restored to France? Which would be to consent to the explanation, which your Ministers give to this article of the Queen's speech. His Lordship then says: 'Not to swell my letter too much, which may already seem tedious, I refer myself to what Mr. Prior shall have the honour to explain to you upon this point; and I shall content myself with saying, that, as it is not difficult to find a temperament, I hope we shall avoid all things, that may occasion a dispute between the Ministers of Great-Britain and France. This temperament is to be found in his letter to Mr. Prior of the same day, which, he says, is to be looked upon only as a letter from Harry to Mat, and not the Secretary to the Minister.' He sends him inclosed an extract of his letter to Monsieur de Torcy, 'which, he says, relates to a matter, that has given Lord Treasurer and himself no small trouble in the Cabinet. He likewise sends him a copy of the Plenipotentiaries dispatch of the 2d of September upon the same subject; wherein, as he will observe, their Lordships are very warm about the disputes. He can assure him, we have those, who are not a jot cooler. His Lordship goes on: The solution of this difficulty must come from you; which is a matter of management and appearance, more than of substance. The method of doing it is by making Monsieur de Torcy sensible of the proposition settled between them in France, that the Queen can never do any thing, which shall look like a direct restraint on her Allies from demanding what they judge necessary; but as long as they act the part which they now do, she can very justly be passive and neuter as to their interests. This his Lordship thinks is advantage enough for France, and such a one, fairly speaking, as a year ago they would have given more than Tournay to be sure of. They must not therefore press us to go further than this, nor to do any thing, which may seem contradictory to what the Queen delivered from the Throne. In a word, the use which the French will make of the unaccountable obduracy of the Dutch, and the other Allies, may, in several respects, and particularly, for aught I know, in the instance of Tournay, give them an opportunity of saving and gaining more than they could have hoped for; and the Queen may in the present circumstances contribute passively to this end, but actively she never can in any circumstances.' His Lordship then very plainly gives his advice how this matter is to be managed in these words: 'I think in my opinion, and I believe I speak the Queen's upon this occasion, it were better the French should in the course of the treaty declare, that whatever they intended to have given the Dutch, when the Queen spoke from the Throne, their conduct has been such, and the situation of affairs is so altered, that the King is resolved to have Tournay restored to him: I say, I believe this were better, than to expect, that we should assent to an exposition of the Queen's words, by which her Majesty would yield the Town up. Let the Conferences begin as soon as they will, I dare say, business will not very speedily be dispatched in them. We shall go on to ripen every thing for a conclusion between us and Savoy, France, and Spain, and this is the true point of view, which the French ought to have before their eyes.' This scheme being concerted here, and transmitted to France, Lord Bolingbroke on the same day writes to the Plenipotentiaries, in answer to theirs of the 2d of September, N. S. upon which he had before told them, he could give no instructions, till their letter was considered by the Lords of the Council; neither does his Lordship now send them any directions, but enlarges upon the same general topics of imputing all the mischiefs that had happened, and in particular this affair of Tournay, to the obduracy of the Allies. His Lordship observes, 'That, in the plan brought over by Abbot Gaultier, the King of France begged for Tournay, rather than insisted upon it; but was now encouraged to refuse what he only endeavoured to save: And, in short, that France had now gathered strength by our divisions, and was grown sanguine enough to make that plan the ultimatum of her concessions, which was at first nothing more than the ultimatum of her offers; but that the Dutch had no body to blame for all this but themselves.' His Lordship adds, 'Her Majesty is very sensible of the concern you express for her honour, and will not, you may be sure, suffer herself to be a party to any thing, which may appear contradictory to what she has once advanced: And although perhaps the yielding of Tournay might be reconciled to the terms of her speech; yet should the Queen consent to this exposition of it, such consent would be almost a formal restoration of this place to France: And this, my Lords, is what her Majesty will avoid. But I hope the solution of this difficulty will come from France; and that, when they have so many other quarrels to decide, that Court will go back from a measure, which must involve them in a dispute with the Queen.' Among Mr. Prior's papers the Committee of Secrecy in 1715 found one, which seemed to be the draught of a letter from him to Monsieur de Torcy, pursuant to what Lord Bolingbroke had written to him upon the subject of Tournay; which 1712. which is in substance the same, and almost in the very words of Lord Bolingbroke's letter to Mr. Prior of the 10th of September, with this addition, that it begins thus: 'There is more appearance than substance in this affair, that is now under agitation at Utrecht; and my Lord Treasurer does not at all doubt but the Court of France will find a remedy.' And his Lordship was not mistaken in his expectations. For Monsieur de Torcy very readily followed the advice, that was given by the English Ministry; and on the 27th of September, N. S. sends Lord Bolingbroke a declaration to be made by the French Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, wherein the King's Ministers are ordered to declare to those of Great-Britain, 'That the King did consent to treat of the peace upon the plan laid down in the Queen's speech to her Parliament; but at the same time they were to say, that the Dutch having refused to conform to the sentiments of that Prince, having rejected the suspension of arms, and given opportunity to the several changes in affairs, that had happened; it is but just, that his Majesty should be recompensed for the expence he has been obliged to make during the course of this campaign. Upon this foundation his Majesty orders his Plenipotentiaries not to sign a peace but upon condition, that Tournay should be restored to him, besides the other places, which he has demanded, and which he had reason to believe the Queen of Great-Britain did design to comprehend in her speech.' However, the measures and councils relating to this affair were afterwards altered upon great concessions made to France, and advantageous terms procured for the Elector of Bavaria. But that Tournay was, at last, obtained for the Dutch, was principally owing to the firmness and resolution of the States, and to the assistance of the Earl of Strafford, who refused to sign the treaty without the cession of that place to the States, on which account he received their solemn thanks.

Mr. Prior having been left by Lord Bolingbroke at Paris, as the Queen's Plenipotentiary, he was introduced by the Marquis de Torcy to a private audience of the King; and obtained a favourable interpretation of a clause inserted in the late treaty for a suspension of arms, which had raised a clamour among the Merchants in London. For it having been stipulated, 'That none of the Queen's men of war, or merchants ships, should transport or convoy into Portugal or Catalonia, or any of the places, where they made war at present, any troops, arms, cloaths, provisions, or ammunition.' The English traders were justly apprehensive, that under that pretence they might be debarred from their usual traffic of corn and fish, of which there are great demands at Lisbon and Barcelona, in time of peace as well as in war.

While Mr. Prior was in France, news came, that a French Squadron in the West-Indies was taking the Sugar Islands belonging to the English, destroying their Plantations, carrying away their Negroes, and making hostages of the Planters. Upon notice of this invasion of the Leeward-Islands by the French, the Lord Bolingbroke wrote thus to Prior, September the 19th, O. S. 'This proves a very untoward Contretemps. It gives a theme to the Whigs, and serves to awaken the passions that were almost lulled asleep. We expected that Coffart's Squadron might have gone to the coast of Brazil, or to Surinam; but we never imagined our Colonies would have been attacked by him, at a time when we were knitting the bonds of friendship between the two Nations with all possible industry. Could this ill opinion of our new friends have entered into our heads, I do assure you, he should have been accompanied by a fleet of the Queen's, which would have kept him in respect.' He remembers the orders that were so punctually and cheerfully obeyed by the Duke of Ormond, which, as he thinks, saved the French a beating, and then adds: 'In a word, we depended so much upon the good understanding which we thought established, and were so earnest to prevent any thing, which might break in upon it, that we not only avoided to fortify our Squadron, as we might have done, but we also neglected to put in execution some designs, which would have annoyed the French and Spaniards perhaps more than any which have been effected in the course of the war.'

Mr. Prior was so entirely devoted to the French Court, that, towards the latter end of October, without either leave or orders from the Queen, he came over into England, at the desire of the King of France, who thought him a proper person to be intrusted with the great secret of prevailing with the Queen, by her credit, to obtain what he demanded for the Elector of Bavaria; for which purpose he brought a credential letter to the Queen, importing, 'That his conduct was very agreeable to that Monarch.' About the middle of November he was sent back to France with new instructions, wherein the proposal of a neutrality in Italy was one of the chief articles: And, that he might have a perfect knowledge of the Queen's present resolutions and councils, in relation to the present treaty of peace, a copy of the last instructions to the Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht was given him, that, as occasion should require, he might act in all things conformable to the Queen's intentions therein expressed. He carried likewise a letter from the Queen to the King of France, wherein, among other things it is said, that, Mr. Prior continuing to behave himself so, as that his conduct may be entirely agreeable to the King of France, he does but literally execute the order the Queen had given him, and is a proof of his duty and zeal for her service.

About this time, in order to conquer the obstinacy of the Dutch, it was industriously given out in England and Holland, that the Duke of Savoy had agreed to a suspension of arms; which report had, as yet, no other foundation, than the earnest endeavours of the British Ministers to bring him into the Queen's measures; for which the Emperor's backwardness to give him satisfaction about some claims, not ill-grounded, gave them a very plausible handle. The differences, which had been long depending between the Courts of Vienna and Turin, having been very prejudicial to the Confederate interest, because the Duke of Savoy rather chose to stand still, than, by going into the field, to promote the interest of an Ally, who still put off the performance of his engagements to him: The maritime Powers used their utmost endeavours to put an end to these fatal disputes. Both parties were at last prevail-

Prior returns to England. Rep of the Com. of Secr.

1712. ed with, to refer the controversy to the arbitration of the Queen and the States, whose Envoys, Mr. Stanyan and Monsieur Vander Meer, having met at Milan the Plenipotentiaries of the Emperor and the Duke of Savoy, and maturely weighed the allegations on both sides, they agreed on a sentence of arbitration, importing in substance, that either the town of Vigevano, or an equivalent for it, should be given to the Duke, together with several other districts. The Duke of Savoy readily acquiesced in this decision, for which he returned thanks to the British and Dutch Ministers; but the Imperial Commissioners solemnly protested against it; which was very ill relished at the Court of Great-Britain. While this affair was depending, the Duke of Savoy ordered Count Maffei, his first Plenipotentiary at Utrecht, to repair, about the middle of May, to London, to solicit the arrears of subsidies due to him; and, the better to succeed in his Negotiation, that Minister did not fail insinuating, that his Master was inclinable to enter into the British measures. Upon this hint, Mr. St. John, who seized all opportunities to mortify the House of Austria, started the proposals of giving the Kingdom of Sicily to the Duke of Savoy, in order to engage him in his views. And therefore, though the French Plenipotentiary at Utrecht, had early offered that Island to the Emperor, yet the British Minister declared to the Marquis de Torcy, that the Queen absolutely demanded it for the Duke of Savoy. It is, however, observable, that the Duke was so far from relishing this proposition, that he declared to the Earl of Peterborough at Turin, 'That he was not so vainly impatient for the title of a King, as to lose or hazard any real interest for an empty name; but that he thought it much more extraordinary, that a Prince defeated ten years together by his enemies should remain, at last, with the prize contended for, and which so often, by Parliament, had been declared the just and unavoidable motive of the war.' To calm the uneasiness of mind the Duke of Savoy was in, the Earl of Peterborough represented in a memorial to him, 'That, in refusing those offers, he must fall out with the Queen and the English Ministers, whom he endeavoured to excuse from the reproaches cast upon them, as if they were persons devoted to France. That, for the support of what was proposed, a sufficient fleet would be furnished, either by England or France, or by both powers jointly; and that he should be guaranteed and protected against any power, that should oppose this project, or should insult him for having accepted these offers.' The arguments of the British Ministers prevailed at length with the Duke; and, if their design was effectually to disabuse the Emperor from supporting himself against France, after the separation of the English, by forcing into the interest of France an Ally so considerable as the Duke of Savoy, these measures were certainly extremely well calculated for such an end. This forwardness of the British Ministry to make England a guarantee for conditions advantageous only to France, and which must naturally have engaged the Nation in a war with the Emperor, was the more extraordinary, in that, during the whole course of this Negotiation, no endeavours were used to procure a guaranty of the Allies to secure the Protestant Succession, which had been addressed for by both Houses of Parliament. While the Earl of Peterborough was alluring the Duke of Savoy with the promise of Sicily, the French endeavoured to draw him off by open force. But the Duke of Berwick, after an unsuccessful attempt to surprize Fort Edmund and Conti, and the plundering of the neighbourhood of Saluzzes, which occasioned a warm skirmish, was obliged to repals the Alpes with an inconsiderable booty. On the other hand, Count Maffei having, with great address, obtained from the British Court a large sum of money, in part of the arrears due to his Master, he returned to his post at Utrecht, towards the end of September, O. S. by which time the Emperor had sent orders to his Ministers at Milan, to give the Duke of Savoy intire satisfaction. But his condescension had no effect upon a Prince, who was already biased by the gold and promises of Great-Britain.
